DERRY AND OTHERS v. PEEK

E [HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Halsbury, L.C., Lord Watson, Lord Bramwell, Lord FitzGerald and Lord Herschell), March 28, 29, April 5, 9, 11, July 1, 1889]

38 W.R. 33; 5 T.L.R. 625; 1 Meg. 292]

F Misrepresentation—Deceit—Need to prove fraud—Proof of fraud—Relevance of reasonable ground for believing truth of statement made—Relevance of motive—Defence of honest belief.

G To sustain an action for deceit there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Fraud is proved when it is shown that a false representation has been made (i) knowingly, or (ii) without belief in its truth, or (iii) recklessly, not caring whether it be true or false. To succeed in an action for deceit it is not sufficient to prove that the defendant had no reasonable ground for believing the statement which he made, but, at the same time, when a false statement has been made, a consideration of the grounds of belief in its truth is an important aid in ascertaining whether the belief was really entertained and whether the author of the statement really did believe in the truth of what he stated. If fraud is proved, the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial. An honest belief in the truth of the statement made affords a defence to an action.

I Per LORD HERSCHELL: I think it important that it should be borne in mind that the common law action of deceit differs essentially from an action brought to obtain rescission of a contract on the ground of misrepresentation of a material fact. Where rescission is claimed it is only necessary to prove that there was misrepresentation. Then, however honestly it may have been made, however free from blame the person who made it, the contract, having been obtained by misrepresentation, cannot stand.

Appeal by the defendants in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal (COTTON, L.J., SIR JAMES HANNEN and LOPES, L.J.), reported 37 Ch.D. 541, reversing a decision of STIRLING, J.

The action was brought by the respondent, Sir Henry Peek, to recover from the appellants, the directors of the Plymouth, Devonport, and District Tramways Co., Ltd., damages for misstatements alleged to have been contained in a prospectus issued by them, by which he asserted that he was induced to act to his prejudice

G by taking shares in the company. The misrepresentation in the prospectus complained of was that the company had the right to use steam or other mechanical power, when in fact they had no such right, but only a contingent possibility of obtaining that right dependent on the consents of the Board of Trade and of the corporations of Plymouth and Devonport, which consents were subsequently refused as to a most material portion of the line. The respondent, on the faith of the H prospectus, applied for 400 shares in the company, which were allotted to him, and in respect of which he paid £4000. The company was compulsorily wound-up in May, 1885. At the trial of the action in March, 1887, STIRLING, J., dismissed it with costs on the ground that the appellants had made the statements in the prospectus bona fide and not with any intention to deceive. The Court of Appeal held that, the statements in the prospectus being untrue and the appellants knowing I them to be untrue or having no reasonable ground for believing them to be true, it was immaterial whether they had any intention to deceive the public, and that they were responsible to any person who in fact acted on their statements. The directors appealed to the House of Lords.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie for the appellants.

Bompas, Q.C., E. W. Byrne, Q.C., and Pattullo for the respondent.

July 1, 1889. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I have so recently expressed an opinion in the Court of Appeal on the subject of actions of this character that I do not think it necessary to do more than say that I adhere to what I there said (Arnison v. Smith (24), 41 Ch.D at p. 367). To quote the language now some centuries old in dealing with actions of this character, “fraud without damage or damage without fraud” does not give rise to such actions. I have had also the opportunity of reading the opinion of LORD HERSCHELL, and I could desire to add nothing to his exhaustive and lucid treatment of the authorities.

When I turn to the question of fact I confess I am not altogether satisfied. In the first place, I think the statement in the prospectus was untrue in fact, and to the minds of such persons as were likely to take shares well calculated to mislead. I think such persons would have no idea of the technical division between tramways that had rights to use mechanical means and tramways that had not. What I think they would understand would be that this particular tramway was in an exceptionally advantageous position; that the statement was of a present existing fact; and that it had at the time of the invited subscription for shares the right to use steam. I think such a statement, if wilfully made with the consciousness of its inaccuracy, would give rise to an action for deceit, provided that damage had been sustained, if a person had acted upon a belief induced by such a prospectus. But upon the question that these statements were made with a consciousness of their misleading character, I cannot but be influenced by the opinions entertained by so many of your Lordships that they are consistent with the directors' innocence of any intention to deceive. The learned judge who saw and heard the witnesses acquitted the defendants of intentional deceit, and although the Court of Appeal held them liable, overruling the decision of the learned judge below, they appear to me to have justified their decision upon grounds which, as I have already said, I do not think tenable, namely, that they (the directors) were liable because they had no reasonable ground for the belief which nevertheless it is assumed they sincerely entertained. I think it would have been satisfactory to have had a more minute and exact account of how this prospectus was framed, the actual evidence of the draftsman of it, and the discussion which took place upon the alteration in form, which alteration gave such marked and peculiar prominence to the special feature of this particular tramway, in respect of the possession of power to use steam. Nevertheless, if, as I have said, the facts are reconcilable with the innocence of the directors and with the absence of the mens rea which I consider an essential condition of an action for deceit, the mere fact of the inaccuracy of the statement ought not to be pressed into constituting a liability which appears to me not to exist according to the law of England.

As to the question whether Sir Henry Peek was induced to take his shares by reliance on the misleading statement, I admit that I have very considerable doubt. On the one hand, I do not believe that anyone can so far analyse his mental impressions as to be able to say what particular fact in the prospectus induced him to subscribe. On the other hand, the description of Sir Henry Peek even now that the question has been pointedly raised and brought to his mind, of what did or did not induce him to take his shares, is hardly reconcilable with his having been substantially induced by the statement in question to take them. On the whole I acquiesce in the judgment which one of your Lordships is about to move, namely, that the judgment appealed from be reversed.

LORD WATSON.—I agree with STIRLING, J., that, as a matter of fact, the appellants did honestly believe in the truth of the representation upon which this action of deceit is based. It is by no means clear that the learned judges of the Court of Appeal meant to differ from that conclusion; but they have held

A that a man who makes a representation with the view of its being acted upon, in the honest belief that it is true, commits a fraud in the eye of the law, if the court or a jury shall be of opinion that he had not reasonable grounds for his belief. I have no hesitation in rejecting that doctrine, for which I can find no warrant in the law of England. But I shall not trouble your Lordships with any observations of mine, because I accept without reserve the
B opinion about to be delivered by LORD HERSCHELL.

LORD BRAMWELL.—I am of opinion that this judgment should be reversed. I am glad to come to this conclusion, for, as far as my judgment goes, it exonerates five men of good character and conduct from a charge of fraud, which, with all submission, I think wholly unfounded—a charge supported on such materials as
C to make all character precarious. I hope this will not be misunderstood, and that promoters of companies will not suppose that they can safely make inaccurate statements with no responsibility. I should much regret any such notion; for the general public is so at the mercy of company promoters, sometimes dishonest, sometimes over-sanguine, that it requires all the protection that the law can give it. Particularly should I regret if it was supposed that I did not entirely
D disapprove of the conduct of those directors who accepted their qualification from the contractor or intended contractor. It is wonderful to me that honest men of ordinary intelligence cannot see the impropriety of this. It is obvious that the contractor can only give this qualification because he means to get it back in the price given for the work he is to do. That price is to be fixed by the directors who have taken his money. They are paid by him to give him a good price, as high a price as they can, while their duty to their shareholders is to give him one as low as they can. But there is another thing. The public, seeing these names, may well say: “These are respectable and intelligent men who think well enough of this scheme to adventure their money in it; we will do the same,” little knowing that those thus trusted had made themselves safe against loss if E the thing turned out ill, while they might gain if it was successful. The only shade of doubt I have in the case is that this safety from loss in the directors may have made them less careful in judging of the truth of any statements they have made.

There is another matter I wish to dispose of before going into the particular facts of the case. I think we need not trouble ourselves about “legal fraud,”
G nor whether it is a good or bad expression; because I hold that actual fraud must be proved in this case to make the defendants liable, and, as I understand, there is never any occasion to use the phrase “legal fraud” except when actual fraud cannot be established. “Legal fraud” is only used when some vague ground of action is to be resorted to, or, generally speaking, when the person using it will not take the trouble to find, or cannot find, what duty has been violated
H or right infringed, but thinks a claim is somehow made out. With the most sincere respect for SIR JAMES HANNEN, I cannot think the expression “convenient” very clearly conveys an idea—at least, I am certain it does not to my mind. I think it a mischievous phrase, and one which has contributed to what I must consider the erroneous decision in this case. But with these remarks I have done with it, and will proceed to consider whether the law is not that actual
I fraud must be proved, and whether that has been done.

I really am reluctant to cite authorities to show that actual fraud must be established in such a case as this. It is one of the first things one learned, and one has never heard it doubted until recently. I am very glad to think that LORD HERSCHELL has taken the trouble to go into the authorities fully; but to some extent I deprecate it, because it seems to me somewhat to come within the principle, Qui s’excuse s’accuse. As I have said, I never heard a doubt on the subject until very recently. When a man makes a contract with another he is bound by it; and, in making it, he is bound not to bring it about by fraud. Warrantizando vendidit gives a cause of action if the warranty is broken; knowingly and fraudulently stating a material untruth which brings about, wholly or partly, the contract, also gives a cause of action. To this may now be added the equitable rule (which is not in question here), that a material misrepresentation, though not fraudulent, may give a right to avoid or rescind a contract where capable of such rescission. To found an action for damages there must be a contract and breach, or fraud. The statement of claim in this case states fraud. Of course that need not be proved merely because it is stated. But no one ever heard of or saw a statement of claim or declaration for deceit without it. There is not an authority at common law, or by a common law lawyer, to the contrary; none has been cited, though there may be some incautious, hesitating expressions which point that way. Every case from the earliest in COMYN'S DIGEST to the present day alleges it. Further, the learned judges of the Court of Appeal hardly deny it. There is indeed an opinion to the contrary of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.; but it must be remembered that his knowledge of actions of deceit was small, if any. I cannot think, then, that it is necessary to cite cases to show that, to maintain this action, fraud in the defendant must be shown. As to the evidence. The plaintiff's case is, that the defendants made an untrue statement, which they knew to be untrue, and likely to influence persons reading it, and, therefore, they were fraudulent. It is not necessary to consider whether a prima facie case was made out by the plaintiff. We have all the evidence before us, and must judge on the whole. The alleged untrue statement is, that "the company has the right to use steam or mechanical power instead of horses," and that a saving would be thereby effected.

This is certainly untrue; because it is stated as an absolute right, when in truth it was conditional on the approval of the Board of Trade, and the sanction or consent of two local boards, and a conditional right is not the same as an absolute right. It is also certain that the defendants knew what the truth was, and, therefore, knew that what they said was untrue. But it does not follow that the statement was fraudulently made. There are various kinds of untruth. There is an absolute untruth, an untruth in itself, that no addition or qualification can make true, as, if a man says a thing he saw was black, when it was white, as he remembers and knows. So, as to knowing the truth, a man may know it, and yet it may not be present to his mind at the moment of speaking; or, if the fact is present to his mind, it may not occur to him to be of any use to mention it. For example, suppose a man was asked whether a writing was necessary in a contract for the making and purchase of goods, he might well say yes, without adding that payment on receipt of the goods, or part, would suffice. He might well think that the question he was asked was whether a contract for goods to be made required a writing like a contract for goods in existence. If he was writing on the subject he would of course state the exception or qualification. Consider the case here. These directors naturally trust to their solicitors to prepare their prospectus. It is prepared and laid before them. They find the statement of their power to use steam without qualification. It does not occur to them to alter it. They swear they had no fraudulent intention. At the very last they cannot see the fraud. There is their oath, their previous character unimpeached, and there is, to my mind, this further consideration, the truth would have suited their purpose as well: "We have power to use steam, etc., of course with the usual conditions of the approval of the Board of Trade and the consent of the local authorities, but we may make sure of these being granted, as the Board of Trade has already allowed the power to be inserted in the Act, and the local authorities have expressed their approbation of the scheme." The plaintiff's own answer shows that he would have been content with that statement. During the argument I said I am not sure that I should not have passed the prospectus. I will not say so now, because certainly I would not pass it after knowing the unfortunate use made of the

A statement, and no one can tell what would have been the state of his mind if one of the factors influencing it was wanting. But I firmly believe it might have been, and was, honestly done by these defendants. STIRLING, J., saw and heard them, and was of that opinion. It is difficult to say that the plaintiff was not. The report of Nov. 6, 1884, showed that the consent of the Board of Trade was necessary, showed also that the corporation of Devonport would not consent, showed, therefore, the "untruth;" and yet the plaintiff "had every confidence in the directors."

I now proceed to consider the judgments that have been delivered. It is not necessary to declare my great respect for those who have delivered them. STIRLING, J., refuses to say whether actual fraud must be shown, and deals with the case on the footing that the question is whether the defendants had reasonable grounds for making the statement they did. He holds, as I do, that they thought the company had the right, as put in the prospectus, to use steam. Then he says he must "come to the conclusion that they had reasonable ground for their belief: at all events, their grounds were not so unreasonable as to justify me in charging them with having been guilty of fraud."

It is singular that the learned judge seems to consider that unreasonableness must be proved to such an extent as to show fraud. He then proceeds, for what seem to me unanswerable reasons, to show that they did everyone believe that they had the right stated in the prospectus. He refers to what he saw of them in the box. He says he cannot come to the conclusion that their belief was so unreasonable and so unfounded, and their proceedings so reckless or careless, that they ought to be fixed with the consequences of deceit. He makes an excellent remark, that

"mercantile men dealing with matters of business would be the first to cry out if I extended the notion of deceit into what is honestly done in the belief that those things would come about, and when they did not come about, make them liable in an action of fraud."

My only variation of this would be that it may be that the objection did not, and naturally did not, occur to them. It has not been argued, and I will say no more on the question whether, had the plaintiff known the contents of the Act, he would or would not have applied for the shares, than that I agree with STIRLING, J.

"that where a man makes a statement to be acted on by others which is false and is known by him to be false, or is made by him recklessly, or without care whether it is true or false, that is without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true,"

he is liable to an action for deceit. I agree to all before "that is," and I agree to what comes after, if it is taken as equivalent to what goes before, viz., "recklessly or without care whether it is true or false," understanding "recklessly" as explained by "without care whether it is true or false." For a man who makes a statement without care and regard for its truth or falsity commits a fraud: he is a rogue. For every man who makes a statement says, "The truth is so and so, and I know it or believe it." I say I agree to this as I understand it. It seems to me, with great respect, that the learned lord justice lost sight of his own definition, and glided into a different opinion. He says:

"There is a duty cast upon a director who makes that statement to take care that there are no statements in it which in fact are false; to take care that he has reasonable grounds for the material statements which are contained in that document [prospectus], which he intends should be acted on by others. And although in my opinion it is not necessary there should be what I should call fraud, there must be a departure from duty, and he has violated the right which those who received the statements have to have true statements only made to them.” A

This seems to be a most formidable matter. I agree there is some such duty. I agree that not only directors in prospectuses, but all persons in all dealings, should tell the truth. If they do not, they furnish evidence of fraud; they subject themselves to have the contract rescinded. But to say that there is “a right to have true statements only made,” I cannot agree, and I think it would be much to be regretted if there was any such right. Mercantile men, as STIRLING, J., says, would indeed cry out. No qualification is stated. If this is law, the statement may be reasonably believed to be true by him who makes it, but, if untrue, there is to be a cause of action; and that although he may have refused a warranty. I hope not. There is a duty to tell the truth; but it is a duty of imperfect obligation. It is a duty for non-observance of which the law gives no remedy if there is no fraud. His Lordship says : B C

I say I agree if that means making a statement of which he knows or believes not the truth. His Lordship proceeds to examine whether the defendants had reasonable ground for believing what they said, and comes to the conclusion that they had not, and so holds them liable, not because they were dishonest, but because they were unreasonable. I say they never undertook to be otherwise. He says : E

“ It is not that I attribute to them any intention to commit fraud, but they have made a statement without any sufficient reason for believing it to be true.”

SIR JAMES HANNEN says that he agrees with COTTON, L.J.’s, statement of the law, and adds : F

“ If a man takes upon himself to assert a thing to be true, which he does not know to be true, and has no reasonable ground to believe to be true,”

it is sufficient in an action of deceit. I agree, if he knows he has no such reasonable ground; otherwise with great respect I differ. He cites LORD CAIRNS, that, “ if persons take upon themselves to make assertions as to which they are ignorant whether they are true or not, they must in a civil point of view be held as responsible as if they had asserted that which they knew to be untrue :” G

Reese River Silver Mining Co., Ltd. v. Smith (1) (L.R. 4 H.L. at pp. 79, 80). So say I; but this does not support SIR JAMES’S proposition. Nor does he deal with what he quotes from LORD CRANWORTH. But further he speaks of legal fraud as meaning H

“ that degree of moral culpability in the statement of an untruth to induce another to alter his position to which the law attaches responsibility.”

But if there is moral culpability, I agree there is responsibility. But to believe without reasonable grounds is not moral culpability, but (if there is such a thing) mental culpability. He says : I

I agree the law applies it to all breaches of the moral duty to tell the truth in dealing with others; but cannot that duty be honestly broken? To be actionable, a breach of that duty must be dishonest. Nay, it is a man’s duty sometimes to tell an untruth. For instance, when asked as to a servant’s character, he must say what he believes is the truth, however he may have formed his opinion, and however

A wrong it may be. His Lordship says he cannot think the directors had any reasonable ground for believing the prospectus to be true. But had they the matter present to their minds? Even if this were the question, I should decide in their favour.

As to the judgment of LOPES, L.J., I quite agree with what he says :

B “ I know of no fraud which will support an action of deceit to which some moral delinquency does not belong.”

I think that shows the meaning of what he says “ fourthly,” though that is made doubtful by what he says elsewhere.

C I think, with all respect, that in all the judgments there is, I must say it, a confusion of unreasonableness of belief as evidence of dishonesty, and unreasonableness of belief as of itself a ground of action. I have examined these judgments at this length owing to my sense of their importance and the importance of the question they deal with. I think it is most undesirable that actions should be maintainable in respect of statements, made unreasonably perhaps, but honestly. I think it would be disastrous if there was “ a right to have true statements only made.” This case is an example. I think that in this kind of case, as in some others, courts of equity have made the mistake of disregarding a valuable general principle in the desire to effect what is, or is thought to be, justice in a particular instance. It might, perhaps, be desirable to enact that in prospectuses of public companies there should be a warranty of the truth of all statements except where it was expressly said there was no warranty. The objection is to exceptional legislation, and to the danger of driving respectable and responsible men from being promoters, and of substituting for them those who are neither. In this particular case I hold that, unless fraud in the defendants could be shown, the action is not maintainable. I am satisfied there was no fraud. Further, if an unreasonable misstatement were enough, I hold there was none. Still further, I do not believe that the plaintiff was influenced by the misstatement, though I am entirely satisfied

F that he was an honest witness.

LORD FITZGERALD.—The pleadings and the facts have been already referred to by the noble Lords who have addressed the House. The action is for deceit. The writ was sued out in February, 1885, and originally claimed rescission of the contract with the company. It was subsequently amended by striking out the company as defendants and also the prayer for rescission, and it assumed the character of an action for deceit against the present appellants (five of the directors), and claimed “ damages for the fraudulent misrepresentations of the defendants.” The statement of claim, which is sufficient in form to raise the real question, alleged the misrepresentation to exist in the prospectus issued in January, 1883, and to consist of the paragraph that the company had a right to use steam or other

H mechanical motive power; and it was further alleged

and that such representation was made fraudulently, and with the view to induce the plaintiff to take shares in the company. So far, the real issue seems to have been I raised fairly and clearly, and to depend on matters of fact. There were circumstances connected with the promotion of the company, and the procuring of four of the defendants to act as directors, which tended to create suspicion as to their statements and their bona fides, and attracted directly the attention of the learned judge before whom the case was tried. The defendants, who were severally produced as witnesses at the trial, were exposed to a very lengthened and searching cross-examination by counsel for the plaintiff, and were also carefully examined by the judge as to these transactions, with the result apparently of freeing them from any imputations therein of moral misconduct.

The question which I am about to examine in the first instance, and excluding for the present the element of fraud, is whether the impugned statement in the prospectus was a false statement in the sense of being untrue. That it was inaccurate so far as it purported to give the legal effect of the special Act I do not doubt; but was it untrue as representing the position of the company in a popular and business sense? The general Tramways Act, 1870, which regulates tramways generally, but subject to the provisions of the special Act, if any, of each company, places them under the supervision of the Board of Trade with a view to public safety, and for public protection generally, and by s. 34 it provides

The special Act of this company became law on July 24, 1882, and by s. 4 the company incorporated by the Act is empowered to make the seven tramways in question in all respects in accordance with the plans and sections. Section 15 provides minutely for their formation, subject to the orders of the Board of Trade, and by s. 16 the tramway is not to be opened for public traffic until it shall have been inspected and certified by the Board of Trade to be fit for such traffic. Before referring to s. 35 of the special Act we may glance at s. 37 of that Act, which empowers the Board of Trade to make byelaws as to any of the tramways on which steam may be used under the authority of the Act; and s. 44, which provides that where the company intends to use steam they shall give two months' notice. There are several other sections providing for the use of steam power if the company should elect to use it as the motor.

In the light of those sections of the special Act and of s. 34 of the general Act, let us now look at the particular paragraph of the prospectus, and s. 35 of the special Act. By that section Parliament has done that which Parliament could do, and which the Board of Trade could not do. It has conferred on the company authority to use steam as its motive power. It has not imposed on the company the use of steam power, but it says that they may use it if they elect to do so. Before dealing with the consent of the Board of Trade, I desire to call attention to the proviso in s. 35 :

“ that the exercise of the powers hereby conferred with respect to the use of steam shall be subject to the regulations in Sched. A, and to any regulations which may be added thereto or substituted therefor by the Board of Trade for securing to the public all reasonable protection against danger, in the exercise of the powers by this Act conferred, with respect to the use of steam.”

Schedule A, referred to in s. 35, contains no less than ten regulations for the direction of the company in the exercise of the right so conferred to use steam power. Turning back to the words “ with the consent of the Board of Trade ” in s. 35 of the special Act, that consent could not confer, nor would its absence take away, the right conferred by the legislature to use steam as a motor. Its true character is that of a precaution imposed by the legislature to defer the actual exercise of the right conferred until the supervision of the Board of Trade secures to the public all reasonable protections against danger. To attain these objects the legislature provides that the powers it has conferred should not be actually exercised without the consent of the Board of Trade.

I have, though with difficulty, arrived at the conclusion that the statement in the prospectus, that by the special Act the company had the right to use steam power, was not untrue in a popular or business sense. Let us see for a moment in what way and with what meaning General Hutchinson used similar expressions. In his report of July 12, 1884, he says :

“ The Act of 1882 gives, however, power to the company to use mechanical power over all their system, and I think it would be most objectionable that this

A power should be exercised on parts of Tramway No. 1, on account of the narrowness of three of the roads."

The remainder of the incriminated paragraph of the prospectus is :

B "and it is fully expected that by means of [the use of steam], a considerable saving will result in the working expenses of the line, as compared with other tramways worked by horses."

C This was not untrue; there had been a division of opinion in the directory on the subject, which was finally and before the issue of the prospectus resolved in favour of steam. The conclusion I have arrived at is that this paragraph of the prospectus, though inaccurate in point of law in one particular, seems on the whole to have been morally true.

D If this view is correct, it is an answer to the action; but assuming that it is not correct, or that your Lordships are not prepared to adopt it, I proceed to express my opinion on the remaining substance of the action. COTTON, L.J., describes the action as "an action of deceit, a mere common law action." The description is accurate, and I proceed to deal with it as a mere common law action. It has not been in the least altered in its characteristics by having been instituted in the Chancery Division, or tried by a judge without the aid of a jury; nor are your Lordships necessarily driven to consider in the present appeal some of the subtle and refined distinctions which have been engrafted on the clear and simple principles of the common law. The action for deceit at common law is founded on fraud. It is essential to the action that moral fraud should be established, and since E Collins v. Evans (2) in the Exchequer Chamber, it has never been doubted that fraud must concur with the false statement to maintain the action. It would not be sufficient to show that a false representation had been made. It must further be established that the defendant knew at the time of making it that the representation was untrue; or, to adopt the language of the learned editors of SMITH'S LEADING CASES, that

F "the defendant must be shown to have been actually and fraudulently cognisant of the falsehood of his representation, or to have made it fraudulently without belief that it was true."

G The leading counsel for the respondent met the argument fairly on the allegations of fact. He alleged "that the defendants were not honest; that they stated in the prospectus a definite lie, and knew that it was a lie." That is the very issue, in fact, in the case. The whole law and all the cases on the subject will be found in the notes to Chandelor v. Lopus (3) (SMITH'S LEADING CASES (9th Edn.), vol. 1, p. 186) and Pasley v. Freeman (4) (SMITH'S LEADING CASES (9th Edn.), vol. 2, p. 74). There is also a clear and able summary of the decisions both in law and in equity, brought down to the present time, in the recent edition of BENJAMIN ON SALE, by H PEARSON-GEE and BOYD. I desire to make an observation on Chandelor v. Lopus (3). The report in CRO. JAC. 4 would seem to have but little direct bearing on the present case, were it not for the opinion attributed to ANDERSON, J.; but there is a valuable note in 1 DYER, by VAILLANT (at p. 75a), which is as follows :

I "Lopus brought an action upon the case against Chandelor, and showed that, whereas the defendant was a goldsmith, and skilled in the nature of precious stones, and being possessed of a stone which the defendant asserted and assured the said plaintiff to be a true and perfect stone called a bezoar stone, etc., upon which the plaintiff bought it, etc. There the opinion of POPHAM, C.J., was that if I have any commodities which are damaged (whether victuals or otherwise), and I, knowing them to be so, sell them for good and affirm them to be so, an action upon the case lies for the deceit; but although they be damaged, if I, knowing not that, affirm them to be good, still no action lies without I warrant them to be good."

The action seems originally to have been on a warranty which failed in fact, as there had been no warranty, and it was then sought to support it as an action for deceit; but it was not alleged in the court that the defendant knew the representation to be untrue. It was in reference to that that the observation of POPHAM, C.J., was made. He had the reputation of being a consummate lawyer. The note in 1 DYER, at p. 15a, was probably by MR. TREBY, afterwards TREBY, C.J. He edited an edition of DYER published in 1688. I have not had an opportunity of referring to it, but it is said that he gave the public some highly authoritative notes in that edition. I have quoted from Mr. VAILLANT's edition published in 1794.

The whole evidence given on this appeal has been laid before your Lordships, and we have to deal with it as a whole. That evidence has been already so fully stated and criticised that it is not necessary for me to do more than to state the conclusions of fact which, in my opinion, are reasonably to be deduced from it, viz., that the several defendants did not know that the incriminated statement in the prospectus was untrue, and that, on the contrary, they severally and in good faith believed it to be true. The conclusions in fact at which I have arrived render it unnecessary for me to consider the long and rather bewildering list of authorities to which your Lordships were referred, or to criticise the reasons given in the Court of Appeal for their decision in the present case.

I desire, however, to make a single observation. There is one characteristic which, as it seems to me, pervades each of the several judgments in the Court of Appeal, viz., that the bona fide belief of the defendants in the truth of the representation was unavailing unless it was a reasonable belief resting on reasonable grounds. If this is correct, it seems to me that in an action for "deceit" it would be necessary to submit to the jury (if tried before that tribunal) not only the existence of that belief bona fide, but also the grounds on which it was arrived at, and their reasonableness. I am by no means satisfied that such is the law, and if now driven to express an opinion on it, I would prefer following the opinion of LORD CRANWORTH, in Western Bank of Scotland v. Addie (5), in which he said (L.R. 1 Sc. & Div. at p. 168):

"I confess that my opinion was, that in what his Lordship [LORD CHELMSFORD] thus stated, he went beyond what principle warrants. If persons in the situation of directors of a bank make statements as to the condition of its affairs which they bona fide believe to be true, I cannot think they can be guilty of fraud because other persons think, or the court thinks, or your Lordships think, that there was no sufficient ground to warrant the opinion which they had formed. If a little more care or caution must have led the directors to a conclusion different from that which they put forth, this may afford strong evidence to show that they did not really believe in the truth of what they stated, and so that they were guilty of fraud. But this would be the consequence not of their having stated as true what they had not reasonable ground to believe to be true, but of their having stated as true what they did not believe to be true."

A director is bound in all particulars to be careful and circumspect, and not, either in his statements to the public or in the performance of the duties he has undertaken, to be careless or negligent or rash. Want of care or circumspection, as well as recklessness, may in such a case as the present be taken into consideration in determining at every stage the question of bona fides. I am of opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal should be reversed.

LORD HERSCHELL.—In the statement of claim in this action the respondent, who is the plaintiff, alleges that the appellants in a prospectus issued by them made certain statements which were untrue, that they well knew that the facts were not as stated in the prospectus, and that they made the representations

A fraudulently, and with the view to induce the plaintiff to take shares in the company.

B This is the description of it given by COTTON, L.J., in delivering judgment. I think it important that it should be borne in mind that such an action differs essentially from one brought to obtain rescission of the contract on the ground of misrepresentation of a material fact. The principles which govern the two actions differ widely. Where rescission is claimed it is only necessary to prove that there was misrepresentation. Then, however honestly it may have been made, C however free from blame the person who made it, the contract, having been obtained by misrepresentation, cannot stand. In an action of deceit, on the contrary, it is not enough to establish misrepresentation alone; it is conceded on all hands that something more must be proved to cast liability upon the defendant, though it has been a matter of controversy what additional elements are requisite.

D I lay stress upon this, because observations made by learned judges in actions for rescission have been cited and much relied upon at the Bar by counsel for the respondents. Care must obviously be observed in applying to an action of deceit the language used in relation to such actions. Even if the scope of the language used extended beyond the particular action which was being dealt with, it must be remembered that the learned judges were not engaged in determining what is necessary to support an action of deceit, or in discriminating with nicety E the elements which enter into it.

There is another class of actions which I must refer to also for the purpose of putting it aside. I mean those cases where a person within whose special province it lay to know a particular fact has given an erroneous answer to an inquiry made with regard to it by a person desirous of ascertaining the fact for the purpose of determining his course accordingly, and has been held bound to make F good the assurance he has given. Burrowes v. Lock (6) may be cited as an example, where a trustee had been asked by an intended lender upon the security of a trust fund, whether notice of any prior encumbrance upon the fund had been given to him. In cases like this it has been said that the circumstance that the answer was honestly made in the belief that it was true affords no defence to the action. LORD SELBORNE pointed out, in Brownlie v. Campbell (7) (5 App. G Cas. at p. 935), that these cases were in an altogether different category from actions to recover damages for false representation such as we are now dealing with.

One other observation I have to make before proceeding to consider the law which has been laid down by the learned judges in the Court of Appeal in the case before your Lordships.

H “An action of deceit is a common law action, and must be decided on the same principles, whether it be brought in the Chancery Division or any of the common law divisions, there being, in my opinion, no such thing as an equitable action for deceit.”

I This was the language of COTTON, L.J., in Arkwright v. Newbold (8) (17 Ch.D. at p. 320); it was adopted by LORD BLACKBURN in Smith v. Chadwick (9), and is not, I think, open to dispute. In the court below COTTON, L.J., said:

“What in my opinion is a correct statement of the law is this, that where a man makes a statement to be acted upon by others which is false, and which is known by him to be false, or is made by him recklessly, or without care whether it is true or false, that is, without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true, he is liable in an action of deceit at the suit of anyone to whom it was addressed, or anyone of the class to whom it was

About much that is here stated there cannot, I think, be two opinions. But when the learned lord justice speaks of a statement made recklessly or without care whether it is true or false, that is, without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true, I find myself, with all respect, unable to agree that these are convertible expressions. To make a statement careless whether it be true or false, and, therefore, without any real belief in its truth, appears to me to be an essentially different thing from making, through want of care, a false statement which is nevertheless honestly believed to be true. And it is surely conceivable that a man may believe that what he states is the fact, though he has been so wanting in care that the court may think that there were no sufficient grounds to warrant his belief.

I shall have to consider hereafter whether the want of reasonable ground for believing the statement made is sufficient to support an action of deceit. I am only concerned for the moment to point out that it does not follow that it is so because there is authority for saying that a statement made recklessly, without caring whether it be true or false, affords sufficient foundation for such an action. That the learned lord justice thought that, if a false statement were made without reasonable ground for believing it to be true, an action of deceit would lie, is clear from a subsequent passage in his judgment. He says that when statements are made in a prospectus like the present, to be circulated among persons in order to induce them to take shares,

"there is a duty cast upon the director or other person who makes those statements to take care that there are no expressions in them which in fact are false; to take care that he has reasonable grounds for the material statements which are contained in that document which he prepares and circulates for the very purpose of its being acted upon by others."

The learned judge proceeds to say :

"Although in my opinion it is not necessary that there should be what I should call fraud, yet in these actions, according to my view of the law, there must be a departure from duty; that is to say, an untrue statement made without any reasonable ground for believing that statement to be true; and, in my opinion, when a man makes an untrue statement with an intention that it shall be acted upon without any reasonable ground for believing that statement to be true, he makes a default in a duty which was thrown upon him from the position he has taken upon himself, and he violates the right which those to whom he makes the statement have, to have true statements only made to them."

I have first to remark on these observations that the alleged "right" must surely be here stated too widely if it is intended to refer to a legal right, the violation of which may give rise to an action for damages. For, if there be a right to have true statements only made, this will render liable to an action those who make untrue statements, however innocently. This cannot have been meant. I think it must have been intended to make the statement of the right correspond with that of the alleged duty, the departure from which is said to be making an untrue statement without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true. I have further to observe, that the lord justice distinctly says that, if there be such a departure from duty, an action of deceit can be maintained, though there be not what he should call fraud. I shall have by-and-by to consider the discussions which have arisen as to the difference between the popular understanding of the word "fraud" and the interpretation given to it by lawyers which have led to the use of such expressions as "legal fraud" or "fraud in

A law;" but I may state at once that, in my opinion, without proof of fraud no action of deceit is maintainable. When I examine the cases which have been decided upon this branch of the law, I shall endeavour to show that there is abundant authority to warrant this proposition.

I return now to the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal. SIR JAMES HANNEN says :

[B

"I take the law to be that, if a man takes upon himself to assert a thing to be true which he does not know to be true, and has no reasonable ground to believe to be true, in order to induce another to act upon the assertion, who does so act and is thereby damnified, the person so damnified is entitled to maintain action for deceit."

C

Again, LOPES, L.J., states what, in his opinion, is the result of the cases. I will not trouble your Lordships with quoting the first three propositions which he lays down, although I do not feel sure that the third is distinct from, and not rather an instance of, the case dealt with by the second proposition. But he says that a person making a false statement intended to be and in fact relied on by the person to whom it is made may be sued by the person damaged thereby.

"Fourthly, if it is untrue in fact, but believed to be true, but without any reasonable grounds for such belief."

E

It will thus be seen that all the learned judges concurred in thinking that it was sufficient to prove that the representations made were not in accordance with fact, and that the person making them had no reasonable ground for believing them. They did not treat the absence of such reasonable ground as evidence merely that the statements were made recklessly, careless whether they were true or false, and without belief that they were true; but they adopted as the test of liability, not the existence of belief in the truth of the assertions made, but whether the belief in them was founded upon any reasonable grounds.

F

It will be seen further that the court did not purport to be establishing any new doctrine. They deemed that they were only following the cases already decided, and that the proposition which they concurred in laying down was established by prior authorities. Indeed LOPES, L.J., expressly states the law in this respect to be well settled. This renders a close and critical examination of the earlier authorities necessary. I need go no further back than the leading case of Pasley v. Freeman (4). If it was not there for the first time held that an action of deceit would lie in respect of fraudulent representations against a person not a party to a contract induced by them, the law was at all events not so well settled but that a distinguished judge, GROSE, J., differing from his brethren on the Bench, held that such an action was not maintainable. BULLER, J., who held that the action lay, adopted in relation to it the language of CROKE, J., in Baily v. Merrell (10), who said (3 Bulst. at p. 95) :

H

"Fraud without damage, or damage without fraud, gives no cause of action, but where these two concur an action lies."

I

In reviewing Cross v. Gardner (11) he says (3 Term Rep. at p. 57) : "Knowledge of the falsehood of the thing asserted is fraud and deceit;" and further, after pointing out that in Risney v. Selby (12) the judgment proceeded wholly on the ground that the defendant knew what he asserted to be false, he adds (ibid. at p. 60) :

"The assertion alone will not maintain the action, but the plaintiff must go on to prove that it was false, and that the defendant knew it to be so," the latter words being specially emphasised. LORD KENYON, C.J., said (ibid. at p. 65) :

"The plaintiffs applied to the defendant telling him that they were going to deal with Falck, and desiring to be informed of his credit, when the defendant fraudulently, and knowing it to be otherwise, and with a design to deceive the plaintiffs, made the false affirmation which is stated on the record, by which they sustained a considerable damage. Then can a doubt be entertained for a moment but that this is injurious to the plaintiffs?"

In this case it was evidently considered that fraud was the basis of the action, and that such fraud might consist in making a statement known to be false.

Haycroft v. Creasy (13) was, again, an action in respect of a false affirmation made by the defendant to the plaintiff about the credit of a third party whom the plaintiff was about to trust. The words complained of were :

"I can assure you of my own knowledge that you may credit Miss R. to any amount with perfect safety."

All the judges were agreed that fraud was of the essence of the action, but they differed in their view of the conclusion to be drawn from the facts. LORD KENYON, C.J., thought that fraud had been proved because the defendant stated that to be true within his own knowledge which he did not know to be true. The other judges, thinking that the defendant's words touching his own knowledge were no more than a strong expression of opinion, inasmuch as a statement concerning the credit of another can be no more than a matter of opinion, and that he did believe the lady's credit to be what he represented, held that the action would not lie. It is beside the present purpose to inquire which view of the facts was the more sound. Upon the law there was no difference of opinion. It is a distinct decision that knowledge of the falsity of the affirmation made it essential to the maintenance of the action, and that belief in its truth affords a defence.

I may pass now to Foster v. Charles (14). It was there contended that the defendant was not liable even though the representation he had made was false to his knowledge, because he had no intention of defrauding or injuring the plaintiff. This contention was not upheld by the court, TINDAL, C.J., saying (7 Bing. at p. 107) :

"It is fraud in law if a party makes representations which he knows to be false, and injury ensues, although the motives from which the representations proceeded may not have been bad."

This is the first of the cases in which I have met with the expression "fraud in law." It was manifestly used in relation to the argument that the defendant was not actuated by a desire to defraud or injure the person to whom the representation was made. The popular use of the word "fraud" perhaps involves generally the conception of such a motive as one of its elements. But I do not think the Chief Justice intended to indicate any doubt that the act which he characterised as a fraud in law was in truth fraudulent as a matter of fact also. Wilfully to tell a falsehood intending that another shall be led to act upon it as if it were the truth may well be termed fraudulent, whatever the motive which induces it, though it be neither gain to the person making the assertion nor injury to the person to whom it is made.

Foster v. Charles (14) was followed in Corbett v. Brown (15), and shortly afterwards in Polhill v. Walter (16). The learned counsel for the respondent placed great reliance on this case because, although the jury had negatived the existence of fraud in fact, the defendant was nevertheless held liable. It is plain, however, that all that was meant by this finding of the jury was, that the defendant was not actuated by any corrupt or improper motive, for LORD TENTERDEN says (3 B. & Ad. at p. 123) :

"It was contended that . . . in order to maintain this species of action it is not necessary to prove that the false representation was made from a

A corrupt motive of gain to the defendant or a wicked motive of injury to the plaintiff; it was said to be enough if a representation is made which the party making it knows to be untrue, and which is intended by him, or which from the mode in which it is made is calculated to induce another to act on the faith of it in such a way as that he may incur damage, and that damage is actually incurred. A wilful falsehood of such a nature was contended to be, in the legal sense of the word, a fraud, and for this position was cited Foster v. Charles (14), to which may be added the recent case of Corbett v. Brown (15). The principle of these cases appears to us to be well founded, and to apply to the present."

C In a later case of Crawshay v. Thompson (17) MAULE, J., explains Polhill v. Walter (16) (4 Man. & G. at p. 382) :

"If a wrong be done by a false representation of a party who knows such representation to be false, the law will infer an intention to injure. That is the effect of Polhill v. Walter (16)."

D In the same case, CRESSWELL, J., defines "fraud in law" in terms which have often been quoted. He says (ibid. at p. 387) :

"The cases may be considered to establish the principle that fraud in law consists in knowingly asserting that which is false in fact to the injury of another."

E In Moens v. Heyworth (18), which was decided in the same year as Crawshay v. Thompson (17), LORD ABINGER, C.B., having suggested that an action of fraud might be maintained where no moral blame was to be imputed, PARKE, B., said (10 M. & W. at p. 157) :

F "To support that count [viz., a count for fraudulent representation] it was essential to prove that the defendants knowingly by words or acts, made such a representation as is stated in the third count, relative to the invoice of these goods, as they knew to be untrue."

G The next case in the series (Taylor v. Ashton (19)) is one which strikes me as being of great importance. It was an action brought against directors of a bank for fraudulent representations as to its affairs, whereby the plaintiff was induced to take shares. The jury found the defendants not guilty of fraud, but expressed the opinion that they had been guilty of gross negligence. Exception was taken to the mode in which the case was left to the jury, and it was contended that their verdict entitled the plaintiff to judgment. PARKE, B., however, in delivering the opinion of the court, said (11 M. & W. at p. 415) :

H "It is insisted that even that [the gross negligence which the jury had found], accompanied with a damage to the plaintiff in consequence of that gross negligence, would be sufficient to give him a right of action. From this proposition we entirely dissent, because we are of opinion that, independently of any contract between the parties, no one can be made responsible for a representation of this kind unless it be fraudulently made. . . . But then it was said that, in order to constitute that fraud, it was not necessary to show that the defendants knew the fact they stated to be untrue; that it was enough that the fact was untrue if they communicated that fact for a deceitful purpose, and to that proposition the court is prepared to assent. It is not necessary to show that the defendants knew the facts to be untrue; if they stated a fact which was true for a fraudulent purpose, they at the same time not believing that fact to be true, in that case it would be both a legal and moral fraud."

I It is impossible to conceive a more emphatic declaration than this, that to support an action of deceit fraud must be proved, and that nothing less than fraud will do. I can find no trace of the idea that it would suffice if it were A shown that the defendants had not reasonable grounds for believing the statements they made. It is difficult to understand how the defendants could, in the case on which I am commenting, have been guilty of gross negligence in making the statements they did if they had reasonable grounds for believing them to be true, or if they had taken care that they had reasonable grounds for making them. B

All the cases I have hitherto referred to were in courts of first instance. But in Collins v. Evans (2) they were reviewed by the Exchequer Chamber. The judgment of the court was delivered by TINDAL, C.J. After stating (5 Q.B. at p. 827) the question at issue to be

“whether a statement or representation which is false in fact, but not C known to be so by the party making it, but on the contrary, made honestly and in the full belief that it is true, affords a ground of action,”

“The current of authorities from Pasley v. Freeman (4) downwards has D laid down the general rule of law to be, that fraud must concur with the false statement in order to give a ground of action.”

Is it not clear that the court considered that fraud was absent if the statement was “made honestly, and in the full belief that it was true?”

In Evans v. Edmonds (20) MAULE, J., expressed an important opinion often quoted, which has been thought to carry the law further than the previous authorities, though I do not think it really does so. He said (13 C.B. at p. 786): E

“If a man having no knowledge whatever on the subject takes upon him- self to represent a certain state of facts to exist, he does so at his peril, and if it be done either with a view to secure some benefit to himself or to deceive a third person he is in law guilty of a fraud, for he takes upon himself to warrant his own belief of the truth of that which he so asserts. F Although the person making the representation may have no knowledge of its falsehood, the representation may still have been fraudulently made.”

The foundation of this proposition manifestly is that a person making any state- ment which he intends another to act upon must be taken to warrant his belief in its truth. Any person making such a statement must always be aware that the person to whom it is made will understand, if not that he who makes it G knows, yet at least that he believes, it to be true. And if he has no such belief he is as much guilty of fraud as if he had made any other representation which he knew to be false, or did not believe to be true.

I now arrive at the earliest case in which I find the suggestion that an untrue statement made without reasonable ground for believing it will support an action for deceit. In Western Bank of Scotland v. Addie (5) the Lord President told H the jury

“that if a case should occur of directors taking upon themselves to put forth in their report statements of importance in regard to the affairs of the bank false in themselves and which they did not believe, or had no reasonable ground to believe, to be true, that would be misrepresentation I or deceit.”

Exception having been taken to this direction without avail in the Court of Session, LORD CHELMSFORD in this House said (L.R. 1 Sc. & Div. at p. 162):

“I agree in the propriety of this interlocutor. . . . In the argument upon this exception the case was put of an honest belief being entertained by the directors of the reasonableness of which it was said the jury upon this direction would have to judge. But supposing a person makes an untrue

A statement which he asserts to be the result of a bona fide belief of its truth, how can the bona fides be tested except by considering the grounds of such belief? And if an untrue statement is made founded upon a belief which is destitute of all reasonable grounds, or which the least inquiry would immediately correct, I do not see that it is not fairly and correctly characterised as misrepresentation and deceit."

I think there is here some confusion between that which is evidence of fraud, and that which constitutes it. A consideration of the grounds of belief is no doubt an important aid in ascertaining whether the belief was really entertained. A man's mere assertion that he believed the statement he made to be true is not accepted as conclusive proof that he did so. There may be such an absence of reasonable ground for his belief as, in spite of his assertion, to carry conviction to the mind that he had not really the belief which he alleges. If the learned Lord intended to go further, as apparently he did, and to say that, though the belief was really entertained, yet, if there were no reasonable grounds for it, the person making the statement was guilty of fraud in the same way as if he had known what he stated to be false, I say, with all respect, that the previous authorities afford no warrant for the view that an action of deceit would lie under such circumstances. A man who forms his belief carelessly, or is unreasonably credulous, may be blameworthy when he makes a representation on which another is to act, but he is not, in my opinion, fraudulent in the sense in which that word was used in all the cases from Pasley v. Freeman (4) down to that with which I am now dealing. Even when the expression "fraud in law" has been employed, there has always been present, and regarded as an essential element, that the deception was wilful either because the untrue statement was known to be untrue, or because belief in it was asserted without such belief existing.

I have made these remarks with the more confidence because they appear to me to have the high sanction of LORD CRANWORTH. In delivering his opinion in Western Bank of Scotland v. Addie (5) he said (L.R. 1 Sc. & Div. at p. 168):

"I confess that my opinion was that, in what his Lordship [the Lord President] then stated, he went beyond what principle warrants. If persons in the situation of directors of a bank make statements as to the condition of its affairs which they bona fide believe to be true, I cannot think they can be guilty of fraud, because other persons think, or the court thinks, or your Lordships think, that there was no sufficient ground to warrant the opinion which they had formed. If a little more care and caution must have led the directors to a conclusion different from that which they put forth, this may afford strong evidence to show that they did not really believe in the truth of what they stated, and so that they were guilty of fraud. But this would be a consequence, not of their having stated as true what they had not reasonable ground to believe to be true, but of their having stated as true what they did not believe to be true."

SIR JAMES HANNEN, in his judgment in the court below in the present case, seeks to limit the application of what LORD CRANWORTH says to cases where the statement made is a matter of opinion only. With all deference I do not think it was intended to be or can be so limited. The direction which he was considering, and which he thought went beyond what true principle warranted, had relation to making false statements of importance in regard to the affairs of the bank. When this is borne in mind, and the words which follow those quoted by SIR JAMES HANNEN are looked at, it becomes to my mind obvious that LORD CRANWORTH did not use the words "the opinion which they had formed" as meaning anything different from "the belief which they entertained."

The opinions expressed by LORD CAIRNS in two well-known cases have been cited as though they supported the view that an action of deceit might be maintained without any fraud on the part of the persons sued. I do not think they bear A any such construction. In Reese River Silver Mining Co. v. Smith (1) he said

“If persons take upon themselves to make assertions as to which they are ignorant whether they are true or untrue, they must, in a civil point of view, be held as responsible as if they had asserted that which they knew to B be untrue.”

This must mean that the persons referred to were conscious when making the assertion that they were ignorant whether it was true or untrue. For, if not, it might be said of anyone who innocently makes a false statement that he must be ignorant that it is untrue, for otherwise he would not make it innocently; C he must be ignorant that it is true, for by the hypothesis it is false. Construing the language of LORD CAIRNS in the sense I have indicated, it is no more than an adoption of the opinion expressed by MAULE, J., in Evans v. Edmonds (20).
It is a case of the representation of a person's belief in a fact when he is conscious that he knows not whether it be true or false, and when he has therefore no such belief. When LORD CAIRNS speaks of it as not being fraud in the D more invidious sense, he refers, I think, only to the fact that there was no intention to cheat or injure.

In Peek v. Gurney (21) the same learned Lord, after alluding to the circumstance that the defendants had been acquitted of fraud upon a criminal charge, and that there was a great deal to show that they were labouring under the impression that the concern had in it the elements of a profitable commercial E undertaking, proceeds to say (L.R. 6 H.L. at pp. 409, 410) :

“They may be absolved from any charge of a wilful design or motive to mislead or defraud the public. But in a civil proceeding of this kind all that your Lordships have to examine is the question, was there, or was there not, misrepresentation in point of fact? If there was, however innocent the F motive may have been, your Lordships will be obliged to arrive at the consequences which properly would result from what was done.”

In the case then under consideration it was clear that, if there had been a false statement of fact, it had been knowingly made. LORD CAIRNS certainly could not have meant that in an action of deceit the only question to be considered was whether or not there was misrepresentation in point of fact. All that he G there pointed out was that in such a case motive was immaterial; that it mattered not that there was no design to mislead or defraud the public if a false representation were knowingly made. It was, therefore, but an affirmation of the law laid down in Forster v. Charles (14), Polhill v. Walter (16), and other cases I have already referred to.

I now come to very recent cases. In Weir v. Bell (22) LORD BRAMWELL H vigorously criticised the expression “legal fraud,” and indicated a very decided opinion that an action founded on fraud could not be sustained except by the proof of fraud in fact. I have already given my reason for thinking that, until recent times at all events, the judges who spoke of fraud in law did not mean to exclude the existence of fraud in fact, but only of an intention to defraud or I injure. In the same case COTTON, L.J., stated the law in much the same way as he did in the present case, treating “recklessly” as equivalent to “without any reasonable ground for believing” the statements made. But the same learned judge in Arkwright v. Newbold (8) laid down the law somewhat differently, for he said (17 Ch.D. at p. 320) :

“In an action of deceit the representation to found the action must not be innocent; that is to say, it must be made either with knowledge of its being false, or with a reckless disregard as to whether it is or is not true.”

His exposition of the law was substantially the same in Edgington v. Fitzmaurice (23). In this latter case BOWEN, L.J., defined (29 Ch.D. at p. 481) what the plaintiff must prove in addition to the falsity of the statement, as:

"Secondly, that it was false to the knowledge of the defendants, or that they made it not caring whether it was true or false."

It only remains to notice the case of Smith v. Chadwick (9). SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., there said (20 Ch.D. at p. 44):

"A man may issue a prospectus or make any other statement to induce another to enter into a contract, believing his statement is true, and not intending to deceive; but he may through carelessness have made statements which are not true, and which he ought to have known were not true, and if he does so he is liable in an action for deceit. He cannot be allowed to escape merely because he had good intentions, and did not intend to defraud."

This, like everything else that fell from that learned judge, is worthy of respectful consideration. With the last sentence I quite agree, but I cannot assent to the doctrine that a false statement made through carelessness which ought to have been known to be untrue, of itself renders the person who makes it liable to an action for deceit. This does not seem to me by any means necessarily to amount to fraud, without which the action will not, in my opinion, lie. It must be remembered that it was not requisite for SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Smith v. Chadwick (9) to form an opinion whether a statement carelessly made, but honestly believed, could be the foundation of an action of deceit. The decision did not turn on any such point. The conclusion at which he arrived is expressed in these terms (ibid. at p. 67):

"On the whole I have come to the conclusion that this, although in some respects inaccurate, and in some respects not altogether free from imputation of carelessness, was a fair, honest, and bona fide statement on the part of the defendants, and by no means exposes them to an action for deceit."

I may further note that, in the same case, LINDLEY, L.J., said (ibid. at p. 75):

"The plaintiff has to prove . . . first of all that the misrepresentation was made to him; secondly, he must prove that it was false; thirdly, that it was false to the knowledge of the defendants, or at all events that they did not believe the truth of it."

This appears to me to be a different statement of the law from that which I have just criticised, and one much more in accord with the prior decisions.

Smith v. Chadwick (9) was carried to your Lordships' House. LORD SELBORNE thus laid down the law (9 App. Cas. at p. 190):

"I conceive that in an action of deceit . . . it is the duty of the plaintiff to establish two things: first, actual fraud, which is to be judged of by the nature and character of the representations made, considered with reference to the object for which they were made, the knowledge or means of knowledge of the person making them, and the intention which the law justly imputes to every man to produce those consequences which are the natural result of his acts; and secondly, he must establish that this fraud was an inducing cause to the contract."

It will be noticed that the noble and learned Lord regards the proof of actual fraud as essential; all the other matters to which he refers are elements to be considered in determining whether such fraud has been established. LORD BLACKBURN indicated that, although he nearly agreed with the Master of the Rolls, that learned judge had not quite stated what he conceived to be the law. He did not point out precisely how far he differed; but it is impossible to read his judgment in this case, or in that of Brownlie v. Campbell (7) without seeing that in his A opinion proof of actual fraud, of a wilful deception, was requisite.

Having now drawn attention, I believe, to all the cases having a material bearing upon the question under consideration, I proceed to state briefly the conclusions to which I have been led. I think the authorities establish the following propositions: First, in order to sustain an action of deceit, there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Secondly, fraud is proved B when it is shown that a false representation has been made (i) knowingly, or (ii) without belief in its truth, or (iii) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false. Although I have treated the second and third as distinct cases, I think the third is but an instance of the second, for one who makes a statement under such circumstances can have no real belief in the truth of what he states. To C prevent a false statement being fraudulent, there must, I think, always be an honest belief in its truth. And this probably covers the whole ground, for one who knowingly alleges that which is false has obviously no such belief. Thirdly, if fraud be proved, the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial. It matters not that there was no intention to cheat or injure the person to whom the statement was made.

I think these propositions embrace all that can be supported by decided cases D from the time of Pasley v. Freeman (4) down to Addie's Case (5) in 1867, when the first suggestion is to be found that belief in the truth of what he has stated will not suffice to absolve the defendant if his belief be based on no reasonable grounds. I have shown that this view was at once dissented from by LORD CRANWORTH, so that there was at the outset as much authority against it as E for it. And I have met with no further assertion of LORD CHELMSFORD'S view until Weir v. Bell (22), where it seems to be involved in COTTON, L.J.'s enunciation of the law of deceit. But no reason is there given in support of the view; it is treated as established law. The dictum of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., that a false statement made through carelessness, which the person making it ought to have known to be untrue, would sustain an action of deceit, carried the matter F still farther. But that such an action could be maintained notwithstanding an honest belief that the statement made was true, if there were no reasonable grounds for the belief, was, I think, for the first time decided in the case now under appeal. In my opinion, making a false statement through want of care falls far short of, and is a very different thing from fraud, and the same may be said of a false representation honestly believed though on insufficient grounds. G Indeed COTTON, L.J., himself indicated, in the words I have already quoted, that he should not call it fraud. But the whole current of authorities, with which I have so long detained your Lordships, shows to my mind conclusively that fraud is essential to found an action of deceit, and that it cannot be maintained where the acts proved cannot properly be so termed, and Taylor v. Ashton (19) appears to me to be in direct conflict with the dictum of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, H M.R., and inconsistent with the view taken by the learned judges in the court below. I observe that SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK, in his able work on TORTS (1st Edn. p. 243, n.), referring I presume to the dicta of COTTON, L.J., and SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., says that the actual decision in Taylor v. Ashton (19) is not consistent with the modern cases on the duty of directors of companies. I think he is right. But, for the reasons I have given, I am unable to hold that anything I less than fraud will render directors or any other persons liable to an action of deceit.

At the same time I desire to say distinctly that, when a false statement has been made, the questions whether there were reasonable grounds for believing it, and what were the means of knowledge in the possession of the person making it, are most weighty matters for consideration. The ground upon which an alleged belief was founded is a most important test of its reality. I can conceive many cases where the fact that an alleged belief was destitute of all reasonable founda-

A tion would suffice of itself to convince the court that it was not really entertained, and that the representation was a fraudulent one. So, too, although means of knowledge are, as was pointed out by LORD BLACKBURN in Brownlie v. Campbell (7), a very different thing from knowledge, if I thought that a person making a false statement had shut his eyes to the facts, or purposely abstained from inquiring into them, I should hold that honest belief was absent, and that he was just as fraudulent as if he had knowingly stated that which was false.

B I have arrived with some reluctance at the conclusion to which I have felt myself compelled, for I think those who put before the public a prospectus to induce them to embark their money in a commercial enterprise ought to be vigilant to see that it contains such representations only as are in strict accordance with fact, and I should be very unwilling to give any countenance to the contrary idea. I think there is much to be said for the view that this moral duty ought to some extent to be converted into a legal obligation, and that the want of reasonable care to see that statements, made under such circumstances, are true should be made an actionable wrong. But this is not a matter fit for discussion on the present occasion. If it is to be done, the legislature must intervene and expressly give a right of action in respect of such a departure from duty [see now Companies Act, 1948, s. 44 (3 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 452)]. It ought not, I think, to be done by straining the law, and holding that to be fraudulent which the tribunal feels cannot properly be so described. I think mischief is likely to result from blurring the distinction between carelessness and fraud, and equally holding a man fraudulent whether his acts can or cannot be justly so designated.

E It now remains for me to apply what I believe to be the law to the facts of the present case. The charge against the defendants is, that they fraudulently represented that by the special Act of Parliament which the company had obtained they had a right to use steam or other mechanical power instead of horses. The test which I purpose employing is to inquire whether the defendants knowingly made a false statement in this respect, or whether, on the contrary, they honestly believed what they stated to be a true and fair representation of the facts. Before considering whether the charge of fraud is proved, I may say that I approach the case of all the defendants except Wilde with the inclination to scrutinise their conduct with severity. They most improperly received sums of money from the promoters, and this unquestionably lays them open to the suspicion of being ready to put before the public whatever was desired by those who were promoting the undertaking. But I think this must not be unduly pressed, and when I find that the statement impeached was concurred in by one whose conduct in the respect I have mentioned was free from blame, one who was under no similar pressure, the case assumes, I think, a different complexion. I must further remark that the learned judge who tried the cause, and who tells us that he carefully watched the demeanour of the witnesses and scanned their evidence, came without hesitation to the conclusion that they were witnesses of truth, and that their evidence, whatever may be its effect, might safely be relied on. An opinion so formed ought not to be differed from except on very clear grounds, and after carefully considering the evidence, I see no reason to dissent from STIRLING, J.'s, conclusion. I shall, therefore, assume the truth of their testimony.

I I agree with the court below that the statement made did not accurately convey to the mind of a person reading it what the rights of the company were; but to judge whether it may nevertheless have been put forward without subjecting the defendants to the imputation of fraud, your Lordships must consider what were the circumstances. By the Tramways Act, 1870, it is provided that all carriages used on any tramway shall be moved by the power prescribed by the special Act, and where no such power is prescribed, by animal power only. In order, therefore, to enable the company to use steam power an Act of Parliament had to be obtained empowering its use. This had been done, but the power was clogged with the condition that it was only to be used with the consent of the Board of Trade. It was, therefore, incorrect to say that the company had the right to use steam; they would only have that right if they obtained the consent of the Board of Trade. But it is impossible not to see that the fact which would impress itself upon the minds of those connected with the company was that they had, after submitting the plans to the Board of Trade, obtained a special Act empowering the use of steam. It might well be that the fact that the consent of the Board of Trade was necessary would not dwell in the same way upon their minds if they thought that the consent of the Board would be obtained as a matter of course if its requirements were complied with, and that it was, therefore, a mere question of expenditure and care. The provision might seem to them analogous to that contained in the general Tramways Act of 1870, and I believe in the Railways Act also, prohibiting the line being opened until it had been inspected by the Board of Trade and certified fit for traffic, which no one would regard as a condition practically limiting the right to use the line for the purposes of a tramway or railway. I do not say that the two cases are strictly analogous in point of law, but they may well have been thought so by business men.

I turn now to the evidence of the defendants. I will take first that of Mr. Wilde, whose conduct in relation to the promotion of the company is free from suspicion. He is a member of the Bar and director of one of the London tramway companies. He states that he was aware that the consent of the Board of Trade was necessary, but that he thought that such consent had been practically given, inasmuch as, pursuant to the standing orders, the plans had been laid before the Board of Trade with the statement that it was intended to use mechanical as well as horse power, and, no objection having been raised by the Board of Trade and the Bill obtained, he took it for granted that no objection would be raised afterwards provided the works were properly carried out. He considered, therefore, that practically and substantially they had the right to use steam, and that the statement was perfectly true. Mr. Pethick's evidence is to much the same effect. He thought the Board of Trade had no more right to refuse their consent than they would have had in the case of a railway; that they might have required the making of additions or alterations, but that on any reasonable requirements being complied with they could not refuse their consent. It never entered his thoughts that, after the Board had passed their plans, with the knowledge that it was proposed to use steam, they would refuse their consent. Mr. Moore states that he was under the impression that the passage in the prospectus represented the effect of s. 35 of the Act, inasmuch as he understood that the consent was obtained. He so understood from the statements made at the Board by the solicitors to the company, to the general effect that everything was in order for the use of steam, that the Act had been obtained subject to the usual restrictions, and that they were starting as a tramway company with full power to use steam as other companies were doing. Mr. Wakefield, according to his evidence, believed that the statement in the prospectus was fair; he never had a doubt of it. It never occurred to him to say anything about the consent of the Board of Trade, because, as they had got the Act of Parliament for steam, he presumed at once that they would get it. Mr. Derry's evidence is somewhat confused, but I think the fair effect of it is that, though he was aware that under the Act the consent of the Board of Trade was necessary, he thought that, the company having obtained their Act, the Board's consent would follow as a matter of course, and that the question of such consent being necessary never crossed his mind at the time the prospectus was issued. He believed at that time it was correct to say they had the right to use steam.

As I have said, STIRLING, J., gave credit to these witnesses, and I see no reason to differ from him. What conclusion ought to be drawn from their evidence? I think they were mistaken in supposing that the consent of the

A Board of Trade would follow as a matter of course because they had obtained their Act. It was absolutely in the discretion of the Board whether such consent should be given. The prospectus was, therefore, inaccurate. But that is not the question. If they believed that the consent of the Board of Trade was practically concluded by the passing of the Act, has the plaintiff made out, which it was for him to do, that they have been guilty of a fraudulent misrepresentation? I think not. I cannot hold it proved as to any one of them that he knowingly made a false statement, or one which he did not believe to be true, or was careless whether what he stated was true or false. In short, I think they honestly believed that what they asserted was true, and I am of opinion that the charge of fraud made against them has not been established. It is not unworthy of note that, in his report to the Board of Trade, General Hutchinson, who was obviously aware of the provisions of the special Act, falls into the very same inaccuracy of language as is complained of in the defendants, for he says:

D I quite admit that the statements of witnesses as to their belief are by no means to be accepted blindfold; the probabilities must be considered. Whenever it is necessary to arrive at a conclusion as to the state of mind of another person, and to determine whether his belief under given circumstances was such as he alleges, we can only do so by applying the standard of conduct which our own experience of the ways of men has enabled us to form, and by asking ourselves whether a reasonable man would be likely under the circumstances so to believe. E I have applied this test, with the result that I have a strong conviction that a reasonable man situated as the defendants were, with their knowledge and means of knowledge, might well believe what they state they did believe and consider that the representation made was substantially true. Adopting the language of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Smith v. Chadwick (9) (20 Ch.D. at p. 67) I conclude F by saying that on the whole I have come to the conclusion that the statement, “though in some respects inaccurate and not altogether free from imputation of carelessness, was a fair, honest, and bona fide statement on the part of the defendants, and by no means exposes them to an action for deceit.”

I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed.

R. v. TOLSON

Criminal Law—Mens rea—Generally ingredient of criminal offence—Statute making act criminal without proof of mens rea—Construction—Defence to charge involving mens rea—Absence of guilty intention.

It is a principle of the criminal law that, ordinarily speaking, a crime is not committed if the mind of the person doing the allegedly criminal act is innocent. Generally, proof of mens rea is a necessary ingredient of an offence. The guilty intent is not necessarily that of intending the very act or thing done and prohibited by common or statute law, but it must at least be the intention to do something wrong. A statute may, however, be so framed as to make an act criminal whether there has been an intention to break the law or otherwise do wrong or not. Whether an Act is to be construed in this sense or with the qualification ordinarily imported into the construction of criminal statutes, namely, that there must be a guilty mind, must depend on the subject-matter of the Act and the circumstances of the case which may make the one construction or the other reasonable or unreasonable. It is within the competence of the legislature to enact that a man shall be branded as a felon and punished for doing an act which he honestly and reasonably believes to be lawful and right, but such a result seems so revolting to the moral sense that the clearest evidence is required that such is the meaning of the Act. At common law an honest and reasonable belief in the existence of circumstances which, if true, would make an act for which a person is indicted an innocent act, or proof that such a person had made an honest and reasonable mistake, has always been held to be a good defence to a charge involving the existence of mens rea, and the principle applies equally in the case of statutory offences unless it is excluded expressly or by necessary implication.

Criminal Law—Bigamy—Defence—Bona fide and reasonable belief in death of spouse—Meaning of proviso to Offences Against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict., c. 100), s. 57.

A bona fide belief, held on reasonable grounds, in the death of one party to a marriage is a defence to a charge of bigamy against the other party who has married again, whether or not the second marriage has taken place within the seven years prescribed by the proviso to s. 57 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861. That proviso is intended absolutely to exempt from the operation of the section (which provides that "whosoever, being married, shall marry any other person during the life of the former husband or wife . . . shall be guilty of felony") any person who does not have any actual knowledge of his or her former wife or husband being alive within seven years before the second marriage, and not to deprive a person who is indicted for bigamy of any defence which would have been open to him or her if the proviso had never been introduced at all.

Case Stated by STEPHEN, J., upon the trial of an indictment for bigamy, under s. 57 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861.

On July 6, 1888, at the assizes at Carlisle, Martha Ann Tolson was convicted before the learned judge of bigamy. On September 11, 1880, the accused was married to one Tolson. On Dec. 13, 1881, he deserted her. She and her father made inquiries about him, and learned from his elder brother, and from general report, that he had been lost on a vessel bound for America, which went down with all hands on board. On Jan. 10, 1887, the accused, supposing herself to be a widow, went through the ceremony of marriage with another man. The circumstances were well known to the second husband, and the ceremony was in no way concealed. In December, 1887, Tolson returned from America. STEPHEN, J., directed the jury that a belief in good faith and on reasonable grounds that her husband was dead would not be a defence to a charge of bigamy. He stated that, in so holding, his object was, if possible, to obtain the decision of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved on the point, as there were conflicting nisi prius decisions. The jury convicted the prisoner, stating, however, in answer to questions by the judge, that they thought that she in good faith, and on reasonable grounds, believed her husband to be dead at the time of her second marriage. The judge sentenced her to one day's imprisonment. The question for the court was whether the direction of the learned judge was right.

By s. 57 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861 :

"Whosoever, being married, shall marry any other person during the life of the former husband or wife . . . shall be guilty of felony. . . . Provided that nothing in this section contained shall extend to any . . . person marrying a second time whose husband or wife shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years then last past, and shall not have been known by such person to be living within that time. . . ."

No counsel appeared for the Crown.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 11, 1889. The following judgments were read, with the exception of that delivered orally by LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.

WILLS, J.—In this case the prisoner was convicted of bigamy. She married a second time within seven years of the time when she last knew of her husband being alive, but upon information of his death, which the jury found that she, upon reasonable grounds, believed to be true. A few months after the second marriage he re-appeared. The statute upon which the indictment was framed is the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, s. 57. There is no doubt that under the circumstances the prisoner falls within the very words of the statute. She, being married, married another person during the life of her former husband, and, when she did so, he had not been continually absent from her for the space of seven years then last past.

A It is, however, undoubtedly a principle of English criminal law, that, ordinarily speaking a crime is not committed if the mind of the person doing the act in question be innocent. LORD KENYON, C.J., said :

B “It is a principle of natural justice and of our law that actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea. The intent and act must both concur to constitute the crime :”

C Fowler v. Padget (1), 7 Term. Rep. at p. 514. The guilty intent is not necessarily that of intending the very act or thing done and prohibited by common or statute law, but it must at least be the intention to do something wrong. That may belong to one or other of two classes. It may be to do a thing wrong in itself and apart from positive law, or it may be to do a thing merely prohibited by statute or by common law, or both elements of intention may co-exist with respect to the same deed. There are many things prohibited by no statute—fornication or seduction for instance—which nevertheless no one would hesitate to call wrong, and the intention to do an act wrong in this sense at the least must, as a general rule, exist before the act done can be considered crime. Knowingly and intentionally to break a statute must, I think, from the judicial point of view, always be morally wrong in the absence of special circumstances applicable to the particular instance and excusing the breach of the law, as, for instance, if a municipal regulation be broken to save life or to put out a fire. But to make it morally right some such special matter of excuse must exist, inasmuch as the administration of justice, and, indeed, the foundations of civil society rest upon the principle that obedience to the law, whether it be a law approved of or disapproved of by the individual, is the first duty of a citizen.

E Although, prima facie and as a general rule, there must be a mind at fault before there can be a crime, it is not an inflexible rule, and a statute may relate to such a subject-matter and may be so framed as to make an act criminal whether there has been any intention to break the law or otherwise to do wrong or not. There is a large body of municipal law in the present day which is so conceived. Byelaws are constantly made regulating the width of thoroughfares, the height of buildings, the thickness of walls, and a variety of other matters necessary for the general welfare, health, or convenience, and such byelaws are enforced by the sanction of penalties, and the breach of them constitutes an offence, and is a criminal matter. In such cases it would, generally speaking, be no answer to proceedings for infringement of the byelaw that the person committing it had bona fide made an accidental miscalculation or an erroneous measurement. The Acts are properly construed as imposing the penalty when the act is done, no matter how innocently, and in such a case the substance of the enactment is that a man shall take care that the statutory direction is obeyed, and that if he fails to do so he does it at his peril.

H Whether an enactment is to be construed in this sense or with the qualification ordinarily imported into the construction of criminal statutes, that there must be a guilty mind, must, I think, depend upon the subject-matter of the enactment, and the various circumstances that may make the one construction or the other reasonable or unreasonable. There is no difference, for instance, in the kind of language used by Acts of Parliament which made the unauthorised possession of government stores a crime, and the language used in byelaws which say that if a man builds a house or a wall so as to encroach upon a space protected by the byelaw from building, he shall be liable to a penalty. Yet, in R. v. Sleep (2), it was held that a person in possession of government stores with the broad arrow could not be convicted when there was not sufficient evidence to show that he knew they were so marked, while the mere infringement of a building byelaw would entail liability to the penalty. There is no difference between the language by which it is said that a man shall sweep the snow from the pavement in front of his house before a given hour in the morning and if he fail to do so shall pay a penalty and that by which it is said that a man sending vitriol by railway shall mark the nature of the goods on the package on pain of forfeiting a sum of money; and yet, I suppose, that in the first case the penalty would attach if the thing were not done, while in the other case it has been held, in Hearne v. Garton (3), that where the sender had made reasonable inquiry and was tricked into the belief that the goods were of an innocent character, he could not be convicted, although he had in fact sent the vitriol not properly marked. A

There is no difference between the language by which it is enacted that "whosoever shall unlawfully and wilfully kill any pigeon under such circumstances as shall not amount to a larceny at common law" shall be liable to a penalty, and the language by which it is enacted that "if any person shall commit any trespass by entering any land in the daytime in pursuit of game," he shall be liable to a penalty, and yet, in the first case it has been held that his state of mind is material (Taylor v. Newman (4)) and in the second that it is immaterial (Watkins v. Major (5)). So, again, there is no difference in language between the enactments I have referred to in which the absence of a guilty mind was held to be a defence, and that of the statute which says that "any person who shall receive two or more lunatics" into any unlicensed house shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, under which the contrary has been held: R. v. Bishop (6). A statute provided that any clerk to justices who should, under colour and pretence of anything done by the justice or the clerk, receive a fee greater than that provided for by a certain table, should for every such offence forfeit £20. It was held that where a clerk to justices bona fide and reasonably but erroneously believed that there were two sureties bound in a recognisance besides the principal, and accordingly took a fee as for three recognisances when he was only entitled to charge for two, no action would lie for the penalty. LORD CAMPBELL said (in Bowman v. Blyth (7), 7 E. & B. at p. 43): C

"Actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea. Here the defendant very reasonably believing that there were two sureties bound, besides the principal, has not, by making a charge in pursuance of his belief, incurred the forfeiture. The language of the statute is 'for every such offence.' If, therefore, the table allowed him to charge for three recognisances where there are a principal and two sureties, he has not committed an offence under the Act": F
G

If identical language may thus be legitimately construed in two opposite senses, and is sometimes held to imply that there is and sometimes that there is not an offence when the guilty mind is absent, it is obvious that assistance must be sought aliunde, and that all circumstances must be taken into consideration which tend to show that the one construction or the other is reasonable, and among such circumstances it is impossible to discard the consequences. This is a consideration entitled to little weight if the words be incapable of more than one construction; but I have, I think, abundantly shown that there is nothing in the mere form of words used in the enactment now under consideration to prevent the application of what is certainly the normal rule of construction in the case of a statute constituting an offence entailing severe and degrading punishment. If the words are not conclusive in themselves, the reasonableness or otherwise of the construction contended for has always been recognised as a matter fairly to be taken into account. II
I

In a case in which a woman was indicted under s. 2 of the [repealed] Embezzlement of Public Stores Act, 1697, for having in her possession without a certificate from the proper authority government stores marked in the manner described in the Act, it was argued that by the Act the possession of the certificate was made the sole excuse, and that, as she had no certificate, she must be con-

A victed. FOSTER, J., said, however, that though the words of the statute seemed to exclude any other excuse, yet the circumstances must be taken into consideration, otherwise a law calculated for wise purposes might be made a handmaid to oppression, and directed the jury that, if they thought the defendant came into possession of the stores without any fraud or misbehaviour on her part, they ought to acquit her: FOSTER'S CROWN LAW (3rd Edn.), App., pp. 439, 440. B This ruling was adopted by LORD KENYON in R. v. Banks (8), who considered it beyond question that the defendant might excuse himself by showing that he came innocently into such possession, and treated the unqualified words of the statute as merely shifting the burden of proof and making it necessary for the defendant to show matter of excuse, and to negative the guilty mind instead of its being necessary for the Crown to show the existence of the guilty mind. C Prima facie the statute was satisfied when the case was brought within its terms, and it then lay upon the defendant to prove that the violation of the law which had taken place had been committed accidentally or innocently so far as he was concerned.

D Suppose a man had taken up by mistake one of two baskets exactly alike and of similar weight, one of which contained innocent articles belonging to himself and the other marked government stores, and was caught with the wrong basket in his hand. He would by his own act have brought himself within the very words of the statute. Who would think of convicting him? And yet what defence could there be except that his mind was innocent, and that he had not intended to do the thing forbidden by the statute? In Fowler v. Padget (1) the question was whether it was an act of bankruptcy for a man to depart from his dwelling-house whereby his creditors were defeated and delayed, although he had no intention of defeating and delaying them. The statute which constituted the act of bankruptcy was the [repealed] Bankrupts Act, 1603, which made it an act of bankruptcy (among other things) for a man to depart his dwelling-house "to the intent or whereby his creditors may be defeated and delayed." E The Court of King's Bench, consisting of LORD KENYON, C.J., and ASHURST and GROSE, JJ., held that there was no act of bankruptcy. LORD KENYON said (7 Term Rep. at p. 514):

"Bankruptcy is considered as a crime, and the bankrupt in the old laws is called an offender; but it is a principle of natural justice and of our law, that actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea." G

The court went so far as to read "and" in the statute, in place of "or," which is the word used in the Act, in order to avoid the consequences, which appeared to them unjust and unreasonable. In R. v. Banks (8), LORD KENYON referred to FOSTER, J.'s ruling in this case as that of "one of the best Crown lawyers that ever sat in Westminster Hall."

H These decisions of FOSTER, J., and LORD KENYON have been repeatedly acted upon: see R. v. Willmet (9), R. v. Cohen (10), R. v. Sleep (2), in the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved, R. v. O'Brien (11). In the present instance one consequence of holding that the offence is complete if the husband or wife is de facto alive at the time of the second marriage, although the defendant had, at the time of the second marriage, every I reason to believe the contrary, would be that, though the evidence of death should be sufficient to induce the Court of Probate to grant probate of the will or administration of the goods of the man supposed to be dead, or to prevail with the jury upon an action by the heir to recover possession of his real property, the wife of the person supposed to be dead, who had married six years and eleven months after the last time that she had known him to be alive, would be guilty of felony in case he should turn up twenty years afterwards. It would be scarcely less unreasonable to enact that those who had, in the meantime, distributed his personal estate, should be guilty of larceny. It seems to me to be a case to which it would not be improper to apply the language of LORD KENYON, when dealing with a statute which, literally interpreted, led to what he considered an equally preposterous result (Fowler v. Padgett (1), 7 Term Rep. at p. 514):

"I would adopt any construction of the statute that the words will bear, in order to avoid such monstrous consequences:"

Again, the nature and extent of the penalty attached to the offence may reasonably be considered. There is nothing that need shock any mind in the payment of a small pecuniary penalty by a person who has unwittingly done something detrimental to the public interest. To subject him, when what he has done has been nothing but what any well-disposed man would have been very likely to do under the circumstances, to the forfeiture of all his goods and chattels, which would have been one consequence of a conviction at the date of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, to the loss of civil rights, to imprisonment with hard labour, or even to penal servitude, is a very different matter; and such a fate seems properly reserved for those who have transgressed morally as well as unintentionally done something prohibited by law. I am well aware that the mischiefs which may result from bigamous marriages, however innocently contracted, are great; but I cannot think that the appropriate way of preventing them is to expose to the danger of a cruel injustice persons whose only error may be that of acting upon the same evidence as has appeared perfectly satisfactory to a Court of Probate, a tribunal emphatically difficult to satisfy in such matters, and certain only to act upon what appears to be the most cogent evidence of death. It is, as it seems to me, undesirable in the highest degree without necessity to multiply instances in which people shall be liable to conviction upon very grave charges when the circumstances are such that no judge in the kingdom would think of pronouncing more than a nominal sentence.

It is said, however, in respect of the offence now under discussion, that the proviso in s. 57 of the Act of 1861 that nothing in the section shall extend to any person marrying a second time whose husband or wife shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years last past, and shall not have been known by such person to be living within that time, points out the sole excuse of which the Act allows. I cannot see what necessity there is for drawing any such inference. It seems to me that it merely specifies one particular case, and indicates what in that case shall be sufficient to exempt the party, without any further inquiry, from criminal liability; and I think it is an argument of considerable weight, in this connection, that under s. 2 of the [repealed] Embezzlement of Public Stores Act, 1697, where a similar contention was founded upon the specification of one particular circumstance under which the possession of government stores should be justified, successive judges and courts have refused to accede to the reasoning, and have treated it, to use the words of LORD KENYON, as a matter that "could not bear a question" that the defendant might show in other ways that his possession was without fraud or misbehaviour on his part: R. v. Banks (8), 1 Esp. at p. 147.

Upon the point in question in the present case there are conflicting decisions. It was held by MARTIN, B., in R. v. Turner (12), and by CLEASBY, B., in R. v. Horton (13), that bona fide belief, at the time of the second marriage, upon reasonable grounds, that the first husband or wife was dead was a defence. In R. v. Gibbons (14) it is said that it was held by BRETT, J., after consulting WILLES, J., that such a belief was no defence. The report, however, is most unsatisfactory, as, if the facts were as there stated, there was no reasonable evidence of such belief upon any reasonable grounds, and in R. v. Prince (15) BRETT, J., gave a very elaborate judgment containing his matured and considered opinion upon a similar question, which it is quite impossible to reconcile with the supposed ruling in R. v. Gibbons (14). In R. v. Bennett (16), BRAMWELL, L.J., is

A reported to have followed R. v. Gibbons (14), and to have said that he always refused to act upon R. v. Turner (12). But here again the report is eminently unsatisfactory, for it proceeds to state that the prisoner was convicted of two other offences, forgery and obtaining money by false pretences, and sentenced to ten years' penal servitude, which is a greater sentence than he could have received for bigamy. Except for the purpose of bringing out the sort of man that the prisoner was, and so emphasising the fact that he deserved condign punishment, the bigamy trial might have been omitted. In R. v. Moore (17) DENMAN, J., after consultation with AMPHLETT, L.J., directed the acquittal of a woman charged with bigamy, the jury having found that, although seven years had not elapsed since she last knew that her husband was living, she had, when she married a second time, a reasonable and bona fide belief that he was dead—saying that in his opinion, and that of AMPHLETT, L.J., such a belief was a defence. He added, however, that his opinion was not to be taken as a final one; and that, had the circumstances been such that the prisoner would, if the conviction could be sustained, have deserved a substantial sentence, he should have directed a conviction and reserved the question.

D There is nothing, therefore, in the state of the authorities directly bearing upon the question to prevent one from deciding it upon the grounds of principle. It is suggested, however, that the important decision of the court of fifteen judges in R. v. Prince (15) is an authority in favour of a conviction in this case. I do not think so. In R. v. Prince (15) the prisoner was indicted under s. 55 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861 [see now s. 20 of Sexual Offences Act, 1956: 36 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 227] for

F The jury found that the prisoner bona fide believed, upon reasonable grounds, that she was eighteen. The court (dissentiente BRETT, J.) upheld the conviction. Two judgments were delivered by a majority of the court, in each of which several judges concurred, while three of them, DENMAN, J., POLLOCK, B., and QUAIN, J., concurred in both. The first of the two, being the judgment of nine judges, upheld the conviction upon the ground that, looking to the subject-matter of the enactment, to the group of sections among which it is found, and to the history of legislation on the subject, the intention of the legislature was that if a man took an unmarried girl under sixteen out of the possession of her father against his will, he must take his chance of whether any belief he might have about her age was right or wrong, and if he made a mistake upon this point so much the worse for him; he must bear the consequences. The second of the two judgments, being that of seven judges, gives a number of other reasons for arriving at the same conclusion, some of them founded upon the policy of the legislature as illustrated by other associated sections of the same Act. This judgment contains an emphatic recognition of the doctrine of the “guilty mind,” as an element, in general, of a criminal act, and supports the conviction upon the ground that the defendant, who believed the girl to be eighteen and not sixteen, even then, in taking her out of the possession of the father against his will was doing an act wrong in itself. “This opinion,” says the judgment, “gives full scope to the doctrine of the mens rea” (L.R. 2 C.C.R. at p. 175). R. v. Prince (15), therefore, is a direct and cogent authority for saying that the intention of the legislature cannot be decided upon simple prohibitory words, without reference to other considerations. The considerations relied upon in that case are wanting in the present case, while, as it seems to me, those which point to the application of the principle underlying a vast area of criminal enactment, that there can be no crime without a tainted mind preponderate greatly over any that point to its exclusion. In my opinion, therefore, this conviction ought to be quashed. CHARLES, J., authorises me to say that this judgment expresses his views as well as my own. A

CAVE, J.—In this case the prisoner was convicted of bigamy. She was married on Sept. 11, 1880, and was deserted by her husband on Dec. 13, 1881. From inquiries which she and her father made about him from his brother, she was led to believe that he had been lost in a vessel bound for America, which went down with all hands. In January, 1887, she married again, supposing herself to be a widow. Her first husband returned from America in December, 1887. The jury found that the prisoner in good faith, and on reasonable grounds, believed her husband to be dead at the time of her second marriage. At common law an honest and reasonable belief in the existence of circumstances, which, if true, would make the act for which a prisoner is indicted an innocent act, has always been held to be a good defence. This doctrine is embodied in the somewhat uncouth maxim, Actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea. Honest and reasonable mistake stands in fact on the same footing as absence of the reasoning faculty, as in infancy, or perversion of that faculty, as in lunacy. B

Instances of the existence of this common law doctrine will readily occur to the mind. So far as I am aware, it has never been suggested that these exceptions do not equally apply in the case of statutory offences unless they are excluded expressly or by necessary implication. In R. v. Prince (15), in which the principle of mistake underwent much discussion, it was not suggested by any of the judges that the exception of honest and reasonable mistake was not applicable to all offences, whether existing at common law or created by statute. As I understand the judgments in that case the difference of opinion was as to the exact extent of the exception, BRETT, J., the dissenting judge, holding that it applied wherever the accused honestly and reasonably believed in the existence of circumstances which, if true, would have made his act not criminal, while the majority of the judges seem to have held that in order to make the defence available in that case the accused must have proved the existence in his mind of an honest and reasonable belief in the existence of circumstances which, if they had really existed, would have made his act, not only not criminal, but also not immoral. Whether the majority held that the general exception is limited to cases where there is an honest belief not only in facts which would make the act not criminal, but also in facts which would make it not immoral, or whether they held that the general doctrine was correctly stated by BRETT, J., and that the further limitation was to be inferred from the language of the particular statute they were then discussing, is not very clear. It is immaterial in this case, as the jury have found that the accused honestly and reasonably believed in the existence of a state of circumstances, viz., in her first husband's death, which, had it really existed, would have rendered her act not only not criminal, but also not immoral. C

It is argued, however, that assuming the general exception to be as stated, yet the language of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, is such that that exception is necessarily excluded in this case. It is undoubtedly within the competence of the legislature to enact that a man shall be branded as a felon and punished for doing an act which he honestly and reasonably believes to be lawful and right, just as the legislature may enact that a child or a lunatic shall be punished criminally for an act which he has been led to commit by the immaturity or perversion of his reasoning faculty. But such a result seems so revolting to the moral sense that we ought to require the clearest and most indisputable evidence that such is the meaning of the Act. It is said that this inference necessarily arises from the language of the section in question, and particularly of the proviso. The section (omitting immaterial parts) is in these words: D

A in this section contained shall extend to any person marrying a second time whose husband or wife shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years then last past, and shall not have been known by such person to be living within that time."

B It is argued that the first part is expressed absolutely; but, surely, it is not contended that the language admits of no exception, and, therefore, that a lunatic who, under the influence of a delusion, marries again, must be convicted; and, if an exception is to be admitted where the reasoning faculty is perverted by disease, why is not an exception equally to be admitted where the reasoning faculty, although honestly and reasonably exercised, is deceived? But it is said that the proviso is inconsistent with the exception contended for; and, undoubtedly, if the proviso covers less ground or only the same ground as the exception, it follows that the legislature has expressed an intention that the exception shall not operate until after seven years from the disappearance of the first husband. But if, on the other hand, the proviso covers more ground than the general exception, surely it is no argument to say that the legislature must have intended that the more limited defence shall not operate within the seven years, because it has provided that a less limited defence shall only come into operation at the expiration of those years.

D What must the accused prove to bring herself within the general exception? She must prove facts from which the jury may reasonably infer that she honestly and on reasonable grounds believed her first husband to be dead before she married again. What must she prove to bring herself within the proviso?

E Simply that her husband has been continually absent for seven years; and, if she can do that, it will be no answer to prove that she had no reasonable grounds for believing him to be dead, or that she did not honestly believe it. Unless the prosecution can prove that she knew her husband to be living within the seven years she must be acquitted. The honesty or reasonableness of her belief is no longer in issue. Even if it could be proved that she believed him to be alive all the time, as distinct from knowing him to be so, the prosecution must fail. The proviso, therefore, is far wider than the general exception; and the intention of the legislature that a wider and more easily established defence should be open after seven years from the disappearance of the husband, is not necessarily inconsistent with the intention that a different defence, less extensive and more difficult of proof, should be open within the seven years. Some difficulty in seeing that the proviso is wider than the general exception has arisen from the establishment of the presumption of a man's death after he has not been heard of for seven years, and from the increased facilities for transmitting intelligence which are due to modern science.

G If we turn to the [repealed] Bigamy Act, 1603, the first statute which made bigamy an offence punishable by the courts of common law, we find an enactment

H substantially the same as that now in force:

"If any person being married do marry any person, the former husband or wife being alive, every such offence shall be felony, and the person offending shall suffer death: provided always that neither this Act nor anything therein contained shall extend to any person whose husband or wife shall

I absent him or herself, the one from the other by the space of seven years together in any part within his Majesty's dominion, the one of them not knowing the other to be living within that time."

When this Act was passed the presumption of a man's death after he had not been heard of for seven years had not been established. In Doe d. Knight v. Nepean (18) (5 B. & Ad. at p. 94), it is expressly stated by LORD DENMAN, C.J., that that period was adopted as the ground for such presumption in analogy to the statute of 1603, relating to bigamy, and the statute 18 & 19 Car. 2, c. 11, relating to the continuance of lives on which leases were held. In the absence of such presumption it would have been difficult at that time for the accused to prove, even when her husband had been away seven years, that she had reasonable grounds for believing him to be dead; while, on the other hand, if she had succeeded in satisfying judge and jury that she honestly so believed on reasonable grounds and had married in such belief after he had gone away six years only, if the contention on behalf of the Crown is right, the jury must have convicted her, and the judge must have sentenced her to death, for doing what they were satisfied she honestly and reasonably believed she had a perfect right to do. For these reasons I am of opinion that the conviction cannot be supported. In this judgment DAY, J., and A. L. SMITH, J., concur.

STEPHEN, J.—For the purpose of settling a question which had been debated for a considerable time, and on which I thought the decisions were conflicting, and not as the expression of my own opinion, I directed the jury at the trial of the accused woman that a belief in good faith and on reasonable grounds in the death of one party to a marriage was not a defence to the charge of bigamy against the other who married again within the seven years. I passed a nominal sentence on the accused, and I stated, for the decision of this court, a case which reserved the question whether my decision was right or wrong. I am of opinion that the conviction should be quashed, as the direction I gave was wrong, and that I ought to have told the jury that the defence raised for the prisoner was valid.

My view of the subject is based upon a particular application of the doctrine usually, though I think not happily, described by the phrase non est reus, nisi mens sit rea. Though this phrase is in common use, I think it most unfortunate, and not only likely to mislead, but actually misleading, on the following grounds. It naturally suggests that, apart from all particular definitions of crimes, such a thing exists as a mens rea, or "guilty mind," which is always expressly or by implication involved in every definition. This is obviously not the case, for the mental elements of different crimes differ widely. Mens rea means in the case of murder, malice aforethought; in the case of theft, an intention to steal; in the case of rape, an intention to have forcible connection with a woman, without her consent; and in the case of receiving stolen goods, knowledge that the goods were stolen. In some cases it denotes mere inattention. For instance, in the case of manslaughter by negligence it may mean forgetting to notice a signal. It appears confusing to call so many dissimilar states of mind by one name. It seems contradictory indeed to describe a mere absence of mind as a mens rea or guilty mind. The expression again is likely to and often does mislead. To an unlegal mind it suggests that by the law of England no act is a crime which is done from laudable motives, in other words, that immorality is essential to crime. It will, I think, be found that much of the discussion of the law of libel in R. v. Shipley (19) proceeds upon a more or less distinct belief to this effect. It is a topic frequently insisted upon in reference to political offences, and it was urged in a recent notorious case of abduction, in which it was contended that motives said to be laudable were an excuse for the abduction of a child from its parents.

Like most legal Latin maxims, the maxim on mens rea appears to me to be too short and antithetical to be of much practical value. It is, indeed, more like the title of a treatise than a practical rule. I have tried to ascertain its origin, but have not succeeded in doing so. It is not one of the regulae juris in the Digest. The earliest case of its use which I have found is in the LEGES HENRICI PRIMI, V. s. 28, in which it is said :

"Si quis per coaccionem abjurare cogatur quod per multos annos quiete tenuerit non in jurante set cogente perjurium erit. Reum non facit nisi mens rea."

In BROOM'S MAXIMS the earliest authority cited for its use is the THIRD INSTITUTE, ch. i., fo. 10. In this place it is contained in the marginal note, which says that

A when it was found that some of Sir John Oldcastle's adherents took part in an insurrection "pro timore mortis et quod recesserunt quam cito potuerunt" the judges held that this was to be adjudged no treason because it was for fear of death. COKE adds: "Et actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea." This is only COKE's own remark, and not part of the judgment. COKE's scraps of Latin in this, and the following chapters are sometimes contradictory. Notwithstanding the passage just

B quoted, he says in the margin of his remarks on opinions delivered in Parliament by THYRNING, and others in the 21st R. 2: "Melius est omnia mala patri quam malo consentire" (22-3) which would show that Sir John Oldcastle's associates had a mens rea, or guilty mind, though they were threatened with death, and thus contradicts the passage first quoted. It is singular that in each of these instances the maxim should be used in connection with the law relating to coercion.

C The principle involved appears to me, when fully considered, to amount to no more than this. The full definition of every crime contains expressly or by implication a proposition as to a state of mind. Therefore, if the mental element of any conduct alleged to be a crime is proved to have been absent in any given case, the crime so defined is not committed; or, again, if a crime is fully defined, nothing amounts to that crime which does not satisfy that definition. Crimes are in the

D present day much more accurately defined by statute or otherwise than they formerly were. The mental element of most crimes is marked by one of the words "maliciously," "fraudulently," "negligently," or "knowingly," but it is the general—I might, I think, say the invariable—practice of the legislature to leave unexpressed some of the mental elements of crime. In all cases whatever, competent age, sanity, and some degree of freedom from some kinds of coercion are

E assumed to be essential to criminality, but I do not believe they are ever introduced into any statute by which any particular crime is defined. The meaning of the words "malice," "negligence," and "fraud" in relation to particular crimes has been ascertained by numerous cases. Malice means one thing in relation to murder; another in relation to the Malicious Mischief Act [? Malicious Damage Act, 1861], and a third in relation to libel, and so of fraud and negligence.

F With regard to knowledge of fact, the law, perhaps, is not quite so clear, but it may, I think, be maintained that in every case knowledge of facts is to some extent an element of criminality as much as competent age and sanity. To make an extreme illustration, can any one doubt that a man who, though he might be perfectly sane, committed what would otherwise be a crime in a state of somnambulism, would be entitled to be acquitted? And why is this? Simply because he would not

G know what he was doing. A multitude of illustrations of the same sort might be given. I will mention one or two glaring ones. Levett's Case (20) decides that a man who making a thrust with a sword at a place where, upon reasonable grounds, he supposes a burglar to be, killed a person who was not a burglar was held not to be a felon though he might be (it was not decided that he was) guilty of killing per infortunium, or possibly, se defendendo, which then involved certain forfeitures.

H In other words, he was in the same situation as far as regarded the homicide as if he had killed a burglar. In the decision of the judges in M'Naghten's Case (21), it is stated that if under an insane delusion one man kills another and if the delusion was such that it would, if true, justify or excuse the killing, the homicide would be justified or excused. This could hardly be if the same were not law as to a sane mistake. A bona fide claim of right excuses larceny, and many of the offences

I against the Malicious Mischief Act [? Malicious Damage Act, 1861]. Apart, indeed from the present case, I think it may be laid down as a general rule that an alleged offender is deemed to have acted under that state of facts which he in good faith and on reasonable grounds believed to exist when he did the act alleged to be an offence. I am unable to suggest any real exception to this rule, nor has one ever been suggested to me.

A very learned person suggested to me the following case. A constable, reasonably believing a man to have committed murder, is justified in killing him to prevent his escape, but if he had not been a constable he would not have been so justified, but would have been guilty of manslaughter [see 10 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 709]. This is quite true, but the mistake in the second case would be not only a mistake of fact, but a mistake of law on the part of the homicide in supposing that he, a private person, was justified in using as much violence as a public officer, whose duty is to arrest, if possible, a person reasonably suspected of murder. The supposed homicide would be in the same position as if his mistake of fact had been true; that is, he would be guilty, not of murder, but of manslaughter. I think, therefore, that the present case falls under the general rule as to mistakes of fact, and that the conviction ought to be quashed.

I will now proceed to deal with the arguments which are supposed to lead to the opposite result. It is said, first, that the words of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, s. 57, are absolute, and that the exceptions which that section contains are the only ones which are intended to be admitted, and this it is said is confirmed by the express proviso in the section—an indication which is thought to negative any tacit exception. It is also supposed that R. v. Prince (15) decided on s. 55, confirms this view. I will begin by saying how far I agree with these views. First, I agree that the case turns exclusively upon the construction of s. 57 of the Act of 1861. Much was said to us in argument on the old statute, the Bigamy Act, 1603. I cannot see what this has to do with the matter. Of course, it would be competent to the legislature to define a crime in such a way as to make the existence of any state of mind immaterial. The question is solely whether it has actually done so in this case. In the first place I will observe upon the absolute character of the section. It appears to me to resemble most of the enactments contained in the consolidation Acts of 1861, in passing over the general mental elements of crime which are pre-supposed in every case. Age, sanity, and more or less freedom from compulsion, are always presumed, and I think it would be impossible to quote any statute which in any case specifies these elements of criminality in the definition of any crime. It will be found that either by using the words wilfully and maliciously, or by specifying some special intent as an element of particular crimes, knowledge of fact is implicitly made part of the statutory definition of most modern definitions of crimes, but there are some cases in which this cannot be said. Such are s. 55, on which R. v. Prince (15) was decided, s. 56, which punishes the stealing of "any child under the age of fourteen years," s. 49, as to procuring the defilement of any "woman or girl under the age of twenty-one," in each of which the same question might arise as in R. v. Prince (15). To these I may add some of the provisions of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 [repealed by Sexual Offences Act, 1956]. Reasonable belief that a girl is sixteen or upwards is a defence to the charge of an offence under ss. 5, 6, and 7, but this is not provided for as to an offence against s. 4, which is meant to protect girls under thirteen.

It seems to me that as to the construction of all these sections R. v. Prince (15) is a direct authority. It was the case of a man who abducted a girl under sixteen, believing, on good grounds, that she was above that age. BRETT, J., was against the conviction. His judgment establishes at much length, and, as it appears to me, unanswerably, the principle above explained, which he states as follows (L.R. 2 C.C.R. at p. 170):

"That a mistake of facts on reasonable grounds, to the extent that, if the facts were as believed, the acts of the prisoner would make him guilty of no offence at all, is an excuse, and that such an excuse is implied in every criminal charge and every criminal enactment in England."

LORD BLACKBURN, with whom nine other judges agreed, and LORD BRAMWELL, with whom seven others agreed, do not appear to me to have dissented from this principle, speaking generally; but they held that it did not apply fully to each part of every section to which I have referred. Some of the prohibited acts they thought the legislature intended to be done at the peril of the person who did them, but not

A all. The judgment delivered by LORD BLACKBURN proceeds upon the principle that the intention of the legislature in s. 55 was "to punish the abduction unless the girl was of such an age as to make her consent an excuse." LORD BRAMWELL'S judgment proceeds upon this principle (ibid. at p. 175) :

B "The legislature has enacted that if any one does this wrong act, he does it at the risk of her turning out to be under sixteen. This opinion gives full scope to the doctrine of mens rea. If the taker believed he had her father's consent, though wrongly, he would have no mens rea; so if he did not know she was in anyone's possession nor in the care or charge of any one. In those cases he would not know he was doing the act forbidden by the statute."

C All the judges, therefore, in R. v. Prince (15) agreed on the general principle, though they all, except BRETT, J., considered that, the object of the legislature being to prevent a scandalous and wicked invasion of parental rights (whether it was to be regarded as illegal apart from the statute or not), it was to be supposed that they intended that the wrongdoer should act at his peril.

D As another illustration of the same principle, I may refer to R. v. Bishop (6). The defendant in that case was tried before me for receiving more than two lunatics into a house not duly licensed, upon an indictment on the [repealed] Lunacy Act, 1845, s. 44. It was proved that the defendant did receive more than two persons, whom the jury found to be lunatics, into her house, believing honestly, and on reasonable grounds, that they were not lunatics. I held that this was immaterial, having regard to the scope of the Act, and the object for which it was apparently passed, and this court upheld that ruling. The application of this to the present case appears to me to be as follows. The general principle is clearly in favour of the prisoner, but how does the intention of the legislature appear to have been against her? It could not be the object of Parliament to treat the marriage of widows as an act to be, if possible, prevented as presumably immoral. The conduct of the woman convicted was not in the smallest degree immoral, it was perfectly natural and legitimate. Assuming the fact to be as she supposed, the infliction of more than a nominal punishment on her would have been a scandal. Why, then, should the legislature be held to have wished to subject her to punishment at all? If such a punishment is legal, the following among many other cases might occur: A number of men in a mine are killed, and their bodies are disfigured and mutilated, by an explosion; one of the survivors secretly absconds, and it is supposed that one of the disfigured bodies is his. His wife sees his supposed remains buried; she marries again. I cannot believe that it can have been the intention of the legislature to make such a woman a criminal; the contracting of an invalid marriage is quite misfortune enough. It appears to me that every argument which showed, in the opinion of the judges in R. v. Prince (15), that the legislature meant seducers and abductors to act at their peril, shows that the legislature did not mean to hamper what is not only intended, but naturally and reasonably supposed by the parties, to be a valid and honourable marriage, with a liability to seven years' penal servitude.

H It is argued that the proviso, that a re-marriage after seven years' separation shall not be punishable, operates as a tacit exclusion of all other exceptions to the penal part of the section. It appears to me that it only supplies a rule of evidence which is useful in many cases, in the absence of explicit proof of death. But it seems to me to show, not that belief in the death of one married person excuses the marriage of the other only after seven years' separation, but that mere separation for that period has the effect which reasonable belief of death, caused by other evidence, would have at any time. It would, to my mind, be monstrous to say that seven years' separation should have a greater effect in excusing a bigamous marriage than positive evidence of death, sufficient for the purpose of recovering on a policy of assurance or obtaining probate of a will, A would have, as in the case I have put, or in others which might be even stronger.

It remains only to consider cases upon this point decided by single judges. As far as I know there are reported the following cases:—R. v. Turner (12) (1862). In this case MARTIN, B., is reported to have said (9 Cox, C.C. at p. 145):

“In this case seven years had not elapsed, and beyond the prisoner’s own B statement there was the mere belief of one witness. Still the jury are to say if upon such testimony she had an honest belief that her first husband was dead.”

In R. v. Horton (13) (1871) CLEASBY, B., directed the jury that if the prisoner reasonably believed his wife to be dead he was entitled to be acquitted. He was C convicted. In R. v. Gibbons (14) (1872), BRETT, J., after consulting WILLES, J., said (12 Cox, C.C. at p. 238): “Bona fide belief as to the husband’s death was no defence unless the seven years had elapsed,” and he refused to state a Case, a decision which I cannot reconcile with his judgment three years afterwards in R. v. Prince (15). In R. v. Moore (17) (1877) DENMAN, L.J., after consulting AMPHLETT, L.J., held that a bona fide and reasonable belief in a husband’s death D excused a woman charged with bigamy. In R. v. Bennett (16) (1877) LORD BRAMWELL agreed with the decision in R. v. Gibbons (14). The result is that the decisions in R. v. Gibbons (14) and R. v. Bennett (16) conflict with those of R. v. Turner (12), R. v. Horton (13) and R. v. Moore (17). I think, therefore, that these five decisions throw little light on the subject. The conflict between them was in fact the reason why I reserved the case. GRANTHAM, J., E authorises me to say that he concurs in this judgment.

HAWKINS, J.—The Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, s. 57, enacts:

“Whosoever, being married, shall marry any other person during the lifetime of the former husband or wife, shall be guilty of felony.” F

Undoubtedly the defendant, being married, did marry another person during the life of her former husband. But she did so believing in good faith and upon reasonable grounds that her first husband was dead; and the sole question now raised is whether such belief afforded her a valid legal defence against the indictment for bigamy upon which she was tried.

I am clearly of opinion that it did, and that she ought to have been acquitted. G
The ground upon which I have arrived at this conclusion is simply that, having contracted her second marriage under an honest and reasonable belief in the existence of a state of things which, if true, would have afforded her a complete justification, both legally and morally, there was an absence of that mens rea which is an essential element in every charge of felony. In HAWKINS, P. C., book 1, c. 25, s. 3, OF FELONY, it is said: H

In HALE’S P. C., vol. 2, p. 184, it is said:

“an indictment of felony must always allege the fact to be done felonice.” I

To the same effect is the language of HAWKINS, P. C., book 2, c. 25, s. 55, and many cases are to be found in the books which put it beyond doubt that an indictment for felony is bad if it omits to aver the act charged to have been done “feloniously,” and this whether the felony be one at common law or created by statute: R. v. Gray (22) [but see now Indictments Act, 1915; 5 HALSBURY’S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 993]. As to the meaning of the term “feloniously” I do not think I can better define my understanding of it when introduced into an indictment as descriptive of the act charged than by saying that I look upon it as meaning that

A such act was done with a mind bent on doing that which is wrong, or, as it has been sometimes said, with a guilty mind. As to this I may refer to HAWKINS, P. C., c. 7, s. 1, where it is said that the term "felony" ex vi termini signifies "Quodlibet crimen felleo animo perpetratum."

B In support of this view a whole list of authorities might be quoted. I shall, however, content myself by citing the most recent of them, viz. R. v. Prince (15), in which most of the cases bearing on the subject are very carefully reviewed by BRETT, J., whose language I cheerfully adopt as expressive of my own views touching the principles of law which govern such questions as that now before us. He says (L.R. 2 C.C.R. at p. 162):

C "It would seem that there must be proof to satisfy a jury ultimately that there was a criminal mind, or mens rea, in every offence really charged as a crime . . . in some cases the proof of the committal of the acts may prima facie, either by reason of their own nature, or by reason of the form of statute, import the proof of the mens rea. But even in those cases it is open to the prisoner to rebut the prima facie evidence, so that if in the end the jury are satisfied that there was no criminal mind, or mens rea, there cannot be a conviction in England for that which is by the law considered to be a crime."

D In this view of the law, so stated by BRETT, J., all the other judges, fifteen in number, before whom the matter was heard, practically acquiesced. They differed, however, in the application of the law to the facts of the particular case, BRETT, J., thinking that there was in the prisoner no such mens rea as was necessary to constitute a crime; the rest of the court thinking that the act of abduction of which the prisoner was guilty, being a morally wrong act, afforded abundant proof of his criminal mind.

E It has, however, been suggested that the intention of the legislature to make a second marriage during the life of the former husband or wife a crime, whatever F may have been the circumstances attending it, unless the case is brought within the proviso which follows in the same section, is proved by the introduction of that proviso, which runs as follows:

G "Provided that nothing in this section contained shall extend to any person marrying a second time whose husband or wife shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years then last past and shall not have been known by such person to be living within that time."

H I cannot take that view of the proviso. It seems to me to be far more reasonable to look upon that portion of the section as intended simply and absolutely to exempt from the operation of it any person who should not have had actual knowledge of his or her former wife or husband being alive within seven years before the second marriage, and not to deprive a person indicted for bigamy of any defence which would have been open to him or her had the proviso never been introduced at all. I cannot for a moment suppose that the legislature ever contemplated that a woman who within seven years from the day she last knew her husband to be living, bona fide trusting and relying upon a body of evidence I overwhelmingly sufficient to satisfy the best of judges and juries that he was dead, and honestly believing upon such evidence that he was so, married again, feeling that in so doing she was doing a perfectly legal and moral act, should nevertheless be liable to be indicted for the felony of bigamy, and convicted and condemned to a long term of penal servitude, upon mere proof that, though honestly and reasonably believed by her to be dead, her former husband was in fact alive.

A thousand illustrations to demonstrate the cruelty and injustice of such a state of the law might be suggested, but I cannot think that even one is necessary.

If the views of those who support this conviction could be upheld, no person could with absolute certainty of immunity marry a second time until seven years had elapsed after the supposed death of a former husband or wife, no matter how strong and cogent the proof of such death might be. I do not think it will assist in the solution of the question to refer to the conflicting opinions of single judges upon the point, beyond calling attention to the fact that R. v. Gibbons (14), in which BRETT, J. (after consulting WILLES, J.), ruled that such circumstances as are relied on in the present case afforded no defence, occurred in the year 1872, whereas R. v. Prince (15), in which the same learned judge delivered the judgment to which I have referred, was not decided till three years later. After the latter judgment I doubt if that learned judge would have adhered to the opinion expressed by him in the year 1872. I am, for the reasons above expressed, of opinion that the conviction ought to be reversed.

MANISTY, J.—I am of opinion that the conviction should be affirmed. The question is, whether if a married woman marries another man during the life of her first husband and within seven years of his leaving her she is guilty of felony, the jury having found as a fact that she had reason to believe and did honestly believe that her first husband was dead. Section 57 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, is as express and as free from ambiguity as words can make it. It does not say if the accused shall feloniously or unlawfully or knowingly commit the act he or she shall be guilty of felony, but the enactment is couched in the clearest language that could be used to prohibit the act and to make it a felony if the act is committed. If any doubt could be entertained on the point it seems to me the proviso which follows the enactment ought to remove it. Such being the plain language of the Act, it is, in my opinion, the imperative duty of the court to give effect to it, and to leave it to the legislature to alter the law if it thinks it ought to be altered. Probably, if the law was altered, some provision would be made in favour of children of the second marriage. If the second marriage is to be deemed to be legal for one purpose, surely it ought to be deemed legal as to the children who are the offspring of it. If it be within the province of the court to consider the reasons which induced the legislature to pass the Act as it is, it seems to me one principal reason is on the surface, namely, the consequence of a married person marrying again in the lifetime of his or her first wife or husband, in which case it might and in many cases would be that several children of the second marriage would be born and all would be bastards. The proviso is evidently founded upon the assumption that after the lapse of seven years and the former husband or wife not being heard of, it may reasonably be inferred that he or she is dead, and thus the mischief of a second marriage in the lifetime of the first husband or wife is to a great extent, if not altogether, avoided.

It is to be borne in mind that bigamy never was a crime at common law. It has been the subject of several Acts of Parliament, and is now governed by s. 57 of the Act of 1861. No doubt, in construing a statute the intention of the legislature is what the court has to ascertain, but the intention must be collected from the language used, and where that language is plain and explicit and free from all ambiguity, as it is in the present case, I have always understood that it is the imperative duty of judges to give effect to it. The cases of insanity, etc., on which reliance is placed, stand on a totally different principle, viz., that of an absence of mens rea. Ignorance of the law is no excuse for the violation of it, and if a person chooses to run the risk of committing a felony he or she must take the consequences if it turn out that a felony has been committed.

Great stress is laid by those who hold that the conviction should be quashed upon the circumstance that the crime of bigamy is by the statute declared to be a felony and punishable with penal servitude or imprisonment with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding two years. If the crime had been declared

A to be a misdemeanour punishable with fine or imprisonment, surely the construction of the statute would have been, or ought to have been, the same. It may well be that the legislature declared it to be a felony to deter married persons from running the risk of committing the crime of bigamy, and in order that a severe punishment might be inflicted in cases where there were no mitigating circumstances. No doubt circumstances may and do affect the sentence, B even to the extent of the punishment being nominal, as it was in the present case, but that is a very different thing from disregarding and contravening the plain words of the Act of Parliament.

The case is put by some of my learned brothers of a married man leaving his wife and going into a foreign country intending to settle there, and it may be afterwards to send for his wife and children, and the ship in which he goes C is lost in a storm with, as is supposed, all on board, and after the lapse of say a year and no tidings received of anyone having been saved, the underwriters pay the insurance on the ship, the supposed widow gets probate of her husband's will, marries, and has children, and after the lapse of several years the husband appears, it may be a few days before seven years have expired, and the question is asked: Would it not be shocking that in such a case the wife could be found D guilty of bigamy? My answer is that the Act of Parliament says in clear and express words, for very good reasons as I have already pointed out, that she is guilty of bigamy. The only shocking fact would be that someone for some purpose of his own had instituted the prosecution. I need not say that no Public Prosecutor would ever think of doing so, and the judge before whom the case came on for trial would, as my brother STEPHEN did in the present case, pass E a nominal sentence of a day's imprisonment (which in effect is immediate discharge) accompanied, if I were the judge, with a disallowance of the costs of the prosecution. It may be said, but the woman is put to some trouble and expense in appearing before the magistrate, who would of course take nominal bail, and in appearing to take her trial. Be it so; but such a case would be F very rare indeed. On the other hand, see what a door would be opened to collusion and mischief if in the vast number of cases where men in humble life leave their wives and go abroad it would be a good defence for a woman to say and give proof, which the jury believed, that she had been informed by some person upon whom she honestly thought she had reason to rely, and did believe, that her husband was dead, whereas in fact she had been imposed upon and her husband was alive.

G What operates strongly on my mind is that, if the legislature intended to prohibit a second marriage in the lifetime of a husband or wife, and to make it a crime, subject to the proviso as to seven years, I do not believe that language more apt or precise could be found to give effect to that intention than the language contained in s. 57 of the Act of 1861. In this view I am fortified by H several sections of the same Act, where the words "unlawfully" and "maliciously and unlawfully" are used (as in s. 23), by a comparison of them with the section in question (s. 57), where no such words are to be found. I especially rely upon s. 55, by which it is enacted that

I "whosoever shall unlawfully [a word not used in s. 57] take or cause to be taken any unmarried girl, being under the age of sixteen years, out of the possession and against the will of her father or mother or any other person having the lawful care or charge of her, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour."

Fifteen out of sixteen judges held in R. v. Prince (15) that, notwithstanding the use of the word "unlawfully," the fact of the prisoner believing, and having reason to believe, that the girl was over sixteen afforded no defence. This decision is approved of upon the present occasion by five judges, making in all twenty against the nine who are in favour of quashing the conviction. To the twenty

I may, I think, fairly add TINDAL, C.J., in R. v. Robins (23) and WILLES, J., in R. v. Mycock (24). A

I rely also very much upon s. 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, passed for the better protection of women and girls, by which it was enacted :

“any person who unlawfully and carnally knows . . . any girl being of or above the age of thirteen years and under sixteen years . . . shall be guilty of a misdemeanour,” B

but to that is added a proviso that

“it shall be a sufficient defence . . . if it shall be made to appear to the court or jury before whom the charge shall be brought that the person so charged had reasonable cause to believe that the girl was of or above the age of sixteen years” : C

[see now Sexual Offences Act, 1961, s. 6: 36 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 219]. It is to be observed that, notwithstanding the word “unlawfully” appears in this section, it was considered necessary to add the proviso, without which it would have been no defence that the accused had reasonable cause to believe and did believe that the girl was of or above the age of sixteen. Those who hold that the conviction in the present case should be quashed really import into s. 57 of the Act of 1861 the proviso which is in s. 5 of the Act of 1885, contrary, as it seems to me, to the decision in R. v. Prince (15), and to the hitherto undisputed canons for construing a statute. It is said that an indictment for the offence of bigamy commences by stating that the accused feloniously married, etc., and consequently the principle of mens rea is applicable. To this I answer that it is to the language of the Act of Parliament, and not to that of the indictment, the court have to look. I consider the indictment would be perfectly good if it stated that the accused, being married, married again in the lifetime of his or her wife or husband contrary to the statute, and so was guilty of felony. I am very sorry we had not the advantage of having the case argued by counsel on behalf of the Crown. My reason for abstaining from commenting upon the cases cited by counsel for the accused is because the difference of opinion among some of the judges in those cases is as nothing compared with the solemn decision of fifteen out of sixteen judges in R. v. Prince (15). So far as I am aware, in none of the cases cited by my learned brothers was the interest of third parties, such as the fact of there being children of the second marriage, involved. I have listened with attention to the judgments which have been delivered, and I have not heard a single observation with reference to this, to my mind, important and essential point. I am absolutely unable to distinguish R. v. Prince (15) from the present case, and looking to the names of the eminent judges who constituted the majority, and to the reasons given in their judgments, I am of opinion, upon authority as well as principle, that the conviction should be affirmed. The only observation which I wish to make is (speaking for myself only), that I agree with my learned brother STEPHEN in thinking that the phrases “mens rea” and “non est reus nisi mens sit rea” are not of much practical value, and are not only “likely to mislead,” but are “absolutely misleading.” Whether they have had that effect in the present case on the one side or the other it is not for me to say. I think the conviction should be affirmed. My brothers, DENMAN, J., I POLLOCK, B., FIELD, J., and HUDDLESTON, B., agree with this judgment, but DENMAN, J., has written a short opinion of his own, with which FIELD, J., agrees. DENMAN, J. (read by MANISTY, J.)—Having done my best to form a correct judgment as to the real intention of the statute on which the question turns, I have come to the conclusion, notwithstanding the reasons which have been given to the contrary, that it was intended to provide, and does provide, that any

A person who marries another (his or her wife or husband, as the case may be, being at the time alive) does so at his or her peril, and can only make good a defence to a prosecution for bigamy by proving a continuous absence for seven years; and that even such an absence will not be a defence if the prosecution can prove knowledge on the part of the accused within seven years of the second marriage that the first wife or husband, as the case may be, was still alive. I am desired by my brother FIELD to add that he agrees in this view, but that he also agrees with me that it is not necessary to give any detailed reasons for dissenting from the judgment of the majority.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—At the conclusion of the arguments in this case I was one of those who was inclined to dissent from the opinion of the majority, and if the statute had not contained the proviso which it does contain, I should not have at that time dissented from that opinion. My reasons were—as has been very well put by the judges who differ from the conclusion at which I have now arrived—that the enactment of the statute being positive, and there being in the very same section a proviso limiting the positiveness of that construction, the whole section must be read together, as if it lay upon the prosecution to show that the case did not lie within the proviso. If that were so, I should have maintained my opinion, and I am very far indeed from saying that there is no considerable ground and reason for maintaining that view. But I have had the great advantage of reading the judgment of my brother CAVE in this case, and I have found myself unable to answer satisfactorily to my own mind the view which he puts forward as to the effect of the proviso upon the positive enactment of the statute. If there had been no proviso, I confess I should have thought that this statute was to be read like any other statute, and that it was to be shown, or evidence was to be given, of the felonious intention with which the act in question was performed. That might be an inference to be drawn from the mere fact of the marriage being contracted, but it might also well be an inference that might be rebutted, as it might in any other case, by the distinct and absolute proof that the intention to violate the statute—I do not mean the intention to do the particular act, and the intention to violate any particular statute, but what has been defined, and for all purposes sufficiently defined, as the mens rea—existed in the person who was indicted. If that had been so, I should have thought at the beginning that the majority were right. I did not think so for the reason that I have given. I am unable to answer the view of the proviso which has been put forward by my brother CAVE, and I have, therefore, perhaps with some reluctance, come to the conclusion that the reasoning of the judgment of the majority is in this case correct. I think it desirable to all, that, as far as I understand, none of the learned judges in this case differs from the judgments in R. v. Prince (15). I certainly have no intention of differing from those judgments. An effort has been made, apparently not satisfactory to my brother MANISTY, to distinguish this case from R. v. Prince (15); but it would be unbecoming in a single judge, and unbecoming in any judge, to presume to overrule the decision arrived at by so powerful a court, by a single—no doubt very able—dissenting judge. I accept it, in my view of it, as fully as my learned brother, and I believe that all my learned brethren would concur with me in saying that, though they may perhaps be wrong in taking the view of that decision that they do take (nobody can be infallible), they intend to accept the decision of the majority of the judges in R. v. Prince (15). I am, therefore, of opinion that this conviction should be quashed.

Company—Shares—Purchase by company of its own shares—Legality—Legality of forfeiture and surrender of shares.

A company formed and registered under the Companies Acts has no power to purchase its own shares even though authority to do so is conferred by its memorandum or articles of association. Persons who deal with and give credit to a limited company rely on the fact that the company is trading with a certain amount of capital already paid and also on the responsibility of its members for the capital remaining at call, and they are entitled to assume that no part of the capital which has been paid into the coffers of the company has been paid out except in the legitimate course of business. This does not affect the legality of the forfeiture or surrender of shares, for when a share is forfeited or surrendered the amount which has been paid for it remains with the company and is not returned to the shareholder, and so the capital of the company is not reduced.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (COTTON, BOWEN, and FRY, L.J.J.) reversing an order of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster (BRISTOWE, Q.C.), made in the winding-up of a company named "James Schofield and Sons, Ltd."

The company in question was formed in 1865 to take over the business of James Schofield & Sons, flannel manufacturers, of Rochdale. By the articles of association the company were empowered to purchase their own shares for the purpose of selling them again or of extinguishing them, but no such power was given by the memorandum of association. In May, 1880, the company bought from the respondents shares of the value of £3,305, of which a sum of £2,800 was allowed by the latter to remain in the hands of the company as a loan, bearing interest at 5 per cent. per annum. In May, 1884, an order of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster was made for the voluntary winding-up of the company, and later the liquidators objected to the respondents ranking as creditors for the sum of £2,800, the amount standing to their credit in the books of the company in respect of the purchase money of their shares. The Vice-Chancellor held that the respondents were not entitled to rank as creditors in respect of that sum, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal. The liquidators appealed to the House of Lords.

Romer, Q.C., and Maberley for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

July 11, 1887. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL.—Three questions are raised by this appeal: First, whether certain shares in James Schofield & Sons, Ltd., were purchased by G. W. Schofield on his own account or as agent for the company; secondly, whether, assuming that they were purchased for the company, and that the company had power to buy its own shares, the purchase had taken place in accordance with the articles of association; and, thirdly, whether the company had power to purchase the shares.

James Schofield & Sons, Ltd., was incorporated under the Companies Acts on May 31, 1865, with a capital of £150,000, in 15,000 shares of £10 each. At an extraordinary general meeting of shareholders of the company on May 6, 1884, it was resolved that the company should be wound-up voluntarily, and on May 15 following it was ordered by the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine that the voluntary winding-up should be continued under the supervision of the court. By an affidavit filed on Oct. 1, 1884, the respondents claimed from the company in the winding-up £2,873 12s. A summons was taken out by the appellants for the purpose of determining whether this claim ought to be allowed. Upon the hearing of this summons the claim was rejected by the Vice-Chancellor, but upon appeal this decision was reversed. On May 1, 1880, G. W. Schofield had bought from the respondents, who were the executors of Robert Whitworth, a deceased shareholder, 533 shares in the company (28 fully paid up, 500 with £6 paid, and five with £5 paid) for the price of £3,305, the purchase money to be paid within three years then next, at such time as the buyers should appoint, and interest at 5 per cent. to be paid by the buyers until completion. Interest was accordingly paid in the meantime, and on May 3, 1883, a transfer of the shares was executed by the vendors and G. W. Schofield. On May 5 a receipt was given to G. W. Schofield for the sum of £3,305 for shares bought, but £505 only having in fact been paid, a promissory note was on the same day given to the appellants for £2,800 “deposited on loan at 5 per cent. per annum interest from date.” This was signed “For J. Schofield & Sons, Ltd., G. W. Schofield, director.”

The first question is, whether this transaction was entered into by G. W. Schofield on his own account or as agent for the company. If the former, it is clear that Schofield was guilty of a gross fraud. Upon a review of the evidence I see no ground for coming to such a conclusion. I think the purchase of the shares was in fact made by him on behalf of the company.

The question whether, assuming the company had power to purchase its own shares, this purchase was effected in accordance with the articles of the company is one of much greater difficulty. The article empowering the company to purchase its shares is as follows :

“Article 179. Any share may be purchased by the company from any person willing to sell it at such price, not exceeding the then marketable value thereof, as the board think reasonable.”

There is not the slightest evidence that the directors ever considered, either at a formal meeting of the board or otherwise, the question whether these shares should be purchased. The utmost that can be said to be established is that the directors other than G. W. Schofield, who negotiated the purchase, knew that the respondents had come to see him upon the subject. But, further, the only authority to buy was at such price, not exceeding the then market value, as the board should think reasonable. The par value of the shares was apparently given in this case, as in the case of the other purchases, as a matter of course, and I see no reason to believe that any judgment was exercised upon the point by the board. But although I think it far from clear that, even if it was competent for the company to purchase the shares, this transaction can be supported, I do not intend to pronounce an opinion upon this point, because, in consequence of the view which I believe all your Lordships entertain upon another part of the case, it is unnecessary to do so.

I pass now to the main question in this case, which is one of great and general importance—whether the company had power to purchase the shares. The result of the judgment in the court below is certainly somewhat startling. The creditors of the company which is being wound-up, who have a right to look to the paid-up capital as the fund out of which their debts are to be discharged, find coming into competition with them persons who, in respect only of their having been and having ceased to be shareholders in the company, claim that the company shall pay to them a part of that capital. The memorandum of association, it is admitted, does not authorise the purchase by the company of its own shares. It states as the objects for which the company is established the acquiring certain manufacturing businesses, and the undertaking and carrying on the businesses so acquired, and any other business and transaction which the company consider to be in any way auxiliary thereto, or proper to be carried on in connection therewith. It cannot be questioned, since Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche (1), that a company cannot employ its funds for the purpose of any transactions which do not come within the objects specified in the memorandum, and that a company cannot by its articles of association extend its power in this respect. These propositions are not, and could not be, impeached in the judgments of the Court of Appeal, but it is said to be settled by authority that, although a company could not under such a memorandum as the present by articles authorise a trafficking in its own shares, it might authorise the board to buy its shares “whenever they thought it desirable for the purposes of the company,” or “in cases where it was incidental to the legitimate objects of the company that it should do so.” The former is COTTON, L.J.’s expression, the latter that of BOWEN, L.J.

I will first consider the question apart from authority, and then examine the decisions relied on. The Companies Act, 1862, required (s. 8) that, in the case of a company where the liability of the shareholders is limited, the memorandum shall contain the amount of the capital with which the company proposes to be registered, divided into shares of a certain fixed amount [see s. 2 (4) (a) of Companies Act, 1948], and provided (s. 12) that such a company may increase its capital and divide it into shares of larger amount than the existing shares, or convert its paid-up shares into stock, but that, “save as aforesaid, no alteration shall be made by any company in the conditions contained in its memorandum of association” [see s. 61 (1) of Act of 1948]. What is the meaning of the distinction thus drawn between a company without limit on the liability of its members and a company where the liability is limited, but, in the latter case, to assure to those dealing with the company that the whole of the subscribed capital, unless diminished by expenditure upon the objects defined by the memorandum, shall remain available for the discharge of its liabilities? The capital may, no doubt, be diminished by expenditure upon and reasonably incidental to all the objects specified. A part of it may be lost in carrying on the business operations authorised. Of this all persons trusting the company are aware, and take the risk. But I think they have a right to rely, and were intended by the legislature to have a right to rely, on the capital remaining undiminished by any expenditure outside these limits, or by the return of any part of it to the shareholders. Experience appears to have shown that circumstances might occur in which a reduction of the capital would be expedient. Accordingly, by the Companies Act, 1867, provision was made enabling a company under strictly defined conditions to reduce its capital [Act of 1948, ss. 66-71]. Nothing can be stronger than these carefully-worded provisions to show how inconsistent with the very constitution of a joint-stock company, with limited liability, the right to reduce its capital was considered to be.

Let me now invite your Lordships' attention to the facts of the present case. The company had purchased, prior to the date of the liquidation, no less than 4,142 of its own shares—that is to say, considerably more than a fourth of the paid-up capital of the company had been either paid, or contracted to be paid, to shareholders, in consideration only of their ceasing to be so. I am quite unable to see how this expenditure was incurred in respect of or as incidental to any of the objects specified in the memorandum. And, if not, I have difficulty in seeing how it can be justified. If the claim under consideration can be supported, the result would seem to be that the whole of the shareholders, with the exception of those holding seven individual shares, might now be claiming payment of the sums paid upon their shares as against the creditors, who had a right to look to the moneys subscribed as the source out of which the company's liabilities to them were to be met. And the stringent precautions to prevent the reduction of the capital of a limited company, without due notice and judicial sanction would be idle if the company might purchase its own shares wholesale and so effect the desired result. I do not think it was disputed that a company could not enter upon such a transaction for the purpose of reducing its capital, but it was suggested that it might do so if that were not the object, but it was considered for some other reason desirable in the interest of the company to do so. To the creditor whose interests, I think, ss. 8 and 12 of the Companies Act, 1867, were intended to protect, it makes no difference what the object of the purchase is. The result to him is the same. The shareholders receive back the moneys subscribed, and there passes into their pockets what before existed in the form of cash in the coffers of the company, or of buildings, machinery, or stock available to meet the demands of the creditors.

What was the reason which induced the company in the present case to purchase its shares? If it was that they might sell them again, this would be a trafficking in the shares, and clearly unauthorised. If it was to retain them, this would be to my mind an indirect method of reducing the capital of the company. The only suggestion of another motive (and it seems to me to be a suggestion unsupported by proof) is that this was intended to be a family company, and that the directors wanted to keep the shares as much as possible in the hands of those who were partners, or who were interested in the old firm, or of those persons whom the directors thought they would like to be among this small number of shareholders. I cannot think that the employment of the company's money in the purchase of shares for any such purpose was legitimate. The business of the company was that of manufacturers of flannel. In what sense was the expenditure of the company's money in this way incidental to the carrying on of such a business, or how could it secure the end of enabling the business to be more profitably or satisfactorily carried on? I can quite understand that the directors of a company may sometimes desire that the shareholders should not be numerous, and that they should be persons likely to leave them with a free hand to carry on their operations. But I think it would be most dangerous to countenance the view that, for reasons such as these, they could legitimately spend the moneys of the company to any extent they pleased in the purchase of its shares. No doubt, if certain shareholders are disposed to hamper the proceedings of the company, and are willing to sell their shares, they may be bought out; but this must be done by persons, existing shareholders or others, who can be induced to purchase the shares, and not out of the funds of the company.

It is urged that the views I have expressed are inconsistent with the forfeiture and surrender of shares in a company. I do not think so. The forfeiture of shares is distinctly recognised by the Companies Act, and by the articles contained in the schedule, which, in the absence of other provisions, regulate the management of a limited liability company [see Act of 1948, Table A, arts. 33-39]. It does not involve any payment by the company, and it presumably exonerates from future liability those who have shown themselves unable to contribute what is due from them to the capital of the company. Surrender no doubt stands on a different footing [see 6 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 264, 265]. But it also does not involve any payment out of the funds of the company. If the surrender were made in consideration of any such payment it would be neither more nor less than a sale, and open to the same objections. If it were accepted in a case when the company were in a position to forfeit the shares, the transaction would seem to me perfectly valid. There may be other cases in which a surrender would be legitimate. As to these I would repeat what was said by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2) (17 Ch.D. at p. 85):

"It is not for me to say what the limits of surrender are which are allowable by the Act . . . because each case as it arises must be decided upon its own merits."

I turn now to the authorities. In Teasdale's Case (3) JAMES, L.J., said (9 Ch. App. at p. 58):

"There is no doubt that a company may give itself power to purchase its own shares, to take surrenders of shares, and to cancel the certificates of shares."

But in the subsequent case of Hope v. International Financial Society (4) that learned judge said (4 Ch.D. at p. 336):

"I am reported to have said in Teasdale's Case (3) that the power to purchase shares would be good. I am not quite sure whether that was not too wide a deduction from the cases to which I was then referring, and certainly it was not necessary for the decision of the case. But, however that may be, when the company deals with an individual shareholder, and does what appears to be right under the circumstances, namely, to accept a surrender from the shareholder who cannot pay, and to release him from further liability—that might be good, although incidentally and to a small extent it may be said to diminish the capital."

In the case which gave rise to these observations a company having 150,000 shares issued passed a special resolution that the directors should have power to apply the company's assets to purchase from shareholders willing to sell any number of shares not exceeding 100,000, and that such shares should not be re-issued by the directors without the authority of a general meeting. The Court of Appeal, affirming BACON, V.-C., held that this scheme was invalid. JAMES, L.J., said (ibid. at p. 335):

"Either this is a purchase of shares in the sense of trafficking in shares which is a purchase not authorised by the memorandum of association, or it is an extinguishment of the shares, and, therefore, a reduction of the capital of the company."

"I agree with the lord justice that the dilemma is made perfect; for, if you assume that there was to be a re-issue of these shares, the shares are not cancelled; they are existing shares, and the only way of getting rid of them again is to sell them. It is said that a selling of shares is not of itself a trafficking in shares. Well, that may be quite true. If I make a present of a horse I cannot be said to be dealing in horses, but I apprehend if I buy a horse for the purpose of selling it again I do deal in a horse. So then, if you take that to be the reasonable meaning of the resolution, then the resolution is this, that the company are to buy the shares for the purpose of re-issuing them, that is for the purpose of selling them again. They do not say so in terms, but that is the necessary effect of what they intend to do by the resolution. That seems to be a trafficking in shares and a carrying on of the business which is not within the terms of the memorandum of association. It is true that there may not be a continuing business, but no more was that which was done in the case of the Ashbury Rail. Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche (1). That was only to be one transaction, but, because the transaction was a business transaction not contemplated or mentioned in the memorandum of association, it was not allowed. If that, therefore, was the intention of that resolution, then it broke the rules, by enabling or forcing the company to enter upon a business which is not mentioned in the memorandum of association. But if it was not intended to re-issue these shares, then it seems to me to follow that the amount of capital represented by them was necessarily extinguished."

It appears to me that every word which I have just quoted from the judgment of BRETT, L.J., is strictly applicable to the circumstances of the present case.

Again, in Guinness v. Land Corpn. of Ireland, Ltd. (5), COTTON, L.J., after referring to s. 38 of the Companies Act, 1862, said (22 Ch.D. at p. 375) :

"From that it follows that whatever has been paid by a member cannot be returned to him. In my opinion it also follows that what is described in the memorandum as the capital cannot be diverted from the objects of the society. It is, of course, liable to be spent or lost in carrying on the business of the company, but no part of it can be returned to a member so as to take away from the fund to which the creditors have a right to look as that out of which they are to be paid."

The learned judges of the Court of Appeal did not in the present case purport to depart from the views thus expressed, but their judgments were based upon the decision of that court in Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2). In that case, disputes having arisen as to the conduct of the business, the directors agreed with Ward, one of the largest shareholders, to purchase his shares and also his interest as landlord in the mines worked by the company. This arrangement was confirmed by an extraordinary general meeting of the company, and was carried into effect in March, 1872. The business of the company was very prosperous for several years, but in 1879 it was ordered to be wound-up, and the question then arose whether Ward was liable to be placed on the list of contributories. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., held that he was, on the ground that the company had no power to purchase the shares, but this decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal. Upon the question whether the company had the power contended for, I agree with the reasoning of the Master of the Rolls rather than that of the Court of Appeal. But I am not prepared to say that the judgment of the Court of Appeal refusing to make Ward a contributory was erroneous, looking at the circumstances which intervened subsequent to the purchase and prior to the winding-up. It is not necessary, however, to detain your Lordships by a consideration of this question, as it can have no application to the present case. The transaction here is inchoate, and the court is asked to compel its completion. This, I think, for the reasons I have given, they would not be justified in doing.

I ought to notice one other case, as it was much relied on by the learned counsel for the respondents. I refer to Phosphate of Lime Co. v. Green (6). In that case the learned judges appear to have considered that the transaction amounted to a purchase of shares in the company which was prohibited by its articles of association, but they held that it had been ratified by the shareholders. No question was raised in argument or determined as to the powers conferred by the memorandum of association, and it is to be observed that at that time it was not so clearly settled as it has been since the judgment in Ashbury Rail. Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche (1), that a transaction not within the scope of the memorandum is incapable of ratification. I move that the judgment appealed from be reversed and the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor restored, and that the respondents do pay to the appellants the costs in the Court of Appeal and in this House, and do repay to the appellants any moneys and costs received from them.

LORD WATSON.—These points were discussed in the argument upon this appeal: Was the purchase of 533 shares of James Schofield & Sons, Ltd., from the respondents, in May, 1880, made by G. W. Schofield for behoof of the company, with the sanction of its directors? If so, was the transaction ultra vires the company? The order appealed from cannot stand if either of these questions be answered in the negative. I think it is established by the evidence that both parties to the agreement of May, 1880, understood, and acted upon the footing that the purchase was made by G. W. Schofield for the company, and that G. W. Schofield, after the shares were transferred to him in May, 1883, held, or at least intended to hold, them as trustee for the company. I doubt whether it is also proved that the purchase was submitted to and considered and approved by the board of direction, in terms of the articles of association; but I do not think it necessary to determine that point, because I am of opinion that, assuming the transaction to have been duly completed, in accordance with the articles, it was nevertheless ultra vires the company.

In order to appreciate the real character of the transaction, it is necessary to advert to the position of the concern, and its course of dealing in the purchase of its own shares. The company was registered with limited liability in the year 1865, for the purpose of carrying on the business of manufacturing flannel goods, and it continued to trade from that time until April, 1884, when it went into liquidation. Its nominal capital was £150,000 in 15,000 shares of £10 each. None of its shares was sold in the market after July, 1875, and no dividend was paid after the year ending Dec. 31, 1877; but at the date of the liquidation the company had acquired by purchase, and then owned, 4142 of its own shares, of which 3609 were entered in the register in the name of "Jas. Schofield & Sons," a firm which had no existence, and the remainder (the 533 shares in question) in the name of G. W. Schofield. All of these shares had been bought by the company at par, or, in other words, not at market value, but for the amount which had been paid upon them by previous holders; and 1389 shares were purchased on these terms between May, 1880, and the date of the liquidation. In the case of the 533 shares, the price was made payable three years after the date of the agreement of sale, in exchange for a transfer, the purchaser meantime paying interest at 5 per cent., and undertaking to indemnify the sellers from further calls. Interest was regularly paid from the funds of the company, and the transaction was closed in May, 1883, by a transfer of the shares to G. W. Schofield, the sellers giving a receipt for the full price (£3305) on receiving payment of £505 in cash and being credited in the books of the company with £2800, the amount of the unpaid balance, as a loan to the company. That is the sum which the respondents claim in the liquidation, and for which the Court of Appeal has held A that they are entitled to rank in competition with the creditors of the company.

The articles of association of James Schofield & Sons, Ltd., give the directors very extensive powers to purchase its own shares for the company; and it is provided (art. 181) that “shares so purchased may at the discretion of the board be sold or disposed B of by them, or be absolutely extinguished, as they deem most advantageous for the company.”

These powers are, of course, unavailing, in so far as they may include purchases which are either beyond the scope of the memorandum of association or contrary to the provisions of the Companies Acts. But I assent to the respon- C dents' argument that they must be construed ut magis valeant quam pereant, and must be held to authorise all purchases of the company's shares effected on its behalf by the directors, which can be shown to have been legitimate and within the objects specified in the memorandum. In the case of a company limited by shares, the Act of 1862 requires that the amount of its capital, and the shares into which it is divided, shall be set forth in the memorandum D of association; and s. 12, which prescribes the extent to which the conditions contained in the memorandum may be modified, empowers the company to increase, but not to diminish, its capital. The limitation has been so far relaxed by the Act of 1867 as to permit a company to reduce its capital, with the sanction of the court after due notice to creditors upon such terms as the court may think fit to impose. The Act of 1877, upon the preamble that doubts had been enter- E tained whether the power of reduction given by the preceding Act extended to paid-up capital, enacts (s. 3) that the word “capital,” as used in that Act, shall include paid-up capital [see now s. 66 of Act of 1948]. That declaration clearly expresses the will of the legislature that neither the paid-up nor the nominal capital of the company shall be reduced otherwise than in the manner permitted by the statutes. One of the main objects contemplated by the legislature, in F restricting the power of limited companies to reduce the amount of their capital as set forth in the memorandum, is to protect the interests of the outside public who may become their creditors.

In my opinion, the effect of these statutory restrictions is to prohibit every transaction between a company and a shareholder, by means of which the money already paid to the company in respect of his shares is returned to him, unless G the court has sanctioned the transaction. Paid-up capital may be diminished or lost in the course of the company's trading; that is a result which no legislation can prevent; but persons who deal with and give credit to a limited company naturally rely upon the fact that the company is trading with a certain amount of capital already paid, as well as upon the responsibility of its members for the capital remaining at call; and they are entitled to assume that no part of H the capital which has been paid into the coffers of the company has been subsequently paid out except in the legitimate course of its business. When a share is forfeited or surrendered the amount which has been paid upon it remains with the company, the shareholder being relieved of liability for future calls, while the share itself reverts to the company, bears no dividend, and may be re-issued. When shares are purchased at par and transferred to the company I the result is very different. The amount paid up on the shares is returned to the shareholder; and in the event of the company continuing to hold the shares (as in the present case) is permanently withdrawn from its trading capital.

It appears to me that, as SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., pointed out in Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2) (17 Ch.D. at p. 83), it is inconsistent with the essential nature of a company that it should become a member of itself. It cannot be registered as a shareholder to the effect of becoming debtor to itself for calls, or of being placed on the list of contributories in its own liquidation. Accordingly,

1 when a company buys and holds its own shares, the device is sometimes resorted to of taking the transfer to a nominee, who is entered in the register and holds the shares as trustee for the company, which undertakes to indemnify him from future calls. In that case, if the company goes into liquidation before its capital 3 is fully paid up, the trustee is liable personally as a contributory for the amount then unpaid; but the amount withdrawn is never restored, and calls made upon the shares while the company is a going concern bring no addition to its capital.

In Teasdale's Case (3) which was frequently referred to in the argument before us, JAMES, L.J., is reported to have said (9 Ch. App. at p. 58):

“There is no doubt that a company may give itself power to purchase its own shares, to take surrenders of shares, and to cancel the certificates of shares.”

There was no question of purchase in that case, which related to a surrender of original shares in exchange for new shares, by means of which the nominal capital of the company was largely increased while the paid-up capital remained intact.

The learned lord justice took occasion to modify the opinion thus attributed to him in the subsequent case of Hope v. International Financial Society (4). In that case the purchase of its own shares was not one of the specified objects of the society; but the directors were authorised to purchase the shares of certain members who desired to withdraw from the concern by a special resolution of the society, which provided that shares purchased in terms thereof should not be re-issued by the board without the authority of a general meeting. The Court of Appeal, affirming the decision of BACON, V.-C., held that the scheme involved
E an improper application of its funds and was ultra vires the company. JAMES,
L.J., said (4 Ch.D. at p. 335):

“Mr. Kay, it appears to me, has succeeded in placing his opponents on the F horns of a dilemma. This is a purchase of shares in the sense of trafficking in shares, which is a purchase not authorised by the memorandum of association; or it is an extinguishment of the shares, and therefore a reduction of the capital of the company.”

He clearly distinguishes the case of purchase from that of surrender. After referring to his reported observations in Teasdale's Case (3) as being too wide G a deduction from the authorities, and unnecessary for the decision of the case, he says (ibid. at p. 336):

“But, however that may be, when the company deals with an individual shareholder and does what appears to be right under the circumstances, namely, to accept the surrender from the shareholder who cannot pay, and to release him from further liability, that might be good, although incidentally, H and to a small extent, it may be said to diminish the capital.”

BRETT and BAGALLAY, L.JJ., followed the same line of reasoning as JAMES, L.J.
They agreed that the resolution of the company to purchase and hold its own shares, subject to the disposal of a general meeting, was in substance either a resolution to deal in the shares, which was outside the memorandum of associa-
I tion, or a resolution to reduce its capital, which was contrary to the provisions of the Companies Acts. The decision of the learned judges would, I apprehend, have been the same if the directors had been authorised to make the purchase by the articles of association. No authority thereby given could have enlarged the scope of the memorandum, or overcome the statutory prohibition.

Counsel in the course of his able argument for the respondents, impeached the soundness of the decision in Hope v. International Financial Society (4). He sought to extricate his clients from the dilemma presented in that case by endeavouring to show that the purchase of the 533 shares in question was, in a reasonable sense, incidental to the carrying on of the proper business of James Schofield & Sons, Ltd., or was at least a legitimate piece of domestic management, and, therefore, within the scope of the memorandum; and, upon that assumption, he argued that the transaction was not in contravention of the Companies Acts, although it might lead to some diminution of capital. His argument was mainly rested upon Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2), an authority requiring consideration, because it is in respect of the principle said to be thereby established that the Court of Appeal has, in this case, given judgment for the respondents. Other authorities were relied on by the learned counsel, but these, with one exception, I think it unnecessary to notice, because they were cases either of surrender of shares or of cancellation of allotments, and did not involve any question of purchase.

In Phosphate of Lime Co. v. Green (6) a dispute had arisen between the company and two of its shareholders, which was eventually compromised. As stated by WILLES, J. (L.R. 7 C.P. at p. 54):

“An arbitration was proposed and negotiations took place between the directors and Green and Nicholls, which resulted in a compromise on or about July 24, 1866. That compromise in effect was that, instead of paying back the money advanced to them, and returning the debenture bonds, Green and Nicholls should give up to the company 400 shares on which £10 per share had been paid up to be cancelled; and it was agreed that this should be considered as a settlement of the claim of the company against them.”

The learned judges, in delivering their opinions, assumed that the transaction had the character of a sale of the shares and was struck at by art. 19 of the company's articles of association, which expressly prohibited the purchase of its own shares under any circumstances; but they held that the shareholders, with full knowledge of the transaction, had ratified that which had been done by the directors. None of the learned judges seems to have considered whether the transaction was within the limits of the memorandum or consistent with the provisions of the Companies Acts, and neither of these points was raised by the arguments addressed to them.

In deciding Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2) the Court of Appeal had fully in view the previous decisions of this House in Ashbury Rail. Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche (1), and of their predecessors in Hope v. International Financial Society (4). It appears from the report that disputes had arisen between the board of directors and Ward, one of their number, from whom and his partner Addy the company had a sublease of coal mines which it worked, and that these disputes seriously interfered with the business of the company. In order to terminate their differences the parties entered into an agreement sanctioned by a special resolution of the company, in terms of which Ward, on March 25, 1872, transferred his shares to the company for £5000, and of the same date executed, along with Addy, a separate indenture, by which they assigned to the company their whole interest as lessees for the sum of £10000. The company was registered as owner of the shares shortly after the execution of the transfer in 1872, and retained them until 1879, when a winding-up order was obtained. At the time of the transfer, and for several years following, the business of the company was prosperous, and large dividends were paid. The liquidators included Ward in the list of contributories, and, in an application for the removal of his name SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., held that the transfer was void as being not only outside the objects of the memorandum, but a diminution of the paid-up capital forbidden by the Companies Acts, and consequently that Ward was still liable to contribute. His judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeal, who directed the applicant's name to be removed from the list. COTTON, L.J., was of opinion that, the purchase having been made in the interest of the company, and not being in any sense a traffic in shares, did not go beyond the memorandum, and that it was not such a diminution of capital as the statutes prohibit. Upon the latter point his Lordship observed (17 Ch.D. at p. 94) :

“The principal argument of the respondent against the validity of the transaction was, that it was a reduction of the capital of the company. If this transaction is to be held invalid on that ground, I do not see how a surrender or forfeiture of shares is ever to be supported.”

JAMES, L.J., was also of opinion that dealing with shares which did not amount to traffic was not beyond the scope of the memorandum, and he regarded the transaction as “a mere domestic matter,” which could not be questioned after the company had first confirmed it and had then acquiesced in it and taken the benefit of it.

In Guinness v. Land Corpn. of Ireland, Ltd. (5) COTTON, L.J., thus explained the principle upon which Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2) was decided (22 Ch.D. at p. 378) :

“The article there empowered the directors in their discretion to apply money in purchasing shares so as to get rid of shareholders who caused difficulty in the internal management of the company, and as the power had been used, and reasonably used, for that purpose, and not as a means of diminishing the capital of the company, the shares not being in any way cancelled or put an end to, but being re-issuable, we were of opinion that the directors had the power which they purported to exercise.”

When a company, in order to get rid of a troublesome shareholder, buys his shares and continues to hold them, as in Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2) the object may be different, but the result, so far as regards the capital of the company, is precisely the same as if it had purchased the shares as an investment. If the shares are purchased with the view of being resold, that is simply a speculation with the funds of the company. If they are purchased with the view of their being retained by the company, that is a permanent withdrawal of the money invested in them from the trading capital of the company. I do not agree with COTTON, L.J., in thinking that if such a transaction is invalid no forfeiture or surrender could be supported. When shares are forfeited or surrendered and not re-issued, that affects only the nominal amount of the shares so far as unpaid; when they are bought and not re-issued, that diminishes the paid-up as well as the nominal capital. Notwithstanding the general prohibition of alterations upon the memorandum of association which diminish the capital, whether the paid-up or nominal, of a company limited by shares, the Companies Acts contemplate the possibility of diminution of unpaid capital in certain cases, although the memorandum remains unaltered. Section 26 of the Act of 1862 and the regulations of Table A (17 to 22) [Act of 1948, Sched. 6, Pt. I, para. (3) (i), and Table A, arts. 33-39] show plainly that the legislature intended companies to have the power of forfeiting shares. There is no reference in the Acts to surrenders of shares, but these have been admitted by the courts, upon the principle, as I understand it, that they have practically the same effect as forfeiture, the main difference being that the one is a proceeding in invitum, and the other a proceeding taken with the assent of the shareholder who is unable to retain and pay future calls on his shares.

Whatever may be the case in regard to surrender, I do not think the purchase of its own shares by a company bears any analogy to forfeiture. It appears to me that a transaction by which, as in this case and in Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2), the company gave back his money to the shareholder, and accepted and held the shares in his stead, in point of fact operates as a diminution of its paid-up as well as of its nominal capital; and I have been unable to discover any good reason why such diminution should be held to be legal, in the face of statutory enactment to the contrary. I am not prepared to say, nor is it necessary to say, that the decree in Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2) directing the removal of Ward's name from the list of contributories was erroneous. If his non-liability to contribute in the liquidation had been wholly dependent upon the original validity of the agreement of March, 1872, for the sale and purchase of his shares, I should have agreed with the decision of SIR GEORGE JESSELL, M.R.; but it appears to me that there were special circumstances in that case, which might have justified the order made by the Court of Appeal, although I am unable to concur in the reasoning upon which it was based. The respondents are not resisting an attempt by the liquidators to include them in the list of contributories; they are seeking to enforce, in a question with creditors, the contract under which their shares were transferred to the company, and their success must depend upon the validity of the contract.

In the present case, I should have been of opinion, even on the assumption that the reasoning of the lords justices in Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2) was sound, that the purchase of the respondents' 533 shares was a transaction ultra vires of the company. It was not an isolated transaction with a single troublesome shareholder who was obstructing the business of the company, but was part and parcel of a scheme carried out by the directors under the articles of association, by which they acquired for the company more than one-fourth of the whole shares of its undertaking, and returned to the shareholders from whom they purchased more than one-fourth of its paid-up capital. It does not appear to have formed any part of the scheme to re-sell or re-issue the shares, and matters stood in the position I have described at the date of the liquidation. I do not doubt that, as suggested by the learned judges of the Court of Appeal, the object of the directors was to keep James Schofield & Sons, Ltd., as a sort of family concern, which was a perfectly lawful object if pursued by legitimate means. But the directors and shareholders of a company limited by shares, who desire to have the concern in the hands of themselves and their friends and to keep its shares out of the market, ought to use their own money for that purpose, and not the trading capital of the company. In my opinion, the application of the company's funds, in furtherance of any such object, is altogether illegitimate, because it is foreign to the proper business of the company, and in violation of statute law. If it were held to be incidental to the business of the company, and not a diminution of its capital, there seems to be no reason why James Schofield & Sons, Ltd., should not have purchased at par a half or two-thirds instead of a fourth of its own shares. I concur, therefore, in the judgment which has been moved.

LORD FITZGERALD.—LORD HERSCHILL has stated accurately that there are three questions awaiting our decision. The first is, whether the shares in question were purchased by Mr. G. W. Schofield on his own account, or as agent for the company. If I had to determine what the true character of that transaction was, and if that was necessary for our decision, I should hesitate very much to say that the agreement of May 1, 1880, was entered into by G. W. Schofield on behalf of the company and not upon his own account. The second question is, whether, assuming that these shares were purchased for the company and that the company had power to buy its own shares, the purchase was completed in accordance with the articles of association. Upon that question I make the same observation, that it is not necessary for our present decision to express any decided opinion upon it, but the impression upon my mind is that, if I had to decide that question, I should say that the transaction was not completed in accordance with the articles of association, and was, therefore, inoperative. The third question is the important one in the case. It is a question of very great public importance, and one cannot but feel satisfied that at last it has come to the point where it is necessary to pronounce an authoritative decision upon it.

The question is put thus in the reasons for the appeal—"Because the company had no power to make or authorise any such purchase of its own shares." That is answered in the reasons given for the respondents thus: "Because the purchase by the company of the said shares was not ultra vires, but under the circumstances was and is a transaction in every way binding on the company." The question now is: Which of these reasons are we to adopt? I have read the two very elaborate opinions which have been already delivered upon this subject, and I have also read the very weighty opinion which has yet to be delivered by LORD MACNAGHTEN. Upon carefully reading them and deliberately considering them, I have laid aside what I intended to be my own opinion in the case, and I intend to do little more than, upon this question, to state my entire concurrence in the views which have been expressed by your Lordships who have spoken, and in those which are about to be expressed by my noble and learned friend. I would add that I consider that the decision which the House has been able to arrive at is a most wholesome one in the public interests and for public purposes.

I would not say another word, but that I wish to advert to a case to which I called attention in the course of the argument—it was a case which came up for decision before the Court of Appeal in Ireland, and in which a very elaborate judgment was delivered by FITZGIBBON, L.J. I refer to Re Balgooley Distillery Co. (7). I only wish to observe that I think that affords the ablest criticism which has taken place up to this morning upon the authorities and upon the question which we have now to determine. I will only repeat that I express my entire concurrence upon the third question, in the decision of the House, and in the reasons given for it.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The learned counsel for the appellants raised three points for your Lordships' consideration. In the first place, they contended that the shares belonging to Whitworth's executors, which were the subject of the agreement of May, 1880, were not really purchased on behalf of the company. From facts either proved or admitted and from documents in evidence, they asked your Lordships to infer that in making that agreement George William Schofield was acting on his own account, though he meant all the while to treat the company as the purchaser if the bargain turned out to be a bad one. That is a charge of dishonesty for which, as far as I can see, there is not a shadow of foundation. In the next place, assuming the purchase clauses in the articles to be valid, it was contended that the requirements of those clauses were not duly complied with. This is a more difficult question. In the unsatisfactory state of the evidence I do not propose to give any final opinion upon it. I will only make one or two observations. Article 179 provides that "any share," that is any share in James Schofield & Sons, Ltd.

"may be purchased by the company from any person willing to sell it, and at such price, not exceeding the then market value thereof, as the board think reasonable."

It does not appear that the board ever exercised any judgment or thought in the matter. From the year 1875 the company's shares were not saleable or sold in the market, or dealt with by the public. After that date any shares that any member wished to sell were bought by the company as a matter of course. Excepting a few instances where shares were sold below their par nominal value, the price given was invariably a sum equal to the amount paid up, and that although the company was steadily going from bad to worse, trading at a loss, and at the same time borrowing money to buy up the shares of members who wanted to withdraw. Why the price was kept up under these circumstances it is not necessary to inquire. Whatever the reason may have been, the sum which the board agreed to pay for the shares belonging to Whitworth's executors cannot, I think, by any figure of speech, be described as the market value or as bearing any relation to the market value of the shares. If that be so, A there seems to be a difficulty in the way of enforcing against the company the completion of a contract founded on something like a breach of trust on the part of the directors.

The third point is one of general importance. It raises the question whether it is competent for a company formed under the Companies Act, 1862, on the principle of limited liability, to purchase its own shares when it is authorised B by its articles to do so. The consideration of that question, as it appears to me, necessarily involves the broader question whether it is competent for a limited company under any circumstances to invest any portion of its capital in the purchase of a share of its own capital stock, or to return any portion of its capital to any shareholder without following the course which Parliament has prescribed. C If the case were not in some degree embarrassed by the decision in Re Dronfield (2), and by dicta in earlier cases, I should answer both questions in the negative without the slightest doubt or hesitation. It appears to me that the notion of a limited company taking power to buy up its own shares is contrary to the plain intention of the Act of 1862, and inconsistent with the conditions upon which, and upon which alone, Parliament has granted to individuals who are D desirous of trading in partnership the privilege of limiting their liability. The Act of 1862 requires that the objects for which a limited company is established shall be stated in its memorandum. Those objects cannot be enlarged by anything to be found in the articles, or by anything outside the memorandum. Whatever may fairly be regarded as incidental to the objects stated in the memorandum, the company is authorised to do. Everything beyond that is E prohibited. Further, every limited company is required to state in its memorandum the amount of capital with which it proposes to be registered, divided into shares of a certain fixed amount. That is equivalent to a declaration that the capital is to be devoted to the objects of the company.

The effect of that statement, taken in connection with s. 38, is explained very clearly by COTTON, L.J., in Guinness v. Land Corpn. of Ireland (5). After F commenting on s. 38, the lord justice proceeds thus (22 Ch.D. at p. 375):

"From that it follows that whatever has been paid by a member cannot be returned to him. In my opinion, it also follows that what is described in the memorandum as the capital cannot be diverted from the objects of the society. It is, of course, liable to be spent or lost in carrying on the G business of the company, but no part of it can be returned to a member so as to take away from the fund to which the creditors have a right to look as that out of which they are to be paid."

If that be a correct exposition of the law, as I think it is, it seems to me to be decisive on the present question. If the purchase of shares in James Schofield & Sons, Ltd., was not one of the objects of that company, how could its capital H be properly employed in that purchase? BOWEN, L.J., indeed, founding himself on Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2), assumes that cases may occur where the purchase of its own shares is incidental to the legitimate objects of a limited company, and such a case he considers the present to be. On that two observations arise. If the exercise of such a power can be regarded as incidental to the objects of a limited company, there seems to be no need for giving the I power in express terms either in the memorandum or in the articles. Every company must have it. Every company may exercise it in a proper case. In the next place, whatever may be thought of the special circumstances to be found in Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2), there are no special circumstances here. It was said that the company was a family company. But a family company, whatever the expression means, does not limit its trading to the family circle. If it takes the benefit of the Act, it is bound by the Act as much as any other company. It can have no special privilege or immunity. It was said that the board did not want Whitworth's shares to be sold to outsiders, or put on the market. Unfortunately, there was nothing special in that. That was part of the regular practice of the company, a practice which became more and more confirmed as the company's affairs became more and more embarrassed.

The company's balance-sheets for the last few years of its existence are in evidence. On the one side, among the debit items, they show the amount due to the company's bankers; on the other side, under the head of "shares purchased," they show the amount spent by the company in the purchase of its own shares. The figures are instructive. In December, 1880, the company owed its bankers, who were secured creditors, £20,202. Up to that date, from its commencement in 1865, it had spent £16,202 in the purchase of its own shares. By December, 1883, the debt at the bankers had increased to £30,490, and the sum spent in the purchase of its shares amounted to £32,935. By means of these purchases that large sum, more than one-fifth of the nominal capital of the company, had been withdrawn from the fund to which, as COTTON, L.J., says, the creditors have a right to look. In 1884 the company went into liquidation, and the creditors are unpaid.

In the face of the figures to which I have referred, counsel for the respondents hesitated to maintain that the particular purchase was incidental to the objects of the company. But he urged that the vendors had nothing to do with that; they were not concerned with the management of the company. It was enough for his argument if it were conceded that the purchase of its own shares might be incidental to the objects for which the company was formed. Your Lordships then asked in what case, and under what circumstances, such a purchase could be said to be incidental to the objects of a limited company? In answer to that question the learned counsel not unnaturally turned to Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2), and suggested that at any rate it might be so when the power was used as an incident of domestic management to buy out shareholders whose continuance in the company was undesirable. That was the way in which the proposition was put in the Dronfield Case (2), where matters had come to a deadlock; but I would ask: Is it possible to suggest anything more dangerous to the welfare of companies and to the security of their creditors than such a doctrine? Who are the shareholders whose continuance in a company the company or its executive consider undesirable? Why, shareholders who quarrel with the policy of the board, and wish to turn the directors out; shareholders who ask questions which it may not be convenient to answer; shareholders who want information which the directors think it prudent to withhold. Can it be contended that, when the policy of directors is assailed, they may spend the capital of the company in keeping themselves in power, or in purchasing the retirement of inquisitive and troublesome critics?

I took the liberty during the argument of referring to a case which is reported under the name of Harben v. Phillips (8). It was the case of a large shipping company, in which the shareholders were divided into two hostile camps. One party, with the old directors at their head, wished to make London the port of departure for their fleet. The other party were determined that the business should remain at Southampton. Both sides were perfectly honest, each was fully convinced that the company would be ruined if the view of their opponents prevailed. Could it be suggested that in such a case directors might lawfully employ the company's funds in buying up a sufficient number of shares to silence opposition? Or is the purchase allowable only when the undesirable shareholder stands alone, and the other members are all of one mind?

In the latter case the action of the directors may not be open to misconstruction; but still the purchase would not be "a mere domestic matter" as it was termed by JAMES, L.J., in Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2). It must involve the employment of funds which have been dedicated to other purposes, and the use or misuse of which concerns other persons besides the shareholders. Nor can it be considered incidental to the objects of the company merely because it may be very convenient. After all, the inconvenience sought to be avoided arises either from restrictions which Parliament has thought right to impose, or from the common misfortune of having to pay for what one wants out of one's own purse when there is no other way of getting it. If the capital proposed to be expended in the purchase of its shares is "in excess of the wants of the company," the transaction may be carried out under the provisions of the Acts to which I shall have presently to refer. If the capital of the company is not in excess of the company's wants, it certainly ought not to be diverted from its proper objects. But even then there is no reason why there should be a deadlock. The end in view may still be attained by means to which no exception can be taken. If shareholders think it worth while to spend money for the purpose of getting rid of a troublesome partner who is willing to sell, they may put their hands in their own pockets and buy him out, though they cannot draw on a fund in which others as well as themselves are interested.

That, I think, is the law, and that is the good sense of the matter. There remains, however, a more serious objection still. It seems to me that, if a power to purchase its own shares were found in the memorandum of association of a limited company, it would necessarily be void. There are two conditions of the memorandum, the condition defining the objects of the company and the condition defining its capital, one or both of which would be affected by such a power. It must, therefore, be considered in connection with each. Suppose the dealing in its own shares were stated as an object for which a company was proposed to be established, could it be said that the subscribers were associated for a "lawful purpose" within the meaning of s. 6 of the Act of 1862 [Act of 1948, s. 1 (1)]? If it were the only object of the company no one would say so. Does the purpose of the association become lawful if legitimate objects are combined with an object which is not legitimate? It is significant that the Stock Exchange will not grant a settling day, or allow a quotation to any company which purports to have the power of buying in its own shares. But let me suppose a case where the purchase of its own shares is not one of the objects of the company, properly so called, but a case where the subscribers to the memorandum think that the power of purchasing its own shares might be useful in the management of the company if it were permissible by law. Then it seems to me that one way of trying whether it is permissible or not would be to read it into the memorandum in connection with the condition which states what the capital is to be. Let me try it here in that way, using the very language of Cotton, L.J., who thought the power in the present case valid because it was only "a power to authorise the board, whenever they thought it desirable for the purposes of the company, to buy the shares." The condition would then run thus: "The capital of the company is £150,000 in 15,000 shares of £10 each; but the board may buy back shares whenever they think it desirable for the purposes of the company to do so." It seems to me that a condition so qualified would be repugnant and contradictory to itself. At any rate the qualification would have the effect of reducing one of the statutory conditions of the memorandum [Act of 1948, s. 2 (4)] to an empty form.

So far I have not relied upon the Acts of 1867 and 1877, which are to be construed as one with the Act of 1862, because I think the question is clear on the earlier Act; but I may say that the Act of 1867, as explained by the Act of 1877, seems to prohibit a company from purchasing its own shares except under certain stringent conditions. When Parliament sanctions the doing of a thing under certain conditions and with certain restrictions, it must be taken that the thing is prohibited unless the prescribed conditions and restrictions are observed. The Act of 1862 makes no provision for reduction of capital. The Act of 1867 allows a limited company to reduce its capital under conditions which carefully protect the interests of creditors. The Act of 1877 explains that the power to reduce capital includes a power "to pay off any capital which may be in excess of the wants of the company" [Act of 1948, s. 66 (1) (c)], and it dispenses with some of the prescribed conditions when the reduction does not involve either the diminution of any liability in respect of unpaid capital, or "the payment to any shareholder of any paid-up capital." It follows that, if the operation be effected by payment of capital to any one shareholder, all the prescribed conditions must be followed. Payment of capital to any one shareholder is just as much a reduction of capital, and just as detrimental to the interests of creditors, as the payment of the same amount among all the shareholders rateably. It is none the less a payment off of capital within the meaning of the Act of 1867, as explained by the Act of 1877, because the shareholder to whom the payment is made renounces in return the right to participate in the joint stock of the company.

One word with regard to powers of forfeiture and surrender of shares, which were referred to in argument as affording some support to the views of the respondents. Forfeiture is contemplated by the Act of 1862; it is mentioned in s. 26 [Act of 1948, Sched. 6, Pt. I, para. 3 (i)]; every company is to return to the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies once a year "the total amount of shares forfeited." There can be no question as to the power of a company in a proper case to forfeit shares. Surrender of shares stands on a different footing. It is not mentioned in the Companies Acts [see 6 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 264, 265], but I conceive there can be no objection to the surrender of shares which are liable to forfeiture. A surrender of shares in return for money paid by the company is a sale, and open to the same objections as a sale, whatever expression may be used to describe or disguise the transaction.

If you agree in the result at which I have arrived you will prevent a distinction being set up between the powers of statutory corporations governed by the Companies Acts and the powers of those governed by the Companies Clauses Acts, for which, as it appears to me, it would be difficult to find any foundation in reason. In the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, provision is made for forfeiture and for forfeiture only. By the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, companies are authorised to accept surrenders of shares not fully paid up, but it is expressly enacted that "the company shall not pay or refund to any shareholder any sum of money for or in respect of the cancellation or surrender of any share."

It has never been suggested, so far as I am aware, that a company governed by the Companies Clauses Acts can purchase its own shares. Your Lordships have held that the principles which were laid down in Ashbury Rail. Carriage & Iron Co. v. Riche (1), as to the limit of the powers of incorporated companies, apply with equal force to companies governed by the Companies Acts and to companies incorporated by special Act of Parliament. It would be a singular thing if your Lordships were compelled to hold that one class of companies can purchase its own shares while the other is prohibited from so doing.

It is necessary to say a few words with regard to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2). Much reliance, of course, was placed on that decision and your Lordships were warned against the danger of disturbing its authority, having regard to the time which has elapsed since it was pronounced and to the probability of its having been acted upon to a considerable extent. So far as my experience goes, that decision has never been recognised in the profession as an authority for the general proposition that a limited company may purchase its own shares; and I am confirmed in this view by the criticisms on the case to be found in MR. BUCKLEY'S well-known work on COMPANIES, and in the notes in MR. PALMER'S excellent collection of precedents. I do not think that your Lordships' judgment in the present case will touch the decision in Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2), though it will, of course, displace much of the reasoning on which the case was decided. If I may respectfully say so, though I agree with the reasoning of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., on the main point, still I think the decision of the Court of Appeal was right. It seems to me that it may be supported on very simple grounds. Mr. Ward's name was not on the register when the company was ordered to be wound-up. To make him a contributory it was, therefore, necessary to rectify the register. After winding-up the court has that power under ss. 35 and 98 [Act of 1948, s. 116, s. 257 (1)]. But it is a judicial power, as it has been called, and it is to be exercised by the court, to use the language of s. 35, "if satisfied of the justice of the case." These are not mere idle words; they mean, I think, what they say, although they have been sometimes overlooked. LORD CAIRNS, I may observe, relied upon them in Sichell's Case (9), as showing that the court is bound to go into all the circumstances of the case, and to consider what equity the applicant has to call for its interposition. The arrangement under which Ward retired was an honest arrangement. It was in accordance with a provision of the articles which had never been determined to be invalid. It was expressly sanctioned at an extraordinary general meeting, at which all the shareholders were present with the exception of the holder or holders of 11 shares out of 1,600. Ward's name was off the register for seven years. During part of that time the company had been extremely prosperous, and all the shareholders who remained in the company had received dividends largely increased by reason of Ward's retirement. Moreover there was no creditor whose debt was incurred while Ward was a shareholder, or who had been induced to trust the company by having Ward's name held out as a member. The power to make a person who is not on the register contribute to debts when the company is wound-up is a power given by statute. The same statute requires the court, before exercising the power, to be satisfied of the justice of the case [see now Act of 1948, s. 212]. In Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2), the liquidator, as representing shareholders, had no equity; he had none as representing creditors. It would be a strange travesty of justice to compel a person to pay debts with which he has nothing to do at the instance of an applicant who has no equity to set the court in motion.

The present case is wholly different from Re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (2). There it was sought to undo a transaction which could not be undone altogether so as to restore the parties to their original position, and which could not be undone at all without committing injustice. Here the applicants are seeking to enforce against the company a contract which has not yet been fully performed and which was beyond the powers of the company. Under these circumstances the application ought, I think, to have been refused by the Court of Appeal as it was by the Vice-Chancellor. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and the appeal allowed, as usual with costs.

Appeal allowed.

BOSTON DEEP SEA FISHING AND ICE CO. v. ANSELL

Agent—Duty to account—Profit from transaction within scope of agency—Right of principal to take profit—Receipt by agent from third party of secret commission—Right of principal to determine contract.

Master and Servant—Misconduct of servant—Receipt from third party of secret commission—Liability to summary dismissal—Right of employer to recover from servant amount received by him.

An agent acting for a principal or a servant employed by a master who, unknown to the principal or master, takes from a third person, with whom he has been employed by the principal or master to do business, a profit, whether by way of percentage or otherwise and whether the profit is given to him in return for services actually performed for the third party, for his supposed influence, or on any other ground, is guilty of a gross breach of duty towards the principal or master, and the principal or master is entitled summarily to dismiss him and to recover from him the amount of the profit which he received. This is so even where the transaction from which the illegal profit was made took place a substantial time previously or was an isolated transaction, unless in the latter case (per BOWEN, L.J.) the circumstances were such that the conduct of the agent or servant on the whole did not amount to a breach of confidence and good faith.

Master and Servant—Wages—Yearly contract—Salary paid quarterly under company's articles—Servant dismissed before end of year—Right to last quarterly payment—Right to payment on quantum meruit—Commission—Commission on sales—Summary dismissal—Right to commission on sales effected.

The plaintiff company employed the defendant as managing director at a salary of £800 a year which, in accordance with the articles of the company, was paid to him quarterly on Jan. 1, April 1, July 1, and Oct. 1. On Oct. 19 the defendant was summarily dismissed for misconduct. On a claim by him for a quarter's salary due on Oct. 1 and for the amount of commission due to him in respect of sales by the company.

Held: (i) on construction the contract was a yearly contract for a yearly payment to which the defendant would not be entitled until the end of the year; the fact that under the articles payments were made quarterly did not affect the matter; and, therefore, no salary had accrued due to the defendant before his dismissal and he was not entitled to the quarterly payment which would otherwise have been made on Oct. 1, nor could he recover on a quantum meruit; but (ii) he was entitled to the commission on sales directly the sales had taken place, and his right to this commission was not effected by his dismissal.

Appeal by the plaintiff company against a decision of KEKEWICH, J., in an action in which they claimed from the defendant Ansell an account of moneys received by him from third parties while he was managing director of the company as commission or bonus in connexion with transactions relating to the company's business, and on a counterclaim by the defendant for damages for wrongful dismissal.

Lawrance, Q.C., and Warrington for the company.

Crump, Q.C., and Vernon Smith for the defendant.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs in the action in respect not only that KEKEWICH, J., did not give them the full relief to which they are entitled on their statement of claim, but also that he granted on the counterclaim to the defendant Ansell relief to which he was not entitled.

The plaintiff company was formed in the year 1885, and before it was registered, and, therefore, incorporated, they were considering what they should do to establish their business. The defendant, Mr. Ansell, had been engaged for a considerable time at Hull, in the business in which the company proposed to enter at Boston, and possessed some fishing smacks. Mr. Garfit, the chairman of the company, shortly before the incorporation of the company, made an arrangement with Mr. Ansell that Mr. Ansell should hand over to the plaintiff company all his fleet of smacks, and that he should enter into certain arrangements which were to be carried out by him, as the managing director, when the company was formed. Therefore, he was an agent acting with considerable authority on behalf of the plaintiffs. Very shortly after the incorporation of the company the board of directors authorised Mr. Ansell to enter into negotiation with, and to contract with, the Earle's Shipbuilding Co., to build smacks or other vessels which the company required for the purpose of carrying on its business. He had certain directions from the board, negotiated with Earle's Shipbuilding Co., and entered into two contracts with that company on behalf of the plaintiff company. The company went on with him as their managing director for some time, but in May, 1886,

A there was some dissatisfaction with his conduct. An inquiry was directed, a Mr. Hodgson, to whom the matter was referred, made a report, and in September the board suspended Mr. Ansell from acting as manager. They could not, of course, discharge him from being managing director, but a meeting was called in October, and a resolution was passed discharging Mr. Ansell from his position as managing director. At that time the company did not know what had been B done by Mr. Ansell as regards the contract with Earle's Shipbuilding Co. It was not disputed by the counsel who appeared here for Mr. Ansell that, if there was any circumstance which, though unknown to the company at the time they dismissed Mr. Ansell from his position, would justify them in so doing, it was immaterial whether it was known at that time, and, if it was known after the time the action was brought, then the company could justify the dismissal by proof of C that fact.

Mr. Ansell was dismissed, and I think his dismissal must be taken to date from that meeting on Oct. 19, and not from the day in September when he was suspended by the board, because suspension is very different from dismissal.
When a man is suspended from the office he holds, it merely amounts to saying, D "So long as you hold the office, and until you are legally dismissed, you must not do anything in the discharge of the duties which under your office you ought to do towards your employer," and I cannot consider that the resolution by the general meeting to discharge him from the position he held can be taken to relate back. Then the plaintiff company and Mr. Garfit brought an action against Mr.
Ansell and also against a Mr. Hadfield. That action was dismissed, because the E matters alleged to have been done by Mr. Hadfield in collusion with Mr. Ansell were, in the opinion of the judge, not proved. We have not had any appeal from that dismissal. But Mr. Ansell, by a counterclaim, alleged that he had been wrongfully dismissed, and claimed damages for that wrongful dismissal, and also £200 for a quarter's salary down to Oct. 1. These claims the learned judge granted him. Besides that he sought an account of commission which was said F by him to be due to him, for sales effected by the company through him, and he is entitled to that under his agreement with the company, because he is entitled to commission on all sales previous to the time when he was dismissed.

I think, in the first instance, it is desirable, although it is not the principal contention here, to refer to the relief which is sought by the plaintiffs in their appeal.
There is no appeal by the defendant as regards the sum of £219 which was G received by him from the Earle's Shipbuilding Co. KEKEWICH, J., considered that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover that sum from the defendant, he having received that sum from Earle's Shipbuilding Co., part of it as a commission of 1 per cent. on the contract price for the first sale of vessels, and £50 as a lump sum in respect of the subsequent contract which was entered into through Mr. Ansell.
There is no appeal from that at all, and, therefore, one need not consider it except H so far as that transaction has to be referred to for the purpose of considering whether there was a wrongful dismissal. That sum was received on May 31, 1886, and in respect of that sum we shall have to alter very considerably the order which was made by the learned judge. There must be a direction that that shall be paid, and, in my opinion, the company are also entitled to have what the judgment did not give to them, viz., interest at 5 per cent. on that sum as against Mr. Ansell
I since the time that the money was received by him.

But there are two other matters in respect of which the plaintiffs say they ought to have got relief from the judge, and that they did not. Mr. Ansell had been engaged at Hull in this business of fishing and selling ice and various other things, and he had various smacks and was a member of two incorporated companies, one called, for the sake of distinction, the Ice company, and the other called either the Carrying company, or the Red Cross company. I suppose the red cross was the flag under which they sailed. As regards what Mr. Ansell received from both those companies the plaintiffs seek relief. The way in which those companies provided for the division of their profits was very much the same in A one respect, that is to say, they provided that their members should have a sum not exceeding a certain percentage by way of dividend, and that a bonus was to be given them as consuming members, that is to say, as regards the Ice company, the shareholders in that company who bought the ice supplied by the company were entitled to a bonus in respect of the profits gained by the company on the B transactions in which they were engaged with the company by buying ice from them.

Before the existence of the plaintiff company Mr. Ansell had a fleet of smacks, and he had purchased from the Ice company the ice which those smacks required to keep the fish which they caught until they could get it to the market, and he received from the Ice company in respect of those transactions a bonus. After C the plaintiff company had been formed, and after he transferred his fleet of smacks to the plaintiff company, he still continued to take from the Ice company the ice required for the purposes of those smacks. It was contended at one time by his counsel that he really bought from the Ice company, and then sold again to the plaintiff company; but, in my opinion, the invoices which were handed up contradicted that. There was the invoice of ice as supplied, not to him to be sold again D to somebody else, but to be supplied to and on account of the very smacks which he had formerly owned, and which he had sold to the plaintiff company. In the statement of defence he refers to that to show that there had been a question as between him and the Ice company as to whether it was right that these purchases of ice after the sale of the smacks to the company should be charged to him or should be charged to the company, because, if they were to be charged to the E company, the company not being a member could not claim these bonus profits, but if the smacks were to be considered as still his and worked in his name, then there would be a claim for bonuses arising from the transactions. What he says in his statement of defence is that he “has been for some years past and is a shareholder in the Hull Ice Co., Ltd., which after payment of a certain dividend divides its surplus profits as a bonus F among the shareholders whom it has supplied with ice, rateably to the amount of ice supplied to them; and before the sale of the said smacks to the plaintiff company he procured his ice for such smacks from the said Ice company. Since such sale he has on the plaintiff company's behalf procured such ice from the said Ice company, and supplied it to the plaintiffs at the price charged to all customers.” G

There he says and admits he procured it on behalf of the plaintiff company. He continues :

“To save payment of the bonus the Ice company proposed to debit the plaintiff company and not this defendant with the ice supplied, but this defendant refused to allow this to be done. The surplus profits payable to this defendant as such shareholder in respect of ice supplied to the plaintiff company H amount to £60 or thereabouts.”

KEKEWICH, J., considered that the plaintiff company were not entitled to that £60 which the defendant has received by way of bonus in respect of the ice supplied since the vessels were no longer his but were the vessels of the plaintiff company, and he so held on the ground, as I understand it, that the plaintiff company could never I themselves have been entitled to receive the bonus profit, and, therefore, they cannot claim it from the defendant, who was their agent, whom, however, he held accountable for the sum which he received when he was their agent from Earle's Shipbuilding Co. In my opinion, that is wrong. The question is not whether the company could directly have claimed this sum, but whether, when their agent received this profit in respect of a contract which he had entered into on behalf of the company as their agent for goods supplied to the company, the company are not entitled as against their agent to claim that money. In my opinion, they are. It

A is a profit arising from a contract which he on the part of the company entered into, and in consequence of the supply to the company by his order of a particular quantity of ice. It was said that he was entitled under the articles (No. 68) to enter into contracts and do business with the company. He was; but that, in my opinion, did not justify him, when contracting on behalf of the company, in putting into his own pocket a profit obtained entirely in consequence of the goods being
B supplied under that order to the plaintiff company. On that point, therefore, I differ from the view taken by KEKEWICH, J., and, in my opinion, the plaintiffs are entitled to an account as to the sums so received by him as bonuses from the ice company.

Then we come to another company, the Carrying company. That company had steam-vessels which went out from time to time to the fleet of fishing smacks, and
C brought home to the markets the fish which had been caught by the vessels of the fleet. The contention raised by counsel for the defendant was that there was no contract entered into by Mr. Ansell in respect of the carrying of fish home by the Carrying company, in respect of which this bonus profit was given to him. But, in my opinion, it cannot be considered that that can make this case an exception, because, even if there was no direct contract, or no direct order given by Mr. Ansell
D to the captains of the smacks who caught the fish, yet, having regard to the articles of association of the Carrying company, and to what had gone on before and was apparently continued, we must hold judicially that the transfer of the fish caught by the smacks which were once Mr. Ansell's, but which at the time when the fish were caught were the smacks of the company, was done, if not by his directions after the company was formed, in continuance of the directions given by him
E before, and under the contract which he had entered into with the Carrying company, because in the Carrying company's articles there is an article which throws on every one of the smack owners who is a member of the company the obligation and duty as between him and the Carrying company of sending all his fish home by the boats of the company. That article is this :

F "Every member being a smack owner shall by all possible ways and means support and maintain the company; and all the members shall and will form their respective fishing vessels so entered in the company into a fleet, and each member undertakes that all fish caught by his respective entered vessels shall be carried to shore in the company's vessels, and in no other manner."

G So that there was a direct contract still existing between him and the company as regards his vessels, that his vessels should be dealt with in this way, "and for the due and faithful observance of this and the last preceding article each member undertakes to enter into a bond with the company in the penal sum of £100." Then there was an article which gave these bonus profits only to those members who performed their obligations to the company. At this time, it is true, Mr.
H Ansell was not a smack owner in reality, because the owners of the smacks were the company and not he, but he was acting as owner, and it was only as being owner, and representing himself to the company as being the owner, that he was entitled to that which he got at the end of March, 1886, these bonuses in respect of the carriage of the fish. In my opinion, we should allow ourselves to be deceived by words and would not be guided by facts, if we acceded to the argument addressed
I to us on behalf of Mr. Ansell, that the captains joined what fleet they pleased and then shipped on board whatever carrying vessels they thought fit. In my opinion, therefore, so far as any of the bonus profits which he has received from the Carrying company is attributable to the fish caught in the smacks of the company, formerly his and still worked in his name, he must account to the plaintiff company on the same grounds as those which I have mentioned with regard to the Ice company, and the plaintiff company is entitled to an account in that respect.

We come to the counterclaim, and there is an appeal against the decision of KEKEWICH, J., on the counterclaim. What one has to consider first is this :

Had the company, although they knew it not, at the time they dismissed the defendant in October, a good ground of dismissal? In my opinion, they had. I have stated that he was engaged not only by the plaintiff, Mr. Garfit, but that he agreed with the company to be their general manager, and had authority given to him with reference to the contract to be entered into with the Earle's Shipbuilding Co. When he was engaged on that contract, in respect of the matter of that very contract he in one instance got a percentage of 1 per cent. from the shipbuilding company, and in the other case he insisted on getting, and did get, a lump sum of £50. It is suggested that we shall be laying down new rules of morality and equity if we hold this was a good ground for dismissing Mr. Ansell. If people have an idea that such transactions can be properly performed by an agent, the sooner they are disabused of that idea the better.

In my opinion, if a servant or a managing director, or any person who is authorised to act, and is acting for another in the matter of any contract, receives as regards the contract any sum, whether by way of percentage or otherwise, from the person with whom he is dealing on behalf of his principal, he is committing a breach of duty. It is not an honest act, and, in my opinion, it is an act sufficient to show that he cannot be trusted to perform the duties which he has undertaken as servant or agent. He puts himself in such a position that he has a temptation not faithfully to perform his duty to his employer. He has a temptation, especially where he is getting a percentage on expenditure, not to cut down the expenditure, but to let it be increased so that his percentage may be larger. In my opinion, where an agent entering into a contract on behalf of his principal and without the knowledge or assent of that principal receives money from the person with whom he is dealing, he is doing a wrongful act, he is misconducting himself as regards his agency, and, in my opinion, that gives to an employer, whether a company or an individual, whether he be servant or whether he be managing director, power and authority to dismiss him from his employment as a person who by that act is shown to be incompetent of faithfully discharging his duty to his principal.

It was said by KEKEWICH, J., that this was an isolated transaction, and, therefore, in his opinion, it did not give legal authority or power to the company to dismiss him. But I cannot accede to that view. As far as we know it is an isolated transaction; but if one finds at the very beginning of the employment that this agent, whose duty it was not to receive anything from the persons with whom he was dealing, did in fact do so, and in fact kept the receipt of the money secret for months after it had been received from the shipbuilding company, I am not satisfied that that man has not done other things equally inconsistent with his duty to his principals. In my opinion, the discovery of that fact, even if it was an isolated transaction, shows that he would put himself in a position not faithfully to discharge his duty, that he would put himself in a position to regard the interest of someone else rather than that of his employer, and that that did justify his employers in discharging him from the position which he held.

It was urged before us that it was a long time ago. Supposing the act had been done eight years ago, would that in law have justified the employer in discharging him? In law, I say Yes. It is very true that if an employer was a reasonable man and found that a servant who had served him faithfully for several years had in the early time of his employment done an act which was wrongful and which justified his dismissal, he would probably say: "This is a man who has been in my employ a few years. I think that he has always behaved himself honestly in the discharge of his duties, except in regard to this one transaction which took place a long time ago, and, therefore, I do not insist on my legal right." But although a man would ordinarily act in that way yet, in my opinion, that has no effect on the question whether the act is not of such a character as to justify the employer in dismissing him when he found it out. If he knows of the act, and still continues to employ him, it may be held by

A judges of fact or by a jury, that he has condoned it and prevented himself from insisting on the legal right, but, assuming the act of misconduct is unknown, it cannot be said that the mere fact that it happened eighteen months before prevents the company from insisting upon their legal right to discharge a person who has so misconducted himself. In my opinion, therefore, so much of the order as gives to Mr. Ansell on the counterclaim damages for wrongful dismissal
B must be discharged.

Then we come to another question, which is of a somewhat different character. He claimed £200 for a quarter's salary down to Oct. 1. That question gives considerable difficulty, and upon it we had considerable discussion as to the law bearing upon the matter. It appears that, on Jan. 8, 1886, long after the company was formed, there was another agreement in writing entered into between
C Mr. Ansell and the company, which provided that the former agreement should be adopted by the company and be binding on the company in the same manner and be read and construed in all respects as if the company had been in existence at the date thereof. Therefore, we must read that agreement of August, 1885, as if it was an agreement by the company and not merely an agreement of the company to be performed after it was adopted by the com-
D pany. It was said that Mr. Ansell had a right of action for the quarter's salary due on Oct. 1, and, therefore, a right of action before his dismissal, and that he has not lost that right of action by reason of the dismissal. That was founded upon this, that his salary was paid quarterly in accordance with the articles which provided that the salary should be paid quarterly. That article was not E the contract between Mr. Ansell and the company under which he agreed to serve the company, but it was a mere contract between the shareholders and the company, and regulated the way in which the payment should be made and the way in which the accounts should be kept. What we have to consider is, not whether as a shareholder he could have insisted on their performing that agreement, but whether, under the contract by which he agreed to be managing F director of the company, he had that right. We must look to the terms of the agreement of Aug. 4, 1885, which is confirmed in the manner I have mentioned. We find that he is to have a salary after Jan. 1, 1886, "after the rate of £800 per annum." That, to my mind, is a contract for a yearly service and a yearly payment, and, although he was in fact paid quarterly, it was not a payment under the contract, but simply a payment in accordance with the directions given
G by the company's articles. Therefore, in my opinion, it cannot be said that on Oct. 1 there was a right in Mr. Ansell to sue the company under this contract for £200, and, therefore, the question does not arise as to what would have been the effect if that had been the case. Nothing which I can say must be considered as expressing any opinion in favour of the view that, if there had been a quarter's salary then actually due for which he could have sued, his dis-H missal would have deprived him of that right. But the question is this: Can he sue for a proportionate part of the salary for the current year? What he would have been entitled to if he had continued in the plaintiff's service until the end of the year would have been £800, but, in my opinion, that would give him no right of action until the year was completed. If that is the true construction of his contract with the company by which he agreed to come into the employ
I of the company as managing director, the authorities which were referred to would show that, as regards the current quarter of the current year he cannot, having been properly dismissed, get any payment in respect of that. In my opinion, therefore, on that point also the judgment must be varied.

Another point is this. Under the contract which was to bind the company and the managing director he was to be allowed 5 per cent. on all fish and ice supplied or sold by the company to its customers, exclusive of fish sent in to the markets. In my opinion, that stands in a very different position from the £800 a year. He had a right, in my opinion, to that percentage directly the sales had taken place. Probably, as a matter of account, and as a matter of A convenience, it would be brought into account at the end of the year, and then paid to him; but notwithstanding that he would be entitled, in my opinion, to have the payment of that percentage if he chose to sue for it whenever the sales had taken place, and the amount of the sales ascertained in order that the percentage might be arrived at. What is the result? In my opinion, the counter- B claim fails altogether, except so far as it asks an account of those commissions on the sale of ice and fish. The learned judge directed an account of that, and reserved the costs of it. As regards the counterclaim, the proper judgment will be to dismiss it with costs, except so far as it seeks an account and relief in respect of the commission on the sales of ice and fish. The costs of that portion of the counterclaim must be reserved as well as the costs of the inquiry, C to be dealt with when the inquiry has been completed.

BOWEN, L.J.—The lord justice has discussed at length the facts of this case, and in the judgment which I am about to pronounce I shall not go all through them again, but shall confine myself to stating shortly what seems to me to be the true view of the law of this case.

I will first of all deal with what is the cardinal matter of the whole case— D whether the plaintiffs were justified or not in dismissing their managing director as they did. This is an age, I may say, when a large portion of the commercial world makes its livelihood by earning, and by earning honestly, agency commission on sales or other transactions; but it is also a time when a very large portion of those who move within the ambit of the commercial world earn, I E am afraid, commission dishonestly by taking commission not merely from their masters, but from the parties with whom their masters are negotiating and with whom they are dealing on behalf of the masters, and taking such commission without the knowledge of their masters, employers, or principals. There never was a time in the history of our law when it was more essential that courts of justice should draw with precision and firmness the line of demarcation which F prevails as between commission which may be honestly received and kept, and commission taken behind the master's back and in fraud of the master. In the present instance we have first of all to consider what was done by the managing director, and in the next place if we find that the managing director has taken and received a commission behind the back of his company, and without the knowledge of his company, and kept it, we have to pronounce our opinion upon G the question whether or not in law that is an ample reason for his dismissal.

With regard to the facts relating to the Earle's Shipbuilding Co., they stand beyond all dispute. The managing director has received a profit which was unknown to his own principal—his own employer. How does that bear upon the condition which is implied in every contract of service or agency such as this, the condition that he will faithfully and truly discharge his duty towards H his employer, and that, if he does not so discharge it, the employer is to be at liberty to elect whether he will determine the service or in spite of the fault still continue the erring servant in his employ? KEKEWICH, J., recognising, as it seems to me, the law generally as I have stated it, appears to have considered that the receipt of commission from the shipbuilding company was an isolated case, and on that ground on the whole he thought that there was no sufficient I reason for dismissing him. I think the view that if it is an isolated case it does not amount to such misconduct as would entitle the master to determine the service is a mistake. It seems to me to be a confusion between the duty of the judge to draw inferences of the fact and the duty of the judge to pronounce a decision of law. There may be cases where the breach of confidence and good faith towards the master would not arise if there was a simple isolated act; but those cases are not cases of fraud at all; they are cases of isolated acts which, if they occurred singly, would not in themselves amount to a determination of the

confidential relation or breach of the faithful service which the servant is bound to render. In that class of cases it is perfectly proper to consider whether on the whole the conduct of the servant has been such as to amount to a breach of confidence, and if it is not then the dismissal will not be justified. In such cases you might leave it to the jury to consider whether there had been such an accumulation, or such a repetition, of the acts as to give a ground for the determination of service; but in cases where the character of the isolated act is such as of itself to be beyond all dispute a breach of the confidential relation and a want of faith towards the master, the rights of the master do not depend on the caprice of the jury, or of the tribunal which tries it. Once the tribunal has found as a fact that there is a fraud and breach of faith, then the right of the master to determine the contract follows as matter of law. There can be no question that an agent employed by a principal or master to do business with another, who, unknown to that principal or master, takes from that other a profit arising out of the business which he is employed to transact, is doing a wrongful act inconsistent with his duty towards his master and the continuation of confidence between them. He does the wrongful act, whether such profit be given to him in return for services which he actually performs towards the third party, or in return for services which he is supposed to perform, or for his supposed influence, or on any other ground at all. If it is a profit which arises out of the transaction, it belongs to his master, and he has no right to take it, or keep it, or bargain for it, unless his master knows it.

It is said that, if the transaction was one of very old date, that in some way E deprives the master of his right to treat it as a breach of faith. As the lord justice has pointed out, the age of the fraud may be a reason in the master's mind for not acting on his rights, but it is impossible to say that, because a fraud has been concealed for six years, therefore, the master's right when he discovers it is not to act upon his discovery, and to put an end to the relation of employer and employed with which such fraud was inconsistent. I, therefore, find it F impossible to adopt KEKEWICH, J.'s, view or to come to any other conclusion except that, the managing director having been guilty of a fraud on his employers, was rightly dismissed by them, even though they did not discover the fraud until after the time they had actually pronounced the sentence of dismissal.

What follows from that with regard to the salary? As regards his current salary, it is clear and established beyond all doubt by authorities which we should G not be justified in overruling, even if we desired to do so, that the servant who is dismissed for wrongful behaviour cannot recover salary which is not due and payable at the time of his dismissal, but which is only to accrue due and become payable at some later date and on the condition that he has fulfilled his duty as a faithful servant down to that later date. The authorities put the question beyond dispute, and the principle also leads us to the same conclusion. He H cannot sue the master in such a case on his contract with the master, because the obligation of his master under the contract is that he shall pay the salary only at the end of the current period. He cannot recover, therefore, on the contract, nor can he recover on quantum meruit, because he cannot take advantage of his own wrongful act to insist that the contract is rescinded. As regards himself the contract is still open, although he has chosen to break it. Some con- I fusion always arises from treating these cases between master and servant as a rescission of the original contract. It is not a rescission of the contract in the ordinary sense in which that term is used—that you relegate the parties to the original position they were in before the contract was made. That cannot be, because half the contract has been performed. It is only a rescission in the sense that it determines the relation for the future, and you may regard that determination in two ways. It is either a determination in conformity with the rights of the master which arise under the contract, there being, as I have said, in every contract of service an implied condition that if faithful service is not rendered the master may elect to determine the contract, and the determination takes place on that implied condition. Or you may test it under the more general law, which is not applicable to contracts of service alone. You may treat it if you like as the wrongful repudiation of the contract by one party being accepted by the other, as a determination of the contract from the time the party who is sinned against elects to treat the wrongful act of the other as a breach of the contract which emancipates himself from continuing it further. It is not a rescission of the contract in the ordinary sense in which the term is used in common law. It is for that reason that it becomes plain beyond all doubt, that the servant cannot sue on quantum meruit any more than he can sue under a special contract. A B

The only question therefore is whether the salary in question was current salary within the meaning of the propositions which we have been discussing. Was it money any portion of which had accrued due at the time of the dismissal, even though it was not payable till afterwards, or was it a salary which had not accrued due at all? If it had accrued due, but was not payable till afterwards, a question might have arisen whether Ansell was entitled to it, but, as it does not necessarily arise in this case, I desire to express no opinion on that point. It seems to me that, on the true view of the facts, the salary here had no portion of it accrued due before Ansell's dismissal. According to the original contract, which was to be adopted by the company, he was to be paid at an annual rate. The company was formed, and among its articles of association it provides that the managing director is to be paid quarterly. Inasmuch as the contract is one which was not necessarily within the Statute of Frauds and might be made by parol only, if the matter had stood there, I think the existence of the articles of association at the time when the managing director entered on his employment, and the fact that all parties must have known that in the articles of association there was a provision that the managing director was to be paid quarterly, might be some evidence for the jury, or for the court, from which they might reasonably conclude that in reality, though the original written contract contained no such express provision as to quarterly payments, nevertheless the true terms on which he was serving were that he should be paid quarterly. But the case, unfortunately for the managing director, does not stand there, because after the articles of association had been framed, and after he had entered nominally on his duties, it was agreed between him and the company that he and they should again reduce into writing the exact terms on which he was to serve, and in reducing the terms into writing again any provision for quarterly payment is omitted. It seems to me, therefore, that one must look, and look only, to the agreement which by arrangement between the parties themselves was to be taken as the final and express agreement between them, and the inference in favour of the salary being payable quarterly, which otherwise would have arisen, is displaced by the subsequent agreement. The matter is not, perhaps, beyond all doubt, but that, I think, is the true view. C D E F G H

As to the sales, it seems to me, for the reasons which have been given by the lord justice, his dismissal does not prevent him from being entitled to any commission on sales which had become due at the time of his dismissal, because, although in the ordinary course of the business of the company the commission on such sales would not be ascertained until the end of the current year, I think that on his dismissal they would become payable at once. I think he is entitled at his own risk, and subject to the reservation which the lord justice has suggested as to costs, to an account of the commission due on such sales, if any such sales there be, as to which I know nothing. I

That disposes of the most important part of the dispute between the parties. But I wish to add one word on the subject of the bonuses which he claims to be entitled to retain as received from the Hull Ice Co., and the Hull Steam Fishing and Ice Co., otherwise called the Red Cross Company. If that was a profit received by him, as it seems to me to have been, while he was agent, and arising out of the duty which he was employed to perform for the company, it falls under the same branch of law as the profits received in respect of the shipbuilding company. I have some little difficulty in following the judgment of KEKEWICH, J., with regard to that. It may be, perhaps, reported by the shorthand writer inaccurately, but if KEKEWICH, J., is of opinion that it is of the essence of a title to relief in such a case that the principal should be able to claim as his money as against the other party to the business transaction the money received by his agent, I do not think that is the law. It is true, as KEKEWICH J., says, that the money which is sought to be recovered must be money had and received by the agent for the principal's use. But the use which arises in such a case and the reception to the use of the principal which arises in such a case does not depend on any privity between the principal and the opposite party with whom the agent is employed to conduct business. It is not that the money ought to have gone into the principal's hands in the first instance. It is because it is contrary to equity that the agent or the servant should retain money so received without the knowledge of his master. Then the law implies a use, that is to say, there is an implied contract if you put it as a legal proposition, or an equitable right if you treat it as a matter of equity, as between the principal and agent, that the agent should pay such money over. That renders the agent liable to be sued for money had and received, and there is an equitable right in the master to receive it, to take it out of the hands of the agent, which gives the principal a right to relief in equity. For these reasons I fail to agree with the judgment of the learned judge in the court below, and I think the judgment suggested by the lord justice is the only possible one.

FRY, L.J.—I also feel myself quite unable to agree with the decision of the learned judge in the court below, and as I differ from him I propose to add a few words to explain the grounds of my decision.

The main question of law to be determined in this case is: What was the real character of the dealings between the defendant Ansell and Earle's Shipbuilding Co.? With regard to the law and facts there is really no dispute. Mr. Ansell was appointed managing director of this company by an agreement entered into before the company was registered and adopted by the company after its registration, and not merely was he so appointed from its commencement, but at the first meeting of the directors, on Aug. 27, he received express instructions to arrange the terms of the building of four or five trawlers with Earle's Shipbuilding Co. Thus authorised, both as managing director and by the special resolution of the board, he goes to the shipbuilding company and he accepts an agreement from them to pay him a commission of 1 per cent. on the price to be paid by the company of which he was managing director to the shipbuilding company. A further contract was subsequently entered into in which it is said that Mr. Ansell exerted himself to beat down the prices of the shipbuilding company, but he insisted on a payment being then made to him, and after debate he succeeded in obtaining £50 from them. Those are the broad, undisputed features, of Mr. Ansell's dealing with the shipbuilding company. In my judgment, the conduct of Ansell in so dealing is a fraud—a fraud on his principals, a fraud not according to any artificial or technical rules, but according to the simple dictates of conscience and according to the broad principles of morality and law, and I think it is the duty of the courts to uphold those broad principles in all cases of this description. We are invited to consider the state of mind of Mr. Ansell—whether he thought it wrong; in other words, we are invited to take as the standard of our decision the alleged conscience of a fraudulent servant. I decline to accept any such ground as the rule on which the court is to decide such questions.

Having come without hesitation to the conclusion that Mr. Ansell's conduct was fraud of a gross character, the result appears to me to be very plain. In the first place, it gives the company a plain right to recover the money which Mr. Ansell received, and received, according to my view, in consequence of his position for the use of the company, the fact of which receipt he never disclosed to the company, with interest at 5 per cent. I take that to be the undoubted right of a principal who has been defrauded by his agent. In the second place, it appears to me to deprive Ansell of any right to recover the £200 which, according to the ordinary course of business between them, would have been payable to him as salary. That question depends not only on the one which I have already dealt with, but on the further inquiry whether the engagement to pay is to pay annually or quarterly. Like my learned brother who preceded me, if the matter rested on the contract of Aug. 4, 1885, and the articles of association which authorised the directors to confirm and carry into effect that agreement, with modifications, I should have been inclined to hold that there was evidence on which we might reasonably conclude that the directors had modified the original contract between Ansell and the company, and that it had been adopted with the modification that the salary should be paid quarterly. But then we find, months after those articles have been executed and the company registered, a formal instrument is entered into between Ansell and the company by which it is agreed that the original terms of the agreement of Aug. 4, 1885, shall be the terms binding between the company and him. The terms of that contract were yearly employment and a yearly payment. Therefore, notwithstanding the practice of the company, which seems to me to be referable to the articles which, as between the directors and the shareholders, justify the payments quarterly, yet the relations between Ansell and the company are determined by the agreement of Jan. 8, 1886, and that was for a yearly payment. I think, therefore, the £200 which, in the ordinary course, would have been paid on Oct. 1, was really a portion of the current salary, and as such cannot be recovered by a servant who has been dismissed for fraud.

The other conclusion at which I arrive is that the fraudulent conduct of Ansell was in law ample justification for his dismissal, in other words, that when the master discovered the fraudulent conduct on the part of the servant that gave him a plain right to dismiss that servant. I do not think that that proposition can for a moment be disputed. A number of arguments were addressed to us to induce us to come to the conclusion that this conduct of Ansell's was not truly of the character that I have described. The first is one that is set up by Mr. Ansell himself, to which I will briefly refer. He alleged that the contract between himself and the shipbuilding company was not a fraud upon the plaintiffs, because the formal parties to the contract were not the plaintiff company, but the directors as individuals. I regret to say that in pursuance of that view he has ventured in the course of these proceedings to pledge his oath to the statement that, with the exception of three commissions, not including the one in question, he had "not received any sum of money by way of commission, bonus, allowance, or otherwise from companies or persons from whom the plaintiff company made purchases or with whom they had dealings and transactions, and which accrued or became payable between the month of August, 1885, and October, 1886, inclusive." That statement was entirely false. When he swore that affidavit he had received the commission from Earle's, and he justifies that affidavit by the suggestion that this was not a dealing between the plaintiff company and Messrs. Earle. That fact is a very striking illustration of the straits to which men are driven who allow themselves to enter into transactions of this description, and do not disclose them to their principles. I am very glad to say that counsel who have given us the explanation of that affidavit did not address to us any argument to support the validity of such a contention. It is one to which I think attention should be called as showing the character of the transaction.

building of these trawlers and smacks, and that he gave attention to the fittings and so forth. I take an entirely different view of Mr. Ansell's duties. He became managing director, not from the date of his removal from Hull to Boston, but from the date of the registration of the company, and he received salary for that according to the express terms of the agreement. He was, therefore, engaged as managing director because of his special knowledge and skill, and so far as his special knowledge and skill were required to be employed in the building of these smacks it was unquestionably his duty to give it. First of all it is plain that there was no bargain between himself and the shipbuilding company that he should render this service. He did it as part of his general duty, but he received the commission because he stipulated for the commission. Then again he has relied on the stipulation contained in the contract between himself and Mr. Garfit, that he might be allowed to carry on any business of a nature not prejudicial to the interests of the company. But it is prejudicial to the interests of the company where a man whose duty it is to buy at the lowest price enters into a bargain which makes it his interest to buy at the highest. In fact all these cases put forward are mere dust thrown in the eyes of the court to endeavour to shut out the true nature of this transaction, which I repeat to my mind, is a grave and undoubted fraud.

Then it is said, and that is the view which weighed with the learned judge, that this is an isolated case. We have no other ground upon which we can conclude this to be an isolated case except the absence of success on the part of the plaintiffs in proving any other case except that to which I shall shortly refer, and the oath of Mr. Ansell that it is, and after the passage in the affidavit to which I have referred I can place very little reliance upon his statement. I do not feel judicially satisfied that it is an isolated case. Suppose it be, is that an excuse? Is a man to commit a gross fraud on his master, to conceal that fraud, and then when it is discovered to say that it is an isolated case, and, therefore, you cannot dismiss me? That is not according to my view of the law with regard to the relation of master and servant. I repeat, it seems to me the company were justified in law as well as in morality in discharging Mr. Ansell as a man who was not worthy of being trusted by them.

The only other points to which I need refer are shortly with regard to two contracts between the Hull Ice Co. and the Red Cross Co. and Mr. Ansell. With regard to these, the only point I think it at all necessary to refer to is the ingenious argument of junior counsel for the defendant, that with regard to the Red Cross Co. there was no evidence of the contract made by Mr. Ansell. According to my view it is not necessary that there should be evidence of a contract by Mr. Ansell. He undertook with the Red Cross Co. to use all his influence to promote their interests by entering as many smacks as might be upon the books of the company, and trading with them to as large an extent as he could. He was entitled to the bonus only on the terms of observing that obligation, and he received the bonus. By his act, therefore, and he has told us no doubt the truth, he did influence business to that company. Whether he influenced it by giving directions to the smack masters, or in however indirect a way, is immaterial. He has taken money upon the footing of bringing business to them, and after that it is impossible for us to say that he did not. With regard to the other points which have been dealt with by the lords justices, I content myself by saying that I concur entirely in everything that they have said.

LEESON v. GENERAL MEDICAL COUNCIL

Domestic Tribunal—Finality of decision—Jurisdiction of court—Consideration whether tribunal acted honestly within jurisdiction—Need to observe principles of natural justice—Bias—Disqualification for acting in judicial capacity—General Medical Council—Infamous conduct of medical practitioner—Removal from register.

When the proceedings of a domestic tribunal on an inquiry are brought before the court the only question the court can investigate is whether the tribunal acted honestly within its jurisdiction. The substantial elements of natural justice must be found to have been present at the proceedings of the tribunal. An accused person must have notice of that of which he is accused, and opportunity of being heard and of putting forward his case and dealing with the case which is made against him. The tribunal must hear and consider all relevant matters and arrive at an honest decision on the facts before them. If that is done, the court has no power to review the evidence given before the tribunal or to determine whether the tribunal came to a right conclusion.

A person who has a judicial duty to perform disqualifies himself from performing it if he has a pecuniary interest in the matter on which he has to adjudicate or a bias which renders him otherwise than an impartial judge. If he is an accuser, he must not be a judge. Where facts are established from which the inference is drawn that such a person has an interest in the decision of a case the law does not allow an inquiry whether or not his mind was actually biased by the interest. If he was interested in the decision, he could not properly act as judge.

Per FRY, L.J.: It is a matter of public policy, so far as is possible, that judicial proceedings should not only be free from the actual bias and prejudice of the judges, but that they should be free from the suspicion of bias or prejudice.

The plaintiff, a physician, was summoned before the General Medical Council, acting under the powers given to them by s. 29 of the Medical Act, 1858, to answer a complaint that he had been guilty of "infamous conduct in a professional respect." The inquiry had been set on foot by the Medical Defence Union, an association having for its objects the protection of members, the prevention of unprofessional conduct, and the punishment of offenders against medical law. The council proceeded with the inquiry, found the plaintiff guilty, and directed his name to be removed from the register. Two members of the council present at the meeting were members of the Defence Union. On a motion by the plaintiff to restrain the publication of the council's resolutions and the removal of his name from the register on the ground that the charge showed no offence over which the council had jurisdiction, and that the proceedings were invalid because two members of the Defence Union had taken part in the decision.

Held: the complaint was such that the council had jurisdiction to inquire into it, and, if the complaint were proved, to order the removal of the plaintiff's name from the register; the tribunal, which had to act judicially, had done so, having given full and fair consideration to the plaintiff's case, and so the court could not consider whether the decision of the council was right or wrong; (FRY, L.J., dissenting) the two members of the Defence Union were not interested in the decision of the council so as to be disqualified for adjudicating on the matter: and, therefore, the motion must be dismissed.

A Notes. The Medical Act, 1858, was repealed by the Medical Act, 1956, ss. 32 to 38 of which deal with the constitution and powers of the Disciplinary Committee of the General Medical Council and the erasure from and restoration to the register of the names of medical practitioners: see 36 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 597-603.

Appeal by the plaintiff, Joseph Frederick Leeson, a medical practitioner, from a decision of NORTH, J., on a motion by the plaintiff for an injunction to restrain the General Medical Council and John Marshall, on behalf of himself and all other members of the said council, from removing the plaintiff's name from the register of general practitioners until the trial of the action, and from publishing certain resolutions passed by them on Nov. 28, 1889, to the effect that the plaintiff had been guilty of "infamous conduct in a professional respect," A and directing their registrar to erase his name.

On Nov. 27, 1889, the council held an inquiry into a charge that had been preferred against Mr. Leeson of alleged "infamous conduct in a professional respect," the council purporting to proceed under s. 29 of the Act of 1858, which provided :

"If any registered medical practitioner shall be convicted in England or Ireland of any felony or misdemeanour, or in Scotland of any crime or offence, or shall after due inquiry be judged by the General Council to have been guilty of infamous conduct in any professional respect, the General Council may, if they see fit, direct the registrar to erase the name of such medical practitioner from the register." B C

After the members who conducted the inquiry had deliberated, the presiding member informed Mr. Leeson that the council had come to the conclusion :

"(i) That you have committed the offence charged against you; (ii) that the offence is, in the opinion of the council, 'infamous conduct in a professional respect;' and (iii) that the registrar has been directed to erase your name from the Medical Register." D

Notice of the charge which had been made against the plaintiff was given to him by a letter, dated Nov. 15, 1889, from the council's solicitor to the plaintiff in the following terms :

"On behalf of the General Medical Council, I give you notice that information and evidence has been laid before the council by which you are charged with having been guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect, the particulars of which alleged conduct are as follows: For that you, being a registered medical practitioner, do act as cover of, or by your presence, advice, and assistance do enable, one Cornelius Bennett Harness (an unqualified person) to carry on the business or profession of a medical electrician and to practise as if he were duly qualified, under the style of the 'Medical Battery Co, Ltd.,' and 'The Electropathic and Zander Institute,' at 52 Oxford Street, London, W., the said Cornelius Bennett Harness publicly advertising himself as the Medical Battery Co.'s consulting medical electrician. I am directed further to give you notice that on Nov. 27, 1889, a meeting of the General Medical Council will be held at 299 Oxford Street, London, W., at four o'clock in the afternoon, to consider the above-mentioned charge against you and decide whether or not they should direct your name to be removed from the 'Medical Register,' pursuant to s. 29 of the Medical Act, 1858. You are invited and required to answer in writing the above charges and to attend before the General Medical Council at the above-mentioned place and time to establish any denial or defence that you may have to make to the above-mentioned charges, and you are hereby informed that if you do not attend as required the General Medical Council may proceed to hear and decide upon the said charges in your absence. Any answer or other communication or application which you may desire to make respecting the said charges or your defence thereto must be addressed to the general registrar of the Medical Council and transmitted so as to reach him not less than three days before the day appointed for the hearing of the case. A copy of s. 29 of the Medical Act, 1858, and of a certain standing order of the General Medical Council, is enclosed herewith for your information. A copy of the evidence sent to the General Medical Council in support of the complaint is also enclosed." E F G H I

The inquiry had been set on foot at the instance of the Medical Defence Union—an incorporated association having for its objects the protection of its members, the prevention of unprofessional conduct, and the punishment of offenders against

A medical law. Two of the members of the General Medical Council who sat to adjudicate on the matter, namely, Dr. James Grey Glover and Mr. Thomas Pridgin Teale, were subscribers of 10s. per annum to the Medical Defence Union, and in that sense members of it, but they had nothing to do with its management. The proceedings before the council on Nov. 27, 1889, were opened by their solicitor, who stated the nature of the charges, and were afterwards conducted by the solicitor
B of the Medical Defence Union.

In giving judgment dismissing the motion, which was, as stated above, brought by the plaintiff, NORTH, J., said that the suggestion that there was not a proper charge giving jurisdiction to the General Medical Council failed and it was not open to him to reconsider the decision arrived at by the council. There was nothing to make it improper for Dr. Glover and Mr. Teale to adjudicate on the matter.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21, 1889. COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of NORTH, J., refusing to restrain the defendants, the General Medical Council, from acting on the resolution at which they arrived, which was that the name of the plaintiff be struck off the register of medical practitioners, and to prevent them from publishing that resolution. The General Medical Council is a body which is formed under the Medical Act, 1858. That Act was passed for the purpose of enabling persons requiring medical aid to distinguish qualified from unqualified practitioners. The General Medical Council is partly composed of medical men who are named by certain bodies, and partly of persons who are elected by the general body of medical men in the country, and some who are named by the Queen. They have certain
E powers given to them by the Act. The Act for the first time required that there should be a register, and that those only who are entered on the register can sue for and obtain payment of any money payable to them for medical attendance or medical fees. Section 29 contains a most important provision :

“If any registered medical practitioner shall after due inquiry be judged by G the General Council to have been guilty of infamous conduct in any professional respect, the General Council may, if they see fit, direct the registrar to erase the name of such medical practitioner from the register.”

G

That is what was done in this case by the council. Another section to which I ought to refer is s. 40, because it was a good deal referred to in argument. It enables criminal prosecutions to be taken against persons who falsely pretend to be registered practitioners [s. 31 of Medical Act, 1956], but the proceeding taken in this case was not with reference to that section. It was in exercise of the powers to which I have referred given by s. 29. There have been a good many points argued, and the first was that the matter in respect of which the General Medical Council have adjudicated or decided was not a matter within the powers H given to them by s. 29. The charge made against Dr. Leeson, and which was brought to his notice by writing according to the practice of the General Medical Council was this:

I

“For that you being a registered medical practitioner do act as cover of, or by your presence, advice, and assistance do enable one Cornelius Bennett Harness, an unqualified person, to carry on the business or profession of a medical electrician, and to practise as if he were duly qualified under the style of the Medical Battery Co., Ltd.”

It was said that there was nothing contained in this complaint which would justify the General Medical Council in exercising the powers given to them by s. 29. There was a good deal of verbal criticism ably pressed upon us as to the effect of what was done here. It was said that there was no allegation that Mr. Harness was practising as if he were duly qualified under the style of the Medical Battery Co., and that all that was suggested against him was that he represented himself to be a medical electrician. I cannot read the charge in that way. We know what a duly qualified man is in the Act. A person is duly qualified if he is on the register, and so duly qualified to obtain the benefit of the Act as regards the privileges which are conceded to medical men who are on the register. The register states what the different qualifications are in respect of which medical men can be put on the register. I have no doubt myself that this complaint does state that which would justify the General Medical Council (if on the facts they were satisfied of it) in coming to the conclusion that an offence had been committed of infamous conduct from a medical point of view, or, in the words of the Act, "infamous conduct in any professional respect." That, in my opinion, is the true construction of the words of the charges made against Dr. Leeson. It was found that he had been guilty of the acts which were charged against him, and then there was a direction to erase his name from the register.

There has been a good deal of question as to what took place, and we have had the evidence which was before the General Medical Council and the evidence in this action brought before us. In my opinion, it is wrong to consider whether the General Medical Council arrived at a right conclusion on the evidence which was brought before them. In my opinion, that is not for us. The General Medical Council cannot have, strictly, evidence. They cannot take evidence on oath. They cannot take evidence which we as lawyers have to consider as evidence. They have statements made before them in support of any complaint which is made, and also they have statements made on the other side by the medical men against whom the complaint is made. If it is once established that the complaint made before them does involve a matter in respect of which they can exercise the jurisdiction given them by s. 29, I think we ought not to look at the evidence or in any way consider whether they have arrived at the right conclusion.

If it was proved that the council acted corruptly, and that there was no statement made before them on which they could reasonably and honestly arrive at the conclusion at which they did arrive, then, no doubt, the matter would be different. In the present case, although there were some statements in the affidavits of the plaintiff that there was prejudice against him and so forth, that was not pressed upon us by his counsel, nor was it in any way supported by anything which was brought before us. Dr. Leeson seems to have had a most perfect consideration of his case. The complaint was brought forward in the ordinary mode required by the rules and regulations of the General Medical Council. He was present at the inquiry. He was represented by his solicitor and he brought his own witnesses, that is to say, those who were to make statements in support of his contention that in his conduct he had done nothing which was "infamous in a professional respect." Everything was fully heard and considered, and then the council arrived at the conclusion at which they did arrive. In my opinion, that being so, we cannot consider whether they are right or wrong. If they acted honestly, gave every opportunity for the person complained of to bring his statements before them, and fairly conducted the matter in question, in my opinion, we ought not to enter into the question. If we once do that we are assuming to judge whether they came to a right conclusion on the statements which were before them. In my opinion, therefore, the first ground which was taken in support of this application fails, because I think there was a charge which justified the council in coming to a conclusion under s. 29, and there was no reason for suggesting that the proceedings were improperly conducted by the council.

There was another point raised which gave us rather more doubt on the matter.

A It was suggested that this order made by the council must be considered as made by a non-competent tribunal. It was said that, taking the General Medical Council as acting judicially, they were so constituted on this occasion that any order made by them ought, having regard to the decisions which there have been, to be considered as a nullity. A complaint was made against Dr. Leeson. That complaint was brought in the name of the Medical Defence Union, and two of the members of the council who were present when the case of Dr. Leeson was considered, were members of the Medical Defence Union. It was said that, that being so, those persons are to be considered in the light of prosecutors, that they could not also sit as judges of the matter, and that, therefore any decision at which the council arrived when there were present these two members who were incompetent to act as judges in the matter must be considered as a nullity.

B The rule is very plain, that no man can be plaintiff or prosecutor in any proceeding and at the same time sit to adjudicate on the matters raised in the proceeding. In other words, no man can sit in judgment when he has put himself in the position of a prosecutor or complainant. To my mind it is clear that the General Medical Council, in respect of the complaint against Dr. Leeson, were acting judicially. They were not in the ordinary sense judges, but they had to decide judicially whether or not the complaint against Dr. Leeson was well founded. They could, if they considered it was well founded, make an order which would deprive him from being on the register, with very important consequences.

E But one has to consider this: Were either of these two gentlemen—Mr. Teale and Dr. Glover—to be considered as complainants in this case? I must look a little at the facts connected with the Medical Defence Union. The Medical Defence Union was a company limited by guarantee under the Companies Acts. One of its objects was “to support and protect the character and interests of medical practitioners practising in the United Kingdom.” Another was “to promote honourable practice, and to suppress or prosecute unauthorised practitioners.” Then “to advise and defend, or assist in defending, members of the union in cases where proceedings involving questions of professional principle, or otherwise, are brought against them.” So that the object of the Medical Defence Union was not only to prosecute those who offended against the Act, but also to defend those against whom charges were brought unreasonably. Under the articles there was set up a council of the union, and what they had to do was defined by the articles thus:

G “The objects for which the union is established, as set forth in the memorandum of association, shall be carried out in the manner provided by these articles, provided that the second of the objects of the union, as there set forth, so far as relates to the suppression or prosecution of unauthorised practitioners shall not in any case be acted upon without the sanction of a unanimous resolution of the council, confirmed by a majority of members present and voting at a general meeting.”

H I mention that because, although we are not now considering a prosecution under the Act, that is a limit on the power of the council. Except in that respect there is no limit on the power of the council, who can do everything which is not expressly, or by Act of Parliament, required to be done by the whole body. I Neither Mr. Teale nor Dr. Glover were members of the council; they were members of the union by subscribing 10s. a year, and by giving a guarantee, the amount of which we do not know, which was to provide any expense which would be necessary in order to carry out the objects of the association. The powers of the council are referred to in art. 36:

“The management of the business and the control of the union shall be vested in the council, who, in addition to the powers and authorities of these articles expressly conferred on them, may exercise all such powers and do all such acts and things as may be exercised or done by the union, and are not hereby or by statute expressly directed or required to be exercised or done by the union in general meeting." A

This complaint made against Dr. Leeson was brought forward by the council, to which neither of these two members of the General Medical Council belonged. They were not upon it, and they could not, having regard to the articles, exercise any control or give any direction as to what should be done by the council in bringing forward this complaint. Are they as members in any way interested? The expenses of this complaint could not be thrown by the General Medical Council on Dr. Leeson, the person complained of. They had no power to give any costs, and, therefore, whatever might be the result of this complaint made against him would not in any way affect the liability of Mr. Teale and Dr. Glover to contribute anything to the expenses of this proceeding. In my opinion, as regards the question whether they are to be considered as complainants here, we ought to look to substance. We ought not, because this complaint is brought by the council of the union in the name of the union, to say that a person, a member of the union, who has nothing to do and can have nothing to do with bringing forward the complaint, is to be treated as a prosecutor or as one of the persons who is bringing forward the complaint. "Prosecutor" was the term sometimes used in the argument, but sometimes objected to. I use it for the sake of simplicity. Therefore, it cannot be said that these two members were incompetent to act because they were adjudicating upon a complaint brought forward by themselves. As I have already shown, there can be no pecuniary interest, and no bias in that respect either from any pecuniary liability which was thrown upon them, or anything of that kind. Whichever way it was determined, their liability to contribute to the expenses would be just the same. As regards the objects of the union I give no opinion whether it is desirable to form such unions. The objects are just as much to defend those who are improperly attacked, as to bring before the General Medical Council any questions which may throw reflection on the conduct of any member of the profession. So that Mr. Teale and Dr. Glover are not, in my opinion, to be considered as complainants here—as persons who are bringing forward a charge. There was hardly any contention that their position as members of the union did involve a bias which would prevent them from adjudicating on this matter of Dr. Leeson. B C D E F

Numerous cases were quoted, but, in the view which I take of the matter, it is only necessary to advert to one, which probably is the strongest in favour of Dr. Leeson, namely, R. v. Allan (1). There certain gentlemen, riparian owners and owners of salmon fishing, and some who were outsiders, formed themselves into a body, but were not in any way incorporated. All of them apparently were to have equal power. There was a committee formed which was to direct prosecutions. Three magistrates were sitting on the Bench when a question was brought before them. They were members of this association which had been formed. One of them was a member of the committee, and had directed the prosecution. There was no doubt, therefore, that he was a prosecutor in the matter which was brought before the magistrates for decision, nor could there be any doubt that, having regard to the principles laid down, the conviction which resulted was bad. The other two magistrates had nothing to do with that committee, and were only members of the association. That was the principal point relied on in the present case. But COCKBURN, C.J., uses language which, no doubt, would seem to show that, even if only those magistrates who were members of the association, and not on the committee, had been on the Bench, the conviction would have been bad. What he said was this (4 B. & S. at p. 922): G H I

"Certain members of that association were present as justices, and took part in this conviction. They were essentially prosecutors, being members of an association the aggregate of which were undoubtedly the prosecutors."

A I do not think that the language of judges ought to be taken without reference to the facts of the case, and, although COCKBURN, C.J., does use that large expression, yet BLACKBURN and MELLOR, JJ., do not use language which can be even tortured into showing that, if any member of the association had been on the Bench at the time, that would have vitiated the proceedings. BLACKBURN, J., said (ibid. at p. 924):

C “One of the justices who joined in the conviction, being a member of the committee of the association which instituted the proceedings, was one of the prosecutors. There may be difficulty in finding magistrates in this neighbourhood who are not interested to hear such an information, but members of the association which institutes the prosecution must not act as judges upon it.”

There, I think, he puts it that the conviction was bad because one member of the committee, who were the prosecutors, was sitting on the Bench. MELLOR, J.'s, language, fairly interpreted, leads, I think, to the same conclusion. I should not follow COCKBURN, C.J., in a case like the present even if he did intend to say by the language he used that the conviction would have been bad if any one of the members of the association (who had nothing to do with the prosecution, and could not have) had been on the committee. Here neither Mr. Teale nor Dr. Glover had, or could have had, any voice at all in this prosecution, and they, according to the evidence, knew nothing about it till the matter was brought before them as members of the General Medical Council. In my opinion, this objection, which is a most serious one, cannot prevail, and we ought to hold that NORTH, J., was right in refusing the injunction.

G
H BOWEN, L.J.—As to the first point raised by the appeal I shall say very little in addition to what the lord justice has already stated. These proceedings were in the nature of judicial proceedings, although the forum is a domestic one, and although the evidence taken before such forum differs in many respects from evidence which is adduced in a court of law, and in particular in the all-important respect that it is not given upon oath. What the court alone can investigate when proceedings of the General Medical Council of this character are brought before them is whether the domestic forum has acted honestly within its jurisdiction. The jurisdiction is defined by the statute. There must be an allegation before the General Medical Council of “infamous conduct in a professional respect,” and adjudication must be arrived at after due inquiry. The statute says nothing more. But, in saying so much, the statute certainly imports that the substantial elements of natural justice must be found to have been present at the inquiry. There must be due inquiry. The accused person must have notice of what he is accused. He must have an opportunity of being heard, and the decision must be honestly arrived at after he has had a full opportunity of being heard.

I With respect to the charge made in the present case, the charge of which Dr. Leeson had notice, it is a charge of “infamous conduct in a professional respect,” and the particulars which should be brought to his attention in order to enable him to meet that charge ought to be particulars of conduct which, if established, is capable of being viewed by honest persons as conduct which is infamous. That is all. We have seen that in the present case those conditions have been fulfilled by the tribunal which held the inquiry. The functions of the court of law are, therefore, at an end. We have no power to review the evidence any more than we have a power to say whether the tribunal came to the right conclusion. If indeed it could be shown that nothing was brought before the tribunal which could raise in the minds of honest persons the inference that infamous conduct had been established, that would go to show that the inquiry had not been a due inquiry. But, if there is no blot of that kind upon the proceedings, the jurisdiction of the domestic tribunal—which has been clothed by the legislature with the duty of discipline in respect of a great profession—must be left untouched by courts of law. It appears to me for these reasons that the view which COTTON, L.J., has expressed is a sound one, and I entirely concur with it. A

Next comes a very serious question, viz., whether or not the tribunal which adjudicated in respect of the plaintiff's conduct was rendered incompetent by the fact that two of its members had taken part as accusers before the council of the very person upon whose conduct they were adjudicating. As the lord justice has said, nothing can be clearer than the principle of law that a person who has a judicial duty to perform disqualifies himself for performing it if he has a pecuniary interest in the decision which he is about to give, or a bias which renders him otherwise than an impartial judge. If he is an accuser, he must not be a judge. If he has a pecuniary interest in the success of the accusation, he must not be a judge. Where such a pecuniary interest exists the law does not allow any further inquiry whether or not the mind was actually biased by the pecuniary interest. The fact is established from which the inference is drawn that he is interested in the decision, and he cannot act as a judge. But it must be in all cases a question of substance and of fact whether one of the judges has in truth also been an accuser. B

The question which has to be answered by the court in such a case as the present must be: Has the judge whose impartiality is impugned taken any part in the prosecution either by himself or by his agents? I think it is to be regretted that these two gentlemen as soon as they found that the person who was accused was a person against whom a complaint was being alleged by the council of a society to which they subscribed, and to which they in law belonged as members, did not at once retire from the General Medical Council. I think it is to be regretted, because judges, like Cæsar's wife, should be above suspicion, and in the minds of strangers the position which they occupied upon the General Medical Council was one which required explanation. Whatever may be the result of this litigation, I trust that in future the General Medical Council will think it reasonable advice that those who sit on these cases should cease to occupy a position of subscribers to a society which brings them before the council. But, having said that, I come back to the point which we have to decide, viz., whether those two gentlemen took any part whatever in the prosecution, either by themselves or their agents. It appears to me, in spite of the cloud which the ingenuity of the plaintiff's counsel raised upon the point, that the true answer upon the facts here must be in the negative. I think, although they were members of the body whose council did bring this complaint before the General Medical Council, they did not themselves take any part, and could not have taken any part, in the prosecution which was not conducted by the council of the union as their agents. The council was supreme in the matter, and I think that they stand clear, upon the facts being investigated, of all suspicion whatsoever. Treating the latter part of the case as one which depends upon an inference of fact, and regretting as I do that there should be colour for the suggestion that has been made and that a controversy should accordingly have arisen which required to be investigated with the care which we have brought to bear upon it, I think that, as a matter of substance and of fact, these gentlemen were not accusers on this occasion. The appeal, therefore, in my judgment, must be dismissed with costs. E

I

FRY, L.J.—Two questions have been argued before us. The first was a question whether the charge which was laid before the General Medical Council was one which was within the jurisdiction of that council. With all that has been said by my learned brothers on that part of the case I entirely concur. I shall add nothing to what they have so fully and clearly expressed.

Then comes the second question, whether, having regard to the fact that two members of the council were subscribers to what is known as the Medical Defence

A Union, the council as constituted was competent to determine the charge. There are two subordinate points there. In the first place, I cannot for one moment yield to the argument which was addressed to us by the leading counsel for the General Medical Council, that they were not acting judicially in the performance of their duties on the occasion in question. The nature of the proceedings and the effect of the proceedings seems to me to be very strong to show that it must be a
B judicial proceeding, because the result was to deprive Dr. Leeson of rights which before that were vested in him as a duly qualified medical man on the register of the General Medical Council. Further than that, the language of the statute, if it be necessary to refer to it, is, in my judgment, equally clear. It requires a due inquiry. It requires a judgment. It requires that that judgment shall find the accused guilty. Inquiry and judgment and guilt are all words which
C express a proper form of judicial proceeding. Therefore, although this body proceeds by different rules of evidence from those on which the courts of law proceed, I cannot for a moment doubt that the General Medical Council were proceeding judicially. Nor can I help adding that the manner in which the General Medical Council has proceeded in this inquiry, as on all other inquiries, shows that the D General Medical Council are fully conscious that they are performing judicial duties, and endeavour evidently to perform them in a very admirable manner.

It was urged before us that the Medical Defence Union were not in fact complainants. It was said that the General Medical Council could proceed without any prosecutor or person acting before it—that is to say, they might proceed mero motu. That is quite true. It is, however, equally true that in this case they did not
E proceed mero motu, but proceeded in this manner. They allowed the solicitor and the honorary secretary of the Medical Defence Union to appear before them in the character of complainants—a course which seems to me to have been a very convenient one to pursue. It is not unworthy of remark that at the very same meeting of the General Medical Council at which these proceedings were taken against Dr. Leeson, rules in respect of the procedure at such inquiries were passed
F by the General Medical Council, which divided themselves into two classes of cases. Where the inquiry is brought before the General Medical Council by a complainant, and the complainant appears personally or by counsel, or solicitor, then a certain order of procedure was required, and that order of procedure followed very nearly the procedure before a court. It gave the complainant an opportunity to state his case and produce his proofs. Then the accused was to be invited
G to state his case and to produce his proofs, and there was an opportunity given for a reply in certain cases. The second class of cases was where no complainant appeared. There the General Medical Council proceeded simply by reading the complaint, and calling on the accused practitioner to state his case and produce his evidence.

It is evident, therefore, that the Medical Defence Union, either as a whole or H by their executive, were proceeding as complainants and as quasi-prosecutors in this inquiry. No doubt the Medical Defence Union acts through its council, its executive body, and this proceeding was taken by the executive body, who were represented, as I have already stated, by their solicitor and the honorary secretary. They acted, in fact, as prosecutors, producing the evidence and stating the case, and urging what was to be said for the prosecution or quasi-prosecution. To that union
I two of the members of the General Medical Council who sat upon this case, and, therefore, took part in this decision, were subscribers. It may be taken that this prosecution—I call it a “prosecution” for the sake of brevity—was within the objects of the union. It appears to me that subscribing to a union of this description implies two things. It implies, first, a general sympathy with the objects of the union, and, secondly, a confidence in the discretion of the executive body who have to carry on the business of that union. No doubt the amount of confidence and the amount of sympathy may vary in different cases and from time to time with the same subscribers. But that is the natural conclusion, I think, one arrives at, when one finds that a person subscribes to an association for carrying on prosecutions. A

That, in my opinion, makes the subscriber to an association of this kind what has been called a virtual prosecutor. Of course he is not an actual prosecutor; he is not before the tribunal in propria persona: he has not even given instructions to the solicitor who appears. But he has shown his sympathy and his confidence in the body who are acting. I cannot think that a body of subscribers to a union of this description could form a satisfactory body of judges to determine the proceedings taken by the union itself. Taking that view of the case, I cannot shut my eyes to the fact, which judges know as well as everybody else, that there are in this country numerous associations formed for the purpose of carrying on prosecutions in respect of alleged violations of the law of various kinds. They may be in respect of violations or alleged violations of rights of fishery in a river, as in the river Tees case (R. v. Allan (1)), or they may be violations or alleged violations of the laws which restrain cruelty towards animals, or they may be violations or alleged violations of the ecclesiastical laws. It appears to me that subscribers to those associations indicate their sympathy with the general proceedings of the body carrying on those prosecutions, and I think they come within the description which has been laid down of virtual prosecutors. B

To my mind, this point is determined by authority—I do not say authority binding on us, but authority which I think deserves the utmost respect and consideration. I mean the case to which COTTON, L.J., has referred of R. v. Allan (1). There there was a voluntary association of persons which consisted of two classes—ordinary members who were the owners of riverside property or occupiers of the rights of fishing in the river Tees and its tributaries; secondly, honorary members who might be desirous of promoting the objects of the association by contributing to its funds and were, as I understand, not riparian proprietors or owners of rights of fishing in the Tees. That body acted as most of these bodies do, through a committee. That committee was not only to make byelaws and rules and regulations, but they were the persons to engage and dismiss watchers, and, in the event of proceedings under the Act being considered necessary, the committee were to instruct the secretary to enforce its provisions. The secretary and treasurer were, subject to the approval of the committee, to determine what proceedings should be taken against any person acting in contravention of the law. The ordinary members, therefore, and the honorary members had nothing whatever to do with instituting the prosecution or appointing watchers. The person who laid the information in that case was a watcher of the association. Therefore, he was engaged and liable to dismissal, not by the general body, but by the committee. The magistrates who sat on the bench to hear that complaint were three—Mr. Allan was an ordinary member, and the owner of property having a frontage to the river, Mr. Smith, who was not only an ordinary member, but also an active member of the committee and had been concerned in a resolution which authorised the committee to take proceedings for the recovery of such penalties as in their opinion had been incurred at the defendant's locks, and, lastly, Mr. Pease, who was not an ordinary member, but only a subscribing member of the association. Those were the three justices. E
G
H

In what way did the court deal with the application to quash the conviction on the ground that the magistrates were the virtual prosecutors? COCKBURN, C.J., said (4 B. & S. at p. 922): I

“It is impossible to hold consistently with the principles which have been established by decided cases, and are founded in the very essence of justice, that these magistrates were competent judges upon the occasion in question.”

Observe that he does not hold that one magistrate is disqualified, but he holds that all three were disqualified according to the essential principles of justice. The learned judge proceeds thus:

“An information was laid against the defendant for the violation of the provisions of an Act of Parliament passed for the protection of salmon fisheries. . . . Certain members of that association were present as justices [again dealing with them all individually] and took part in this conviction; they were essentially prosecutors being members of an association the aggregate of which were undoubtedly the prosecutors.”

BLACKBURN, J., in my opinion, notwithstanding what has been said by COTTON, L.J., took the same view. He deals, no doubt, in the first place, with the case of Mr. Smith, who was a member of the committee, but he goes on to add this (ibid. at p. 924):

“There may be difficulty in finding magistrates in this neighbourhood who are not interested to hear such an information; but members of the association which institutes the prosecution must not act as judges upon it.”

In other words, he says neither an ordinary nor an honorary member of this association can act as a judge upon the matter. Every subscriber to that association appears to me, in the view of these two learned judges, disqualified from sitting as judge or acting as judge on that complaint.

I think, therefore, that is a decision which, in point of substance and principle, applies to the present case. It is not binding upon us, but, in my view, that decision is right, and I think it ought to be upheld and applied to the present case. I think it is a matter of public policy, so far as is possible, that judicial proceedings should not only be free from the actual bias and prejudice of the judges, but that they should be free from the suspicion of bias or prejudice; and I do not think that subscribers to associations for the purpose of carrying on prosecutions can be said to be free from suspicion of bias or prejudice in the cases of prosecutions instituted by the association to which they subscribe. It is needless for me to disclaim any intention, in arriving at that conclusion, of holding that the two gentlemen in question were liable to any bias. That appears to me a point which is not really open to us, because I rest my decision on the ground of public policy, and I disclaim any right to inquire whether in fact they were or they were not biased. I need hardly say that I do not believe they were. It was urged that R. v. Allan is not conclusive, and is not in point, because it was said that there the association was not an incorporated one, and in the present case it is incorporated. That, in my judgment, has nothing to do with the case. Corporation or incorporation is quite immaterial in considering the operation upon the mind of being a member of a union for the purpose of carrying on prosecutions. I think, therefore, that we should be misled by a trivial and immaterial difference if we gave any effect to that.

If the matter, therefore, rested with me, I should have held that the decision of the General Medical Council in this case was invalid, and that the council as constituted on the occasion in question was not competent to decide on it, and in so doing I think that I should best maintain the dignity, and, therefore, the usefulness of the General Medical Council. My learned brethren are of the opposite opinion, and, therefore, this appeal will be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

ALLCARD v. SKINNER

Undue Influence—Gift to religious body—Need of independent advice—“Religious influence most dangerous and powerful”—No proof of actual exercise of influence.

The court will set aside a voluntary gift (i) where the court is satisfied that the gift was the result of influence expressly used by the donee for the purpose, or (ii) where the relations between the donor and the donee have at or shortly before the execution of the gift been such as to raise a presumption that the donee had influence over the donor; in such a case the court sets aside the gift unless it is proved that it was the spontaneous act of the donor acting in circumstances which enabled him to exercise an independent will and justifies the court in holding that the gift was the result of a free exercise of the donor's will and was not brought about by any undue influence on the part of the donee. The first class of these cases may be considered as depending on the principle that no one shall be allowed to retain any benefit arising from his own fraud or wrongful act. In the second class of case the court interferes, not on the ground that any wrongful act has been committed by the donee, but on the ground of public policy and to prevent the relations which existed between the parties and the influence arising therefrom being abused. Equity will not allow a person who exercises or enjoys a dominant religious influence over another to benefit, directly or indirectly, by the gifts which the donor makes under or in consequence of such influence unless it be shown that the donor, at the time of making the gift, was allowed full and free opportunity for counsel and advice outside, and the means of considering his or her worldly position, and of exercising an independent will about it. The influence of one mind over another is very subtle, and of all influences religious influence is the most dangerous and the most powerful. To counteract it courts of equity have gone very far. They have not shrunk from setting aside gifts made to persons in a position to exercise undue influence over the donors although there has been no proof of the actual exercise of such influence. The courts have done this on the avowed ground of the necessity of going this length in order to protect persons from the exercise of such influence in circumstances which render proof of it impossible.

In 1867 the plaintiff, an unmarried woman aged 27, sought as a confessor N., a clergyman who was the spiritual director of a Church of England sisterhood. In 1868, on his introduction, she became an associate of the sisterhood, and as such, without becoming a member of the body or residing with the sisters, she joined in their charitable work. In January, 1870, she became a postulant, that is, a member of the lowest order of the sisterhood. In April, 1870, she became a novice. In 1871 she was admitted a full member of the sisterhood, embracing for life vows which enjoined (i) poverty, that is, denuding herself of all her present and future property, either in favour of the sisterhood or otherwise; (ii) obedience; and (iii) chastity. She also agreed to the rules of the sisterhood, one of which forbade a member of the sisterhood to communicate with any person outside the sisterhood except by leave of the mother superior. While a sister, and without independent advice, she made gifts of money and stock to the mother superior on behalf of the sisterhood. In 1879 she left the sisterhood and joined the Roman Catholic Church,

In 1884, hearing that another woman, on leaving the sisterhood, had obtained the return of the money which she had given to the sisterhood, the plaintiff claimed the return of the stock which she had given. In 1885 the present proceedings were begun against the mother superior for declarations that the plaintiff had been induced by undue influence to make over the property to the mother superior who held it as trustee for her.

Held: (i) the equitable title of the mother superior to the property given by the plaintiff was imperfect by reason of her influence over the plaintiff which inevitably resulted from her position, and so the gifts made by the plaintiff were voidable; but (ii) (COTTON, L.J., dissenting) the delay and conduct of the plaintiff after leaving the sisterhood were such as to disentitle her to recover.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 9, 1887. The following judgments were read.

COTTON, L.J.—This was an action brought to set aside certain gifts made by the plaintiff to the defendant, Miss Skinner, while the plaintiff was a member of a sisterhood of which the defendant was the lady superior. KEKEWICH, J., dismissed the action with costs.

The plaintiff, by her action, sought to recover two sums of stock transferred by her to the defendant in the year 1874, which still remained in the name of the defendant, and also all moneys other than annual income which had been from time to time given by the plaintiff to the defendant, and which had been expended by the defendant for the charitable purposes in which the plaintiff and the other members of the sisterhood had been engaged. On the appeal the claim of the plaintiff was confined to the sums of stock still remaining in the name of the defendant.

The history of the case begins in 1868. At that time the defendant, Miss Skinner, was the lady superior of an institution or sisterhood, which was an association of ladies who devoted themselves to works of charity, with the assistance of and under the spiritual direction of the Rev. Mr. Nihill, who was the vicar of St. Michael's, Mark Street, Finsbury. In 1868 the plaintiff, who was then residing with her mother, became an associate of the sisterhood, and joined in the charitable work in which they were engaged, but did not reside with them. However, in January, 1870, she became a postulant, in May of that year a novice, and in August, 1871, she became a professed sister, and as such took the vows. I understand that at this time the rules which are in evidence had not been reduced into writing, but it is conceded that the principles on which the sisterhood was conducted were the same as those afterwards expressed in the rules, and that the rules may be considered as expressing in detail the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience which the plaintiff took when she became a professed sister. Though the vow of poverty required that a sister should not hold any property, yet neither the vow nor the rules required that the property owned by any sister before she became professed should be made over to the superior or to the sisterhood. The obedience was to be rendered to the superior; but, although it is necessary that a sister should be obedient to the orders of the superior in any work like that in which the sisterhood was engaged, yet I cannot but express my doubt as to the propriety of the absolute submission required by the rules to the will of the superior, and I regret the terms in which the rules expressed the obedience which was required. Certainly the rules imposed the most absolute submission by the sisters to the superior, and prevented a sister from obtaining without leave the advice or counsel of any person not connected with the sisterhood.

After the plaintiff became a professed sister she from time to time handed over to the defendant the income to which she was entitled under her father's will, and also the capital moneys, as she was entitled to receive them, under that will. The capital moneys amounted to about £8,000, and of this she handed over to the defendant sums exceeding £7,000, of which the sums of stock amounting to £500 ordinary stock of the Midland Railway Co. and £1,171 four per cent. Caledonian Railway stock, still remaining in the hands of the defendant, are part. The remainder had been expended for the purposes of the sisterhood before the action was brought. The stock was transferred by the plaintiff in 1874. It is probable that this is a portion of the father's estate which was then divisible. There is no evidence as to what took place at the time when the transfer was in fact made. It is urged by the defendant's counsel that there is no difference between the claim of the plaintiff to the stock remaining and her claim to the moneys given by her to the defendant and applied by her to the purposes of the sisterhood. If the money so expended had been applied by the transferee for her own selfish purposes, or had been obtained by fraud or deception on the part of the donee, probably this would have been the case. But if the plaintiff has an equity to set aside gifts made to the defendant, in my opinion, the defendant would have a stronger equity against the plaintiff, to prevent her from making the defendant personally liable for money spent by her for the charitable purposes to promote which the plaintiff and defendant were at the time of the expenditure associated, and which the plaintiff was at the time willing and anxious to promote.

Is the plaintiff entitled to recall the stock now in question and still in hand? There is no decision in point with reference to a case like the present. For, although in Whyte v. Meade (1) a deed of gift by a nun was set aside, there were in that case special circumstances which prevent it being treated as an authority in favour of the plaintiff. The question is: Does the case fall within the principles laid down by the decisions of the Court of Chancery in setting aside voluntary gifts executed by parties who at the time were under such influence as, in the opinion of the court, enable the donor afterwards to set the gift aside? These decisions may be divided into two classes—(i) Where the court has been satisfied that the gift was the result of influence expressly used by the donee for the purpose; (ii) where the relations between the donor and donee have at or shortly before the execution of the gift been such as to raise a presumption that the donee had influence over the donor. In such a case the court sets aside the voluntary gift, unless it is proved that in fact the gift was the spontaneous act of the donor acting under circumstances which enabled him to exercise an independent will, and justifies the court in holding that the gift was the result of a free exercise of the donor's will. The first class of cases may be considered as depending on the principle that no one shall be allowed to retain any benefit arising from his own fraud or wrongful act. In the second class of cases the court interferes, not on the ground that any wrongful act has in fact been committed by the donee, but on the ground of public policy, and to prevent the relations which existed between the parties and the influence arising therefrom being abused. Both the defendant and Mr. Nihill have stated that they used no influence to induce the plaintiff to make the gift in question, and there is no suggestion that the defendant acted from any selfish motive, and it cannot be contended that the case comes under the first class of decisions to which I have referred.

The question is whether the case comes within the principle of the second class, and I am of opinion that it does. At the time of the gift the plaintiff was a professed sister, and, as such, bound to make absolute submission to the defendant as superior of the sisterhood. She had no power to obtain independent advice, she was in such a position that she could not freely exercise her own will as to the disposal of her property, and she must be considered as being (to use the words of KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., in Wright v. Vanderplank (2)) "not in the largest and amplest sense of the term, not in mind as well as person, an entirely free agent." We have nothing to do with the plaintiff's reason for leaving the sisterhood; but, in my opinion, when she exercised her legal right to do this she was entitled to recover so much of the fund transferred by her as remained in the hands of the defendant, on the ground that it was property the beneficial interest in which she had never effectually parted with. It was urged that it would be contrary to public policy to grant the plaintiff relief, on the ground that it would be a hindrance to the charitable work in which the plaintiff and the sisterhood were engaged, and that it would be better to show those who were desirous of leaving the work that they could not take with them any part of their property. But, in my opinion, it would be wrong to put such pressure on those who may wish to leave. Such work to be effectual must be done with a willing mind, and, in my opinion, it would be productive of evil to attempt to retain in such a society as the sisterhood, by the pressure of loss of property, those whose heart and will are no longer in the work, and who desire to exercise their legal right of withdrawing.

But it is contended, and KEKEWICH, J., decided against the plaintiff on this ground, that she had competent advice, that of her brother, before she joined the sisterhood, that she then formed the resolution (as Mr. Nihill stated in his evidence) to give everything to the sisterhood, and that this prevents the subsequent transfer being set aside. In my opinion, even if there were evidence that she had, before she joined the sisterhood, advice on the question of how she should deal with her property, that would not be sufficient. The question is, I think, whether at the time when she executed the transfer she was under such influence as to prevent the gift being considered as that of one free to determine what should be done with her property. No reliance can be placed on the promise made to Mr. Nihill [that the plaintiff would devote her property to the service of the poor]. This could not be enforced, and did not in any way bind her in law, or pass the property; and the title of the defendant depends solely on the transfer made in 1874. In my opinion, when the plaintiff left the sisterhood in 1879, she was entitled to set aside the transfer, and to have re-transferred to her the fund still held by the defendant.

Has she lost this right by delay? The case is not like that of a contract voidable for fraud. There the party defrauded must elect, and within a reasonable time, for, until he does so, he retains the right or the benefits, however inadequate, secured to him by the contract. It is to such a case that the judgment in Clough v. London and North Western Rail. Co. (3) applies, and not to a case of voluntary gift like the present, where the person seeking to set aside the transfer never received any benefit whatever from the transaction. There was an attempt to show that in consequence of the plaintiff's delay in bringing the action the defendant, and the sisterhood which she represents, had incurred liabilities on the faith of retaining the money given by the plaintiff. But I can find no evidence to support this contention. Counsel for the defendant contended that in 1883 a lease was taken for the sisterhood at a rent exceeding that for which it had been previously liable. But the lease, if it was of the suggested date, is not in evidence, and the evidence attributes the taking of a larger piece of land at the increased rent to the reliance of Mr. Nihill on the expectations formed in 1870 or 1879, based on the plaintiff's promises that she would give her property to the sisterhood. This defence, in my opinion, fails.

Is the delay (and in this case it was very great) of itself sufficient to deprive the plaintiff of her right to the fund now in the defendant's hands? The defendant has not pleaded the Statute of Limitations, and I do not suggest that she could have successfully done so. In cases where the fact of influence depends on the result of conflicting evidence, delay must be important, but it cannot be disputed that the plaintiff was in a state which necessarily subjected her to a powerful influence. The proof of this does not depend on parol evidence, but on the rules and admitted principles of the sisterhood. Mere delay in enforcing a right is not in itself a defence. It is very different from raising no objection to an act while it is being done, which may be treated as assent to the act, and, therefore, as being acquiescence so as to be an equitable defence. The judgment of THESIGER, L.J., in De Bussche v. Alt (4) is in point. In Wright v. Vanderplank (2), which was much relied upon as regards delay, the action was not brought until ten years after the execution of the deed sought to be set aside, yet TURNER, L.J., says (8 De G.M. & G. at p. 149) :

“As to the time which has elapsed, if the case had rested on time only, much might have been said in favour of the plaintiff’s claim,” and in dismissing the action he relied on the way in which the donor had during the period subsequent to the execution of the deed dealt with the property as recognising the deed as effectual. Moreover, delay in asserting rights cannot be in equity a defence unless the plaintiff was aware of her rights. In her evidence she stated that until long after 1879 she did not know that she could set aside the gift. A letter of June, 1879, was relied on to displace this statement. But the terms of that letter, though apparently inconsistent with her evidence, are ambiguous, and the letter was not put to her in cross-examination. Also it was in evidence that shortly after she left the sisterhood she had some conversation with her brother about her money and with a Roman Catholic priest, who advised her not to trouble herself about it; and also that shortly after she left the sisterhood she consulted with a solicitor as to making a fresh will, and that he told her “it was too much money to leave behind her.” But I understand that KEKEWICH, J., did not discredit her evidence as to the time when she first was informed of her right to set aside the gifts to the defendant, and I think that we ought to hold that she did not, until long after 1879, know her rights.

The delay which has occurred since 1879 is, I think, a defence against any claim on behalf of the plaintiff to the dividends on the stock now in the name of the defendant before the commencement of the action. But, in my opinion, it is no defence as regards the stock remaining in the hands of the defendant and the dividends accrued since the commencement of the action. At the time when the plaintiff left the sisterhood in 1879 that stock was property which the plaintiff was entitled to claim, as being held by the defendant in trust for her. The delay in this case does not, in my opinion, amount to evidence that the plaintiff recognised the gift as her own spontaneous act, and, in my opinion, it cannot be relied upon as having deprived the defendant of any evidence in her favour which could have been adduced if the plaintiff had brought her action shortly after she had left the sisterhood. In my opinion, the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for re-transfer to her of the stock in question and for payment of the dividends accrued since the commencement of the action.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In 1867 the plaintiff was living with her mother in London, and, on the recommendation of some clergyman, the plaintiff went to the Rev. Mr. Nihill, vicar of St. Michael’s, Finsbury, for confession, and asked him for work in his parish of Shoreditch. By him she was introduced to the defendant Miss Skinner, who was then, and is still, the lady superior of the sisterhood of St. Mary at the Cross. Shortly afterwards—i.e., in 1868—the plaintiff joined the sisterhood as an associate, and at about this time she promised Mr. Nihill to devote her property to the service of the poor. She explained to him that she had not much property then, but that she would have more, and she said she would bring all into the sisterhood. This promise, Mr. Nihill tells us, he considered binding upon her conscience; and it is plain that the plaintiff herself so considered it. But this promise was purely gratuitous, and it does not appear that the plaintiff ever knew that the promise in question was not binding upon her in point of law; her evidence shows that she did not realise its full meaning, or the position she would find herself in if she should ever desire to leave the sisterhood. Such an event never occurred to her as one which could ever happen.

In 1870 the plaintiff became a postulant, and later in the same year a novice, and finally in August, 1871, a sister. Each of these steps was accompanied by religious services, and bound the plaintiff more and more closely to the sisterhood, and alienated her more and more from the world at large. When the plaintiff became a postulant she ceased to reside with her mother, and resided with the sisterhood, and while a postulant she made a will, by which she left the whole of her property to the sisterhood. This was done at the request of the lady superior. The will, when made, was laid upon the altar, and was regarded as a consecrated document. Why, is not explained, and is left to inference. The only reason I can suggest for such a step is to impress the plaintiff that she was doing a very solemn thing, and one which was never to be undone. The will laid upon the altar and consecrated would, I imagine, cease to be regarded by the plaintiff and the lady superior as a revocable instrument.

The plaintiff was twenty-seven years of age, or thereabouts, when she first joined the sisterhood. She sought Mr. Nihill; he did not seek her. She wished to join the sisterhood, and she was resolved to devote herself and her property to it and to charitable work. This wish and determination were naturally strengthened by the religious services of the sisterhood, and by the influence of those around her. There is evidence that, when a novice, and before she had become a sister, she wished to leave the sisterhood, but that she did not feel that she could do so, and that she felt even then bound to the sisterhood. After she became a sister she again wished to leave, but she was told by the lady superior that she could not do so, and that she was bound to the sisterhood for life. On another and later occasion she was not allowed to leave, although she wished to do so. On becoming a sister the plaintiff took vows of obedience to the lady superior, and of poverty and chastity; and there can be no doubt that the plaintiff regarded these vows as binding on her, not only when she took them, but ever afterwards until she finally left the sisterhood and became a Roman Catholic.

On becoming a sister the plaintiff also became subject to the rules of the sisterhood. These rules, although not reduced into their final shape until 1872 or 1873, were practically in force before, and were well known to the plaintiff when she became a sister. The important rules are those which require (i) implicit obedience to the lady superior; (ii) poverty. A third rule (No. 31) is thus worded: "Let no sister seek advice of any extern without the superior's leave." The vow of poverty and the rule as to poverty obliged each sister to give away all her property. But the rule did not require her to give it or any of it to the sisterhood. She could give it to her relations, or to the poor if she wished. But it would be idle to suppose that a sister would not feel that she ought to give some of her property at least to the sisterhood, and it would be equally idle to suppose that she would not be expected to do so. The forms of deeds in the schedules A. and B. to the rules are very significant. The donee is inserted as "— her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns." The introduction of "her" is very unusual in a legal form, and shows plainly enough who the donee was expected to be. Further, the deeds, when filled up, are by the rules to be placed on the altar, in order, I suppose, to add to their solemnity, and impress the donor with a sense of their irrevocability. The plaintiff never executed any such deed as was contemplated by the rules; but they and the schedules show what was expected to be done. In this particular case, moreover, the plaintiff had expressly promised to give all she had to the sisterhood, and Mr. Nihill tells us that non-performance of this promise would have been regarded as dishonourable.

The vow and rule obliging to implicit obedience to the lady superior, and the exhortation or command to regard her voice as the voice of God, produce very different effects on different minds. There can, however, be no question that the plaintiff felt bound by the vow and by the rule until she emancipated herself from both of them, which she did when she left the sisterhood. It is important, however, to bear in mind that the fetter thus placed on the plaintiff was the result of her own free choice. There is no evidence that pressure was put upon her to enter upon the mode of life which she adopted. She chose it as the best for herself; she devoted herself to it heart and soul; she was, to use her own expression, "infatuated" with the life and with the work. But, though infatuated, there is no evidence to show that she was in that state of mental imbecility which would justify the inference that she was unable to take care of herself or to manage her own affairs. The rule against obtaining advice from externs without the consent of the lady superior invites great suspicion. It is evidently a rule capable of being used in a very tyrannical way, and so as to result in intolerable oppression. I have carefully examined the evidence to see how this rule practically worked; but I can find nothing on the subject. I can find nothing to show, one way or the other, what would have been the effect, for example, of a request for leave to consult a friend or obtain legal or other advice respecting any disposition of property or respecting leaving the sisterhood. There, however, is the rule, and a very important one it is. I shall have occasion to refer to it again hereafter.

Such being the nature of the vows and rules which the plaintiff had taken, and to which she had submitted herself, and by which she felt herself bound by the highest religious sanctions, it is necessary to examine what she did with her property, and the circumstances under which she gave it to the sisterhood. The evidence shows that her brother, who was one of her trustees, kept her fully informed of what her property consisted of, and he remitted to her from time to time cheques and transfers of railway stock and other securities to which she was entitled. The brother's letters, and the cheques and transfers, all passed through the hands of the lady superior, it being the rule that she should see all letters to sisters. The plaintiff gave all the cheques to the lady superior after endorsing them, and also transferred to her all the railway stock and securities as they were received. The cheques were handed over to Mr. Nihill, who was the treasurer of the sisterhood, and were paid by him into a bank to an account kept in his own name, and on which he alone could draw. The sisterhood was building a hospital, in which the plaintiff took great interest, and most of the plaintiff's money was spent in defraying the expense of the building.

I have examined the evidence with care, in order to see whether any pressure was put upon the plaintiff in order to induce her to give her property to the sisterhood, or whether any deception was practised upon her, or whether any unfair advantage was taken of her, or whether any of her money was applied otherwise than bona fide for the objects of the sisterhood, or for any purpose which the plaintiff could disapprove. The result of the evidence convinces me that no pressure (except the inevitable pressure of the vows and rules) was brought to bear on the plaintiff; that no deception was practised upon her; that no unfair advantage was taken of her; that none of her money was obtained or applied for any purpose other than the legitimate objects of the sisterhood. Not a farthing of it was either obtained or applied for the private advantage of the lady superior or of Mr. Nihill; nor indeed did the plaintiff ever suggest that such had been the case. The real truth is that the plaintiff gave away her property as a matter of course, and without seriously thinking of the consequences to herself. She had devoted herself and her fortune to the sisterhood, and it never occurred to her that she should ever wish to leave the sisterhood, or desire to have her money back. In giving away her property as she did she was merely acting up to her promise and vow, and the rule of the sisterhood, and to the standard of duty which she had erected for herself under the influences and circumstances already stated.

In May, 1879, the plaintiff left the sisterhood. On May 16 she was received into the Roman Catholic Church, and she then regarded herself as freed from the vows she had taken on joining the sisterhood. Soon after she had left the sisterhood the plaintiff had some conversation with her brother about getting her money back; and he said he did not want the trouble and she had better leave it alone. She was also advised by a Roman Catholic priest not to trouble about it. In February, 1880, she consulted her present solicitor about making a new will, and she then had some conversation with him about the money she had given to the sisterhood, and he told her it was too large a sum to leave behind without asking for it back, and she said she would not trouble about it. A

Some time in 1884 the plaintiff heard that another sister, a Miss Merriman, had left the sisterhood, and had asked for the money back, and had had it returned to her, and then plaintiff made up her mind to try and get her money back. Upon her re-examination the plaintiff said that she had no idea that she could get it back until after she had heard that Miss Merriman had recovered hers. But the evidence already alluded to shows clearly that she had considered the matter, and B had come to the conclusion that it was not worth troubling about. As a matter of fact, although she asked the lady superior in 1880 to give her back her will, she never asked for any of her money back until 1884, more than five years after she had left the sisterhood, and the present action was not brought until August 28, 1885.

By her action the plaintiff sought to recover the whole of the capital money C which she had given to the sisterhood, amounting to nearly £8,500. KEKEWICH, J., tried the action, and gave judgment for the defendant. From this judgment the plaintiff has appealed, but she has limited her appeal to two sums of £500 and £1,171 railway stock transferred by her to the lady superior, and still standing in her name. Two questions are raised by the appeal, viz., first, D whether the gifts made by the plaintiff to the sisterhood were revocable or irrevocable when made; secondly, whether, assuming them to have been irrevocable when made, it was competent for the plaintiff to revoke them when she did.

The first question is one of great importance and difficulty. Its solution requires a careful consideration of the legal effect of gifts by persons of mature age who feel bound by vows and rules to give away their property, but who E have taken the vows and submitted to the rules voluntarily and without pressure, and who are subject to no other coercion or influence than necessarily results from the vows and rules themselves, and from the state of their own minds.
There is no statutory law in this country prohibiting such gifts unless what is given is land, or money to be laid out in land. These are provided for by the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Acts; but they have no application to this case F
[the Charities Act, 1960, repealed the law of mortmain: see s. 38 (40 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 168)]. The common law, as distinguished from equity, does not invalidate such gifts as these. There being no duress or fraud, the only ground for impeaching such gifts at law would be want of capacity on the part of the donor, and, although the plaintiff was a religious enthusiast, no one could treat her as in point of law non compos mentis. There is no authority whatever G for saying that her gifts were invalid at law. It is to the doctrines of equity, then, that recourse must be had to invalidate such gifts, if they are to be invalidated.

The doctrine relied upon by the plaintiff is the doctrine of undue influence expounded and enforced in Huguenin v. Baseley (5), and other cases of that class.
These cases may be subdivided into two groups, which, however, often overlap. H
First, there are the cases in which there has been some unfair and improper conduct—some coercion from outside, some overreaching, some form of cheating, and generally, though not always, some personal advantage obtained by a donee placed in some close and confidential relation to the donor. Norton v. Relly (6); Nottidge v. Prince (7); Lyon v. Home (8); Whyte v. Meade (1), all belong to this group. In Whyte v. Meade (1) a gift to a convent was set aside, but the I gift was the result of coercion clearly proved. The evidence does not bring the present case within this group. The second group consists of cases in which the position of the donor to the donee has been such that it has been the duty of the donee to advise the donor, or even to manage his property for him. In such cases the courts throw upon the donee the burden of proving that he has not abused his position, and of proving that the gift made to him has not been brought about by any undue influence on his part. In this class of cases it has been considered necessary to show that the donor had independent advice, and was removed from the influence of the donee when the gift to him was made. Huguenin v. Baseley (5) was a case of this kind. The defendant had not only acquired considerable spiritual influence over the plaintiff, but was entrusted by her with the management of her property. His duty to her was clear, and it was with reference to persons so situated that LORD ELDON used the language so often quoted, and so much relied on in this case. He said (14 Ves. at p. 299):

“Take it that she [the plaintiff] intended to give it to him [the defendant]; it is by no means out of the reach of the principle. The question is not whether she knew what she was doing, had done, or proposed to do, but how the intention was produced; whether all that care and providence was placed around her, as against those who advised her, which from their situation and relation with respect to her they were bound to exert on her behalf.”

This principle has been constantly recognised and acted upon in subsequent cases, but in all of them, as in Huguenin v. Baseley (5) itself, it was the duty of the donee to advise and take care of the donor. Where there is no such duty, the language of LORD ELDON ceases to be applicable. Rhodes v. Bate (9) was determined on the same principle as Huguenin v. Baseley (5), the court having come to the conclusion that the relation of the defendant to the plaintiff was really that of a solicitor to his client.

I have not been able to find any case in which a gift has been set aside on the ground of undue influence, which does not fall within one or other or both of the groups above mentioned. Nor can I find any authority which actually covers the present case. But it does not follow that it is not reached by the principle on which the court has proceeded in dealing with the cases which have already called for decision. They illustrate, but do not limit, the principle applied to them. The principle must be examined. What, then, is the principle? Is it that it is right and expedient to save persons from the consequences of their own folly? Or is it that it is right and expedient to save them from being victimised by other people?

In my opinion, the doctrine of undue influence is founded upon the second of these two principles. Courts of equity have never set aside gifts on the ground of the folly, imprudence, or want of foresight on the part of donors. The courts have always repudiated any such jurisdiction. Huguenin v. Baseley (5) is itself a clear authority to this effect. It would obviously be to encourage folly, recklessness, extravagance, and vice if persons could get back property which they had foolishly made away with, whether by giving it to charitable institutions, or by bestowing it on less worthy objects. On the other hand, to protect people from being forced, tricked, or misled, in anyway, by others into parting with their property, is one of the most legitimate objects of all laws; and the equitable doctrine of undue influence has grown out of and been developed by the necessity of grappling with insidious forms of spiritual tyranny and with the infinite varieties of fraud. As no court has ever attempted to define fraud, so no court has ever attempted to define undue influence, which includes one of the many varieties. The undue influence which courts of equity endeavour to defeat is the undue influence of one person over another; not the influence of enthusiasm on the enthusiast who is carried away by it, unless indeed such enthusiasm is itself the result of external undue influence. But the influence of one mind over another is very subtle, and of all influences religious influence is the most dangerous and the most powerful. To counteract it courts of equity have gone very far. They have not shrunk from setting aside gifts made to persons in a position to exercise undue influence over the donors, although there has been no proof of the actual exercise of such influence; and the courts have done this on the avowed ground of the necessity of going this length in order to protect persons from the exercise of such influence under circumstances which render proof of it impossible. The courts have required proof of its non-exercise, A and, failing that proof, have set aside gifts otherwise unimpeachable.

In this particular case I cannot find any proof that any gift made by the plaintiff was the result of any actual exercise of power or influence on the part of the lady superior or of Mr. Nihill, apart from the influence necessarily incidental to their position in the sisterhood. Everything that the plaintiff did is, in my opinion, referable to her own willing submission to the vows she took, and to the B rules which she approved, and to her own enthusiastic devotion to the life and work of the sisterhood. This enthusiasm and devotion were nourished, strengthened and intensified, by the religious services of the sisterhood, and by the example and influence of those about her. But she chose the life and work; such fetters as bound her were voluntarily put upon her by herself; she could have shaken them off at any time had she thought fit, and had she had the C courage so to do; and no unfair advantage whatever was taken of her. Under these circumstances it is going a long way to hold that she can invoke the doctrine of undue influence to save her from the consequences of her own acts, and to entitle her to avoid the gifts she made when in a state of mind different from that in which she now is.

I am by no means insensible of the difficulty of going so far. Nevertheless, D consider the position in which the plaintiff had placed herself. She had vowed poverty and obedience, and she was not at liberty to consult externs without the leave of her superior. She was not a person who treated her vows lightly; she was deeply religious and felt bound by her promise, by her vows, and by the rules of the sisterhood. She was absolutely in the power of the lady superior and Mr. Nihill. A gift made by her, under these circumstances, to the lady E superior, cannot, in my opinion, be retained by the donee. The equitable title of the donee is imperfect by reason of the influence inevitably resulting from her position, which influence experience has taught the courts to regard as undue. Whatever doubt I might have had on this point if there had been no rule against consulting externs, that rule, in my judgment, turns the scale against the defendant. In the face of that rule the gifts made to the sister- F hood cannot be supported in the absence of proof that the plaintiff could have obtained independent advice, if she had wished for it, and that she knew that she would have been allowed to obtain such advice if she had desired so to do.
I doubt whether the gifts could have been supported if such proof had been given, unless there was also proof that she was free to act on the advice which G might be given to her. But the rule itself is so oppressive and so easily abused that any person subject to it is, in my opinion, brought within the class of those whom it is the duty of the court to protect from possible imposition. The gifts cannot be supported without proof of more freedom in fact than the plaintiff can be supposed to have actually enjoyed. The case is brought within the principle so forcibly expressed by KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., in Wright v. Vander- H plank (2), in which a gift by a daughter to her father was sought to be set aside.
If any independent person had explained to the plaintiff that her promise to give all her property to the sisterhood was not legally binding upon her, and that her vows of poverty and obedience had no legal validity, and that if she gave her property away and afterwards left the sisterhood she would be unable to get her property back, it is impossible to say what she might or might not have done. I
In fact she never had the opportunity of considering this question.

Where a gift is made to a person standing in a confidential relation to the donor the court will not set aside the gift, if of a small amount, simply on the ground that the donor had no independent advice; in such a case some proof of the exercise of the influence of the donee must be given. The mere existence of such influence is not enough in such a case: see the observations of TURNER, L.J., in Rhodes v. Bate (9), 1 Ch. App. at p. 258. But if the gift is so large as not to be reasonably accounted for on the ground of friendship, relationship, charity, or other ordinary motive on which ordinary men act, the burden is upon the donee to support the gift. So in a case like this a distinction might well be made between gifts of capital and gifts of income, and between gifts of moderate amount and gifts of large sums which a person unfettered by vows and oppressive rules would not be likely to wish to make. In this case the plaintiff practically gave away all she could, although, having a life interest in other property, she did not reduce herself to a state of poverty.

As I have already stated, I believe that in this case there was in fact no unfair or undue influence brought to bear upon the plaintiff other than such as inevitably resulted from the training she had received, the promise she had made, the vows she had taken, and the rules to which she had submitted herself. But her gifts were in fact made under a pressure which, while it lasted, the plaintiff could not resist, and were not, in my opinion, past recall when the pressure was removed. When the plaintiff emancipated herself from the spell by which she was bound she was entitled to invoke the aid of the court in order to obtain the restitution from the defendant of so much of the plaintiff's property as had not been spent in accordance with the wishes of the plaintiff, but remained in the hands of the defendant. The plaintiff now demands no more.

I proceed to consider the second point which arises in this case, viz., whether it is too late for the plaintiff to invoke the assistance of the court. More than six years had elapsed between the time when the plaintiff left the sisterhood and the commencement of the present action. The action is not one of those to which the Statute of Limitations in terms applies, nor is that statute pleaded. But this action very closely resembles an action for money had and received, laches and acquiescence are relied upon as a defence, and the question is whether this defence ought to prevail. In my opinion, it ought. Taking the statute as a guide, and proceeding on the principles laid down by LORD CAMDEN in Smith v. Clay (10), and by LORD REDESDALE in Hovenden v. Annesley (11), the lapse of six years becomes a very material element for consideration.

It is not, however, necessary to decide whether this delay alone would be a sufficient defence to the action. The case by no means rests on mere lapse of time. There is far more than inactivity and delay on the part of the plaintiff. There is conduct amounting to confirmation of her gift. Gifts liable to be set aside by the court on the ground of undue influence have always been treated as voidable, and not void. If authority for this proposition be wanted, such authority will be found in Wright v. Vanderplank (2) and Mitchell v. Homfray (12). Moreover, such gifts are voidable on equitable grounds only. A gift intended when made to be absolute and irrevocable, but liable to be set aside by a court of justice, not on the ground of change of mind on the part of the donor, but on grounds of public policy based upon the fact that the donor was not sufficiently free relatively to the donee—such a gift is very different from a loan which the borrower knows he is under an obligation to repay, and is also different from a gift expressly made revocable, and never intended to be absolute and unconditional. A gift made in terms absolute and unconditional naturally leads the donee to regard it as his own; and the longer he is left under this impression the more difficult it is justly to deprive him of what he has naturally so regarded.

So long as the relation between the donor and the donee which invalidates the gifts lasts, so long is it necessary to hold that lapse of time affords no sufficient ground for refusing relief to the donor. But this necessity ceases when the relation itself comes to an end; and if the donor desires to have his gift declared invalid and set aside, he ought, in my opinion, to seek relief within a reasonable time after the removal of the influence under which the gift was made. If he does not, the inference is strong, and if the lapse of time is long the inference becomes inevitable and conclusive—that the donor is content not to call the gift in question or, in other words, that he elects not to avoid it, or, what is the same thing in effect, that he ratifies and confirms it. This view is not only conformable to the well-settled rules relating to other voidable transactions: see the judgment in Clough v. London and North Western Rail Co. (3); but is also warranted by Wright v. Vanderplank (2) and Mitchell v. Homfray (12). It is true that in those cases the donors had died; but it is clear, I think, that the decisions proceeded upon the ground that the donors, if alive, could not have obtained relief. A right to have a gift set aside for fraud or undue influence does not cease on the death of the donor, but passes to his representatives; and if in Mitchell v. Homfray (12) the donor had been entitled when he died to have the gift set aside, his executors would have succeeded to his rights, and would have obtained the relief they sought. In this particular case the plaintiff considered, when she left the sisterhood, what course she should take, and she determined to do nothing, but to leave matters as they were. She insisted on having back her will, but she never asked for her money until the end of five years or so after she left the sisterhood. In this state of things I can only come to the conclusion that she deliberately chose not to attempt to avoid her gifts but to acquiesce in them, or, if the expression be preferred, to ratify or confirm them. I regard this as a question of fact, and upon the evidence I can come to no other conclusion than that which I have mentioned. Moreover, by demanding her will and not her money, she made her resolution known to the defendant.

It was urged that the plaintiff did not know her rights until shortly before she asked for her money back. But, in the first place, I am not satisfied that the plaintiff did not know that it was at least questionable whether the defendant could retain the plaintiff's money if she insisted on having it back. In the next place, if the plaintiff did not know her rights, her ignorance was simply the result of her own resolution not to inquire into them. She knew all the facts; she was in communication with her present solicitor in 1880; his remark that "it was too large a sum to leave behind without asking for it back" was a clear intimation that she ought to ask for her money back, and was a distinct invitation to her to consider her rights. She declined to do so; she preferred not to trouble about it. Under these circumstances it would, in my opinion, be wrong, and contrary to sound principle, to give her relief on the ground that she did not know what her rights were. Ignorance which is the result of deliberate choice is no ground for equitable relief; nor is it an answer to an equitable defence based on laches and acquiescence.

Again, it was urged that the defendant has not been prejudiced by the delay, and that nothing has been done on the faith that the plaintiff would not require her money to be returned to her. But I do not think this material. I treat the money as absolutely given to the sisterhood when the plaintiff determined not to ask for it back, which she did in 1880. But, further, I cannot come to the conclusion that nothing has been done on the faith of the money being the property of the sisterhood. It is contrary to human nature to suppose the plaintiff's money was not for years regarded as the money of the sisterhood, and that the sisterhood did not act on that assumption and make their arrangements accordingly. Mr. Nihill's evidence satisfies me that they did so, although I do not think he shows that they took any particular step on the faith of having the particular sum now sought to be taken from them. It is not, however, in my opinion, necessary to prove so much as this. Whether the plaintiff's conduct amounts in point of law to acquiescence or laches, or whether it amounts to an election not to avoid a voidable transaction, or whether it amounts to a ratification or a confirmation of her gifts, are questions of mere words which it is needless to discuss. In my judgment, it would not be fair or right to the defendant to compel her now to restore the money sought to be recovered by this appeal. Nor, in my opinion, would such a result be in conformity with sound

A legal or equitable principles. Upon this ground, therefore, I am of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—This is a case of great importance. There are no authorities which govern it. My brethren, on whose experience in matters of equity I naturally should rely, differ, and on that ground I have thought it right to express my own views upon the point. It is a question which must be decided upon broad principles, and we have to consider what is the principle, and what is the limitation of the principle, as to voluntary gifts where there is no fraud on the part of the defendant, but where there is an all-powerful religious influence which disturbs the independent judgment of one of the parties, and subordinates for all worldly purposes the will of that person to the will of the other.

C It seems to me that it is of essential importance to keep quite distinct two things, which in their nature seem to me to be different—the rights of the donor, and the duties of the donee, and the obligations which are imposed upon the conscience of the donee by the principles of this court. As to the rights of the donor in a case like the present, I entertain no doubt. It seems to me that persons who are under the most complete influence of religious feeling are perfectly free to act upon it in the disposition of their property, and not the less free because they are enthusiasts. Persons of this kind are not dead in law. They are dead indeed to the world so far as their own wishes and feelings about the things of the world are concerned; but such indifference to things external does not prevent them in law from being free agents. In the present instance there was no duress, no incompetency, no want of mental power on the part of the donor. It seems to me that, so far as regards her rights, she had the absolute right to deal with her property as she chose. Passing next to the duties of the donee, it seems to me that, although this power of perfect disposition remains in the donor under circumstances like the present, it is plain that equity will not allow a person who exercises or enjoys a dominant religious influence over another to benefit, directly or indirectly, by the gifts which the donor makes under or in consequence of such influence, unless it is shown that the donor, at the time of making the gift, was allowed full and free opportunity for counsel and advice outside, the means of considering his or her worldly position and for exercising an independent will about it. This is not a limitation placed on the action of the donor; it is a fetter placed upon the conscience of the recipient of the gift, and one which arises out of public policy and fair play. If this had been the gift of a chattel, therefore, the property then would have passed in law, and the distinction between the gift of a chattel and the gift of money may be treated as a pecuniary one only for this purpose.

That being the rule, in the first place, was the plaintiff entitled to the benefit of it? She had vowed, in the most sacred and solemn way, absolute and implicit obedience to the will of the defendant, her superior, and she was bound altogether to neglect the advice of externs—not to consult those outside the convent. I offer no sort of criticism on institutions of this sort—no kind of criticism upon the action of those who enter them, or of those who administer them. In the abstract I respect their motives, but it is obvious that it is exactly to this class of case that the rule of equity which I have mentioned ought to be applied if it exists. It seems to me that the plaintiff, so long as she was fettered by this vow—so long as she was under the dominant influence of this religious feeling—was a person entitled to the protection of the rule. Was the defendant bound by this rule? I acquit her most entirely of all selfish feeling in the matter. I can see no sort of wrongful desire to appropriate to herself any worldly benefit from the gift; but, nevertheless, she was a person who benefited by it so far as the disposition of the property was concerned, although, no doubt, she meant to use it in conformity with the rules of the institution, and did so use it.

I pause for one moment to say a word as to the views of KEKEWICH, J., A which are not altogether consistent with the above. He seems to have thought that the question turned on the original intention of the donor at the time she entered the convent, and that what passed subsequently could be treated as if it were a mere mechanical performance of a complete mental intention originally formed. I entirely agree with the view presented to us by the plaintiff as to that part of the judgment appealed from. It seems to me that it is not the B point upon which the case turns; that the standard of duty was originally created by the plaintiff herself, although her original intention is one of the facts, no doubt, which bear upon the case, and is not to be neglected. But it is not the crucial fact. We ought to look, it seems to me, at the time at which the gift was made, and to examine what was then the condition of the donor who made it. C For these reasons I think that, without any interference with the freedom of persons to deal with their property as they please, we ought, and can hold but one opinion, that in 1879 the plaintiff could have set this gift aside.

Then comes the question of the time which has elapsed since. What effect has time upon a right to the protection of this rule. The rule is an equity arising out of public policy. I do not think that the delay in itself is an absolute bar, D though it is a fact to be considered in determining the inference of fact which appears to me to be the one that we must draw on one side or the other. I have described, to the best of my imperfect powers, what to my mind the principle of the rule is. It is a principle arising out of public policy, and one which imposes a fetter upon the conscience of the recipient of the gift. When is that barrier removed from the conscience of the recipient of the gift? It seems E to me that the common sense answer ought to be—and I think the right answer is—as soon as the donor escapes from the religious influence which hampered her at the time, as soon as she becomes free and determined to leave the gift where it is. If she has so acted—if her delay has been so long as reasonably to induce the recipient to think, and to act upon the belief that the gift is to lie where it has been laid—then, by estoppel, it appears to me that the donor of the F gift would be prevented from revoking it.

But I do not base my decision here on that ground. I do not base my decision at all upon the view that she is estopped by the delay. But a long time has elapsed. Five years is a long time in the life of anybody, and it is a long time in the life of a person who has passed her life in seclusion like the plaintiff. Every day and every hour during those five years she has had the opportunity G of reflecting upon her past life and upon what she has done. She has had that opportunity since she passed away from the influence of the defendant; and that she did pass away from it most completely is proved to demonstration by the fact that she entered a different religious community. Having belonged to the Church of England, she has entered the Church of Rome. The influence, therefore, ceased completely. She was surrounded by persons perfectly com- H petent to give her proper advice. She had her solicitor. She had her brother, a barrister himself, and she had the directors of the consciences of the community which she had entered.

I draw unhesitatingly the inference, under the circumstances, that she did, in or shortly after 1879, consider this matter and determine not to interfere with her previous disposition. Was she aware of her rights at the time she I formed this resolution? In my view, I incline to think that she must have been, having regard to the character of the advisers who surrounded her, but I do not consider it to be essential to draw that inference. It is enough if she was aware that she might have rights, and deliberately determined not to inquire what they were or to act upon them. Then, again, I unhesitatingly draw the inference that she was aware that she had rights, or might have them, and that she deliberately made up her mind not to enforce them. In drawing this inference of fact I do no discredit to the character of the plaintiff, which is above

A all reproach, but on carefully considering her evidence I do not feel that I can place reliance upon her memory; and, in my view, it would be wrong to draw the inference upon her evidence that she did in her own mind never form any definite view about the property she left behind in the convent.

I need hardly say that I feel great embarrassment in having to give the casting voice in a matter of such great importance, when two whose opinions and authority are far greater than my own differ in the matter. In my view, this appeal ought to be dismissed, and dismissed on the ground that the time which has elapsed—though not a bar in itself, though not amounting to laches which disentitles the plaintiff to relief—is, nevertheless, coupled with the other facts of the case, a matter from which but one reasonable inference ought to be drawn by men of the world—viz., that the lady considered her position at the time, and elected and chose not to disturb the gift which she then at that moment felt, if she had the will, she had the power to disturb.

Appeal dismissed.

SHEFFIELD AND SOUTH YORKSHIRE PERMANENT BUILDING SOCIETY v. AIZLEWOOD AND OTHERS

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Stirling, J.), July 16, 17, 18, 23, 24, 25, 30, 31, August 1, 6, November 6, 1889]

Building Society—Director—Powers—Advances—Security—No restriction to trustee securities—Hazardous investments—Wasting security—Observation of ordinary business prudence—Advance on second mortgage of leasehold colliery—Further advance to redeem first mortgage—Money borrowed for that purpose—Entry into possession of property—Payment of rent and expense of maintaining and working colliery.

The directors of a building society ought not to be held liable for losses on loans authorised by them on the rules laid down by the Court of Chancery with respect to the duties of trustees of wills and settlements where the preservation of the trust funds is the primary object. In the exercise of their discretion they may properly make advances on classes of securities forbidden to ordinary trustees. They are not under an obligation to avoid investments attended with hazard, dependent for their value on the course of trade, or of a wasting nature, but may, in the absence of anything to the contrary in the rules or articles of association of the society, act in the same manner as men of business of ordinary prudence.

The directors of a building society advanced £25,000 on a second mortgage of a leasehold colliery. Later they made a further advance to redeem the first mortgage on the property, borrowing money for that purpose. Later still the society entered into possession of the mortgaged property and paid out of the funds of the society the rents reserved by the lease and the expenses of maintaining and working the colliery. A

Held: under the rules of the society the first advance was within the powers of the directors, and by implication they had power to make the further advance to redeem the first mortgage and to borrow money for that purpose, and also, making use of the ordinary powers of mortgagees, to enter into possession of the colliery and to apply money of the society in maintaining and working it; the directors, therefore, were not guilty of any neglect or default which would disentitle them to the protection in such circumstances afforded them by the rules of the society. H Action brought by the Sheffield and South Yorkshire Permanent Building Society, in liquidation, against former directors of the society and the legal personal representatives of two directors who had died for a declaration that the defendant directors and the estates of the two deceased directors were liable to make good to the society sums advanced out of the assets of the society to one Thomas Joseph upon the security of leasehold collieries in Wales, and also sums expended out of the assets of the society in preserving those securities and maintaining and working the collieries.

By s. 13 of the Building Societies Act, 1874 :

“Any number of persons may establish a society under this Act, either terminating or permanent, for the purpose of raising by the subscriptions of the members a stock or fund for making advances to members out of the funds of the society upon security of freehold, copyhold, or leasehold estate by way of mortgage; and any society under this Act shall, so far as is necessary for the said purpose, have power to hold land with the right of foreclosure . . . Provided always, that any land to which any society may become absolutely entitled by foreclosure, or by surrender, or other extinguishment of the right of redemption, shall as soon afterwards as may be conveniently practicable be sold or converted into money." A

By r. 14 of the rules of the society :

"The directors and all other officers of the society shall be, and are, hereby indemnified and saved harmless out of its funds and property from and against all losses, costs, charges, damages, and expenses which they may incur or be put unto in or about the execution of their respective offices, trusts, and services; and none of them shall be answerable for any act or default of any other of them, or for the insufficiency or deficiency in the title or otherwise of any security whatsoever which shall be taken for the repayment of any advance, unless the loss arising by such means shall happen through their own neglect or default." B C

At the material times there were twelve directors of the society, namely, John Aizlewood, Alfred Bennett, Henry Bloor, Thomas Charlesworth, Robert Thomas Eadon, John Taylor, John Wilson, Simeon Hayes, Joseph Brailsford, Alfred Allott, Robert Leader, and Henry Loxley. All of them except Robert Leader and Henry Loxley, who had since died, were defendants to this action. Robert Leader and Henry Loxley being dead, their legal personal representatives were made defendants. The defendant Allott and the legal personal representatives of Loxley did not put in any defence, and judgment was given against them in default of appearance. E This report deals with the position of the other directors.

Rigby, Q.C., Buckley, Q.C., and Theobald for the plaintiffs.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Hastings, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey for the first eight defendants.

Bigham, Q.C., and Upjohn for the defendant Brailsford.

Pearson, Q.C., and Levett for the personal representatives of the defendant Leader. F

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 6, 1889. STIRLING, J., read a judgment in which he said: The transactions impeached in the action divide themselves into three heads: First, an original advance of £25,000 in 1878; secondly, an advance of £41,000 in November, 1881; and thirdly, an expenditure for the preservation, maintenance, and working of the colliery. Each of these matters involves somewhat different considerations, and I propose to deal with them separately. G

The original advance of £25,000 is attacked on the ground that it was beyond the powers of the society, or at all events of the directors; and, further, that it was made so recklessly and improvidently as to render the directors liable in respect of it, even if it was within their powers. Was the advance beyond the powers of the society? The object of the society is to make advances "upon security of freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estate." It is said that the advance of £25,000 was not made on such security, but on the security of the colliery and mines carried on by Mr. Joseph. In fact, however, the Dunraven, Hendrewen, and Blaengwinfi properties were held under leases, and constituted leasehold estate, the leases including minerals, which were to be worked and got by the lessees. The property offered as security was, therefore, to some extent of a wasting nature, and its value was affected by its being used for the purposes of the colliery business carried on by Joseph. Those were matters fit and proper to be considered in determining what amount should be advanced on the security of the leasehold property; but, in my judgment, it cannot be said that the society was precluded by reason of the existence of those circumstances from making any H I

A advance, however small, on mortgage of it; and I am, therefore, of opinion that this part of the transaction was not beyond the powers of the society. Whether the sum advanced was properly advanced is a matter which requires subsequent consideration.

B It was next said that the advance was not made exclusively on the security of leasehold estate, but was made partially on the security of the interests of Mrs. Joseph and her children in the funds held on the trusts of the two settle-
C ments of Sept. 28, 1876, and Jan. 15, 1877; it was said that those interests constituted an essential and integral part of the securities taken by the plaintiff society, and that reliance was placed upon them by the directors; and it was contended that the inclusion of those interests in the securities vitiated the whole trans-
D action—that, in fact, the inclusion of any personal element in the security would vitiate such a transaction. [As to additional securities see now Building Societies Act, 1962, s. 26, Sched. 3.] If this contention were pushed to the utmost extent, it would seem to follow that the inclusion in the building society's mortgage of a personal covenant by the mortgagor for repayment of the advance, and reliance placed by the officers of the society on the solvency of the mortgagor, might
E equally vitiate any transaction of which those were elements. Yet it was not disputed in argument, and, in my judgment, properly, that a building society making an advance to a member on the security of freehold, copyhold, or leasehold estate, might take from him a personal covenant for payment of what might be due from him to the society, and I think that the officers of the society might to a certain extent, and for certain purposes, rely on the solvency of the mortgagor.

For example, an action on the covenant of a solvent borrower affords an effectual and comparatively speedy and inexpensive mode of recovering what is due, and may be the means of avoiding the delay, costs, and liability incident to remedies (such as foreclosure, sale, or entry into possession) available only against the subject-matter of the security. If the circumstances of the borrower are such
F that his personal covenant is without value, the building society may, in my opinion, secure a like advantage by means of the personal guarantee of a third party, or a charge on some readily available pure personal estate. The benefit so obtained must, however, be purely collateral, and the validity or propriety of the trans-
G action is to be tested as if no such ingredient entered into it. If there be no freehold, copyhold, or leasehold estate comprised in the security, or if the estate so comprised be merely nominal, or its value out of all proportion to the amount advanced, the transaction is beyond the powers of the society and invalid; but where, as here, the borrower offers as security such estate to a substantial extent,
H an advance is within the powers conferred by the Building Societies Act, 1874, and the question for the officers of the society to determine is what amount may properly be advanced, and that they must decide having regard solely to the nature and value of the freehold, copyhold, or leasehold estate offered to them, and without reference to the solvency of the borrower, or the worth of any personal estate he may be willing to throw in.

I Next, it is to be considered whether the transaction, though within the powers of the society, was within the powers of the directors; and here it will be convenient to commence with some general observations as to the position and duties of directors of such societies. It has been laid down—and I take it to be established law—that directors of trading companies are not trustees in the sense in which that term is used with reference to settlements or wills. The question is discussed, and the authorities considered, in Re Faure Electric Accumulator Co. (1), and it is sufficient for me to refer to the judgment of KAY, J., in that case. It is said, however, that the rules there laid down refer to trading companies incorporated under the Companies Acts, and that the directors of building societies incorporated under the Building Societies Act, 1874, are in a different position. Such societies, according to s. 13 of that Act [see now s. 1 (1) of A Building Societies Act, 1962], are established

“for the purpose of raising, by the subscriptions of the members, a stock or fund for making advances to members out of the funds of the society upon security of freehold, copyhold, or leasehold estate.”

It has been repeatedly pointed out that the objects of such societies are twofold: on the one hand, to assist some of the members to obtain advances on the security of their property; on the other hand, to assist others to obtain a high rate of interest on their money.

Thus, in the judgment in Fleming v. Self (2), in which LORD CRANWORTH elaborately explained the nature and objects of such societies as were established C under the Benefit Building Societies Act, 1836, he says:

“In truth, the whole scheme is but an elaborate contrivance for enabling persons, having sums for which they have no immediate want, to lend them to others at a very high rate of interest;”

and in Re Guardian Permanent Benefit Building Society (3) SIR GEORGE JESSEL, D M.R., says of the same Act (23 Ch.D. at p. 458):

“It was the object to assist, therefore, some of the members to obtain freehold or leasehold property, and some a high rate of interest.”

Similar observations apply to societies incorporated under the Act of 1874. The societies, therefore, in one aspect of them have for their object the acquisition of gain in the shape of a high rate of interest by the investing members, and the directors ought not, in my opinion, any more than the directors of companies formed under the Act of 1862, to be held liable upon the rules (which JAMES, L.J., in Marzetti's Case (4), said were, in his opinion, too strict rules) laid down by the Court of Chancery with respect to the duties of trustees of wills and settlements, F where the preservation of the trust funds is the primary object. Some of the observations of the other learned judges who took part in the decision in Marzetti's Case (4) also deserve consideration. The present Master of the Rolls [LORD ESHER, then BRETT, L.J.] says (42 L.T. at p. 209):

“The question is whether Mr. Marzetti has been guilty of such negligence as would make him liable in an action. Mere imprudence is not such negligence. Want of judgment is not. It must be such negligence as would make a man liable in point of law. Mr. Marzetti has been guilty of not making those inquiries which a person of ordinary care in his position would have made.”

“Trustees are liable whatever trouble they take, if the fund in their case goes not according to the trust. Opinions of counsel, bona fides, or care, do not protect them. Now, directors are confidential agents with the liabilities of trustees, but they have a large discretion, and, if they act bona fide, they are relieved, and are not liable for want of judgment or error if they make a payment which is in fact not for the purposes of the company.”

In the exercise of this large discretion, the directors may, as I conceive, properly make advances on classes of securities forbidden to ordinary trustees.

One rule which is binding on ordinary trustees is thus stated by LORD WATSON in Learoyd v. Whiteley (5) (12 App. Cas. at p. 733):

“Business men of ordinary prudence may, and frequently do, select investments which are more or less of a speculative character; but it is the duty of a trustee to confine himself to that class of investments which are permitted

A by the trust, and likewise to avoid all investments of that class which are attended with hazard."

In my judgment, directors are not under an obligation to avoid investments attended with hazard, but might, in the absence of anything to the contrary in the rules or articles of association, act in the same manner as men of business of ordinary prudence, and, if any particular society or company should deem such powers too wide, it would be competent to the members to properly frame rules or articles to impose such restrictions as they might deem advisable.

Is there then to be found in the rules any limitation on the powers of the directors as regards the nature of the property on the security of which they may make advances? It is observed that the rules of the society, though they deal with various special kinds of property, contain no reference to collieries. It is pointed out that one of the permanent officers of the society is the surveyor, whose duty it is to survey and value property offered as security, and whom the directors were bound to consult; and it is said that, inasmuch as the property offered by Mr. Joseph was of such a nature that Mr. Innocent, the duly appointed surveyor, was (as is admitted on both sides) not qualified to give an opinion as to its value, the directors ought at once to have seen that it was not one which they were authorised to accept. Rule 54 (as to the alteration of mortgaged property) was also referred to as showing that the directors had no power to take the security of a wasting property, such as a colliery in active operation. The rules of the society appear to be framed on the supposition that the property likely to be most frequently or ordinarily offered as security, or, at all events, one class of such property, would be land on which buildings were, or were proposed to be, erected, and there are to be found rules dealing with that kind of property. Mr. Innocent was an architect, and qualified to survey and value such property, and was doubtless chosen to fill the office of surveyor in the like expectation; but I do not find anything in the rules which limits the operations of the society to that or any other species of property. The terms of r. 47 are of the widest possible description:

F "The funds of the society shall be applied in making advances to members in respect of the shares held by them on legal or equitable mortgage of freehold, copyhold, or leasehold property."

It was, therefore, within the powers of the directors to accept any such property as security. It might be difficult, or even impossible, to find a person duly qualified to advise them as to the value of every species of such property; and the rules do not appear either explicitly or by implication to prohibit them from obtaining the advice of a duly qualified expert in a particular case, where the permanent surveyor might not happen to be such. As to r. 54, it appears to be directed to a similar matter, and to have for its object to secure that changes in the nature of the mortgaged property shall receive the sanction of the directors. I am, therefore, of opinion that the proposed transaction was within the powers of directors.

I have now to consider whether the defendants who appear have so acted with reference to the transaction, which is within their powers, as to be held liable for the advance of £25,000. [HIS LORDSHIP referred to the evidence, said that with regard to the original advance of £25,000 he had come to the conclusion that the defendants had not been guilty of any neglect or default, and continued:] The advance of £41,000 in November, 1881, is next to be considered. It is of a totally different nature from that of the £25,000. It does not fall within the category of ordinary advances to members. It was not an investment of any portion of the funds of the society, for there were no funds to invest, and the money actually used was borrowed. There is no rule which in express terms sanctions such an advance, but it was sought to be justified in argument on the ground that the directors, having power to make advances on a second mortgage, had by implication power to redeem a prior charge, and this was the best, and indeed the only course open to them under the circumstances. To this it was answered on behalf of the plaintiffs that the directors had no such implied power, and in support of this proposition Small v. Smith (6) was relied upon. That case was before the House of Lords on appeal from the Court of Session. It appeared that a building society in Scotland incorporated under the Act of 1874 had made an advance to a Mr. McDonald, a member of the society, on the security of certain property subject to a prior charge in favour of Small and others, the appellants to the House of Lords, for £3,000. This security contained a proviso enabling the society to pay off this prior charge, and binding Mr. McDonald, the mortgagor, to repay to the society the expenses of discharging the prior security and the prior incumbrances. The appellants gave, as by the law of Scotland they were entitled to do, notice that they proposed to exercise the power of sale incidental to their security, and thereupon negotiations took place between them and the directors of the building society, which resulted in the grant by the directors of a bond whereby the society, in consideration of the appellants forbearing for six months to exercise the power of sale, became bound at the expiration of that period to pay to the appellants what was due on their prior encumbrance. The consideration for this bond did not appear on the face of it, but was, in fact, the appellants' forbearance to exercise the power of sale. The question was whether that was binding on the society. The rules expressly empowered the directors, on the failure of an advanced member to pay what was due from him, to enter into possession and receive the rents and profits, and to sell, and it was provided that when such default was made the society should have full power to act in every respect as absolute proprietor and owner of the property. There was also a rule that the directors should have power to act for the society in accordance with the rules in any matter which might arise. It was held that neither under the special powers which were conferred on the board of directors by the rules of the society, nor under the general powers vested in them by implication, could the giving of the bond in question be justified, and it was held not to be valid.

The case, therefore, is different from the one which I have to consider, and it is important to see the grounds upon which the conclusion was based. It appears that LORD SELBORNE lays down that the directors of a building society have powers by implication to do those things which are proper consequences of the relation constituted between mortgagor and mortgagee, or the relation constituted between the first mortgagee and a second mortgagee, or which, by working out the legal rights or remedies already existing on the one side or the other, would or might result. Each of the noble Lords agrees that the question in a case like this is one of the authority of the directors, to be ascertained from the rules of the society; and they distinguish the position of the directors who, in the words of LORD WATSON, are unfettered, or who have unlimited powers to conduct the business according to the rules which guide individuals. Those last expressions appear to have reference to a case which was cited and relied on in the argument before the House of Lords and also before me—namely, Re Asiatic Banking Corpn., Royal Bank of India's Case (7). I do not think that what is there said is intended as an expression of opinion to the contrary of what is laid down by LORD SELBORNE, for his Lordship is there dealing with the case of a Scottish heritable bond, the holder of which has no right of foreclosure, such as by the law of England is vested in a first mortgagee. In my judgment, therefore, the directors had power to pay off the first encumbrance. If it was within their power to redeem, it was also within their power to borrow the necessary funds for the purpose, and the discretion which they exercised has not really been impeached. I think, therefore, that this portion of the case fails as against the defendants other than Allott and the representative of Loxley.

I have next to consider the case so far as it relates to the sums expended by the directors out of the assets of the company for the preservation, maintenance, and working of the colliery. It was contended, again on the authority of Small v.

Smith (6), that it was altogether beyond the power of the directors. On the other hand, it was contended, on the authority of the Royal Bank of India's Case (7), that the whole of this expenditure took place as a consequence of acts proper and prudent to be done with a view to obtaining the benefit of the security. The test, according to Small v. Smith (6), is not to consider whether the directors had power to do everything which might have been done by individuals or unfettered directors, but it is to be considered whether the rules confer expressly or by fair implication any such power on the directors. There is here no rule which expressly sanctions such expenditure. Neither is there any rule conferring on the directors of the society any such unlimited authority as was vested in the directors in the Royal Bank of India's Case (7). The rules again do not, as was the case in Small v. Smith (6), prescribe the duties of the directors as to the enforcing and realising of securities; but, by r. 19, they are empowered to do such acts as are authorised by the Building Societies Act, 1874. Section 13 of that Act confers on building societies power to hold land (with the right of foreclosure, subject to the obligation to convert into money as soon as conveniently may be practicable) to which an absolute title has been acquired. Under the powers so conferred the plaintiff society might enter into possession of any land, whether freehold, copyhold, or leasehold, comprised in a mortgage made by a member to secure an advance, and might retain possession till a sale was conveniently practicable. By the rules the directors are, as it appears to me, authorised to do the same thing.

Apart from this, I conceive that, under the general powers of management vested in the directors, they have by implication power to make use of any of the ordinary remedies of mortgagees, among which is to be reckoned the power of entering into possession of the land comprised in these securities. Such entry is, in the language of LORD SELBORNE, one of those things which would or might result from the working out of the legal rights and remedies already existing. This being so, it appears to me to follow that, if the land be leasehold, the directors must, upon entering into possession, have power to make all ordinary payments necessary to prevent the forfeiture of that property, and particularly to expend out of the assets of the society all sums necessary for the payment of rent, when such payment is secured by a power of re-entry contained in the lease. I do not think that any inference to the contrary can fairly be drawn from the special provisions contained in rr. 51 and 53, both of which appear to me to confer powers of expenditure of an ampler nature than that which has been just expressed. Rule 51, which is to be read in connection with r. 50, deals with advances to be made to members for the purpose of building, and would apply to a case where the land is not held subject to any condition or stipulation for the erection of such buildings. It, therefore, confers a power much wider than that which would accrue from the simple right of possession, and sanctions acts which, according to the tests expressed by LORD SELBORNE, would not be held within the powers of the directors of a society such as the plaintiff society. Rule 53, again, authorises the payment out of the funds of the society of any chief or ground rent not duly paid, and would, as I think, apply although the society had not entered into possession of the property which was the subject of the rent.

It follows from what I have said that the directors had power to enter into possession of the leasehold property mortgaged to them, and to pay the rents reserved by the leases under which Mr. Joseph held, so as to prevent the forfeiture of the demised property under the power of re-entry, and to expend out of the assets of the society all sums necessary for that purpose. Consequently, they cannot be liable for such expenditure. On the other hand, there is at least one considerable item for which it appears to be difficult to find legal justification. At the time when they entered into possession the wages of the miners were in arrear, and the directors paid those arrears, and expended in so doing sums amounting to £2,692 19s. 10d. This expenditure does not appear to me, as at present advised, to be, in the language of LORD SELBORNE, but to be rather a thing done to meet a temporary inconvenience, and one which there was no potential necessity to do. That is my present opinion upon the evidence before me, but I do not think these items were gone into very carefully, or discussed from the point of view from which I look at them; and, therefore, I mean to leave it open to the defendants to adduce further evidence as to the circumstances under which the wages were paid.

“a proper consequence of the relation existing between mortgagor and mortgagee, or one of the things which, by working out the legal rights and remedies always existing on the one side or the other, would or might result,”

As regards the other items, it is not so easy to lay down any precise rule defining which are proper and which are improper. The difficulty may be illustrated by a passage in LORD SELBORNE'S speech, which appears to lay down that directors might complete a building partially erected upon land, although they could not proceed to build where there had been a total failure to perform a contract to erect houses on the land. Under these circumstances I think it would be best that, before the case is finally disposed of, there should be an inquiry as to what assets of the company have been expended by the directors otherwise than in making the advances, or in payment of the rents reserved by the leases under which the various portions of the mortgaged property were held.

The order I propose to make is as follows: Declare that the defendant Allott and the estate of Mr. Henry Loxley, deceased, are jointly and severally liable to make good to the plaintiffs the amounts advanced out of the assets of the plaintiffs to Joseph in the statement of claim mentioned, and also the amounts expended out of the assets of the plaintiffs for the preservation or the maintenance and working of the colliery and securities therein also mentioned, with consequential accounts and inquiries, and order them to pay the costs up to the trial, such costs being properly limited, of course, to such a judgment as would be obtained upon the statement of claim. Dismiss the action, with costs, against the representatives of Mr. Leader. Declare that the remaining defendants are not liable to make good to the plaintiffs the amounts advanced out of the assets of the plaintiffs to Joseph, or expended out of such assets in payment of the rents reserved by the leases under which the leasehold estates comprised in the several securities in the pleadings mentioned were, or are, held. Dismiss the action, with costs, against them, so far as it claims relief in respect of the amounts so advanced and expended as aforesaid. Direct an inquiry, whether any and what amounts have been expended out of the assets of the plaintiffs, for the purposes of the said colliery, otherwise than in accordance with the last preceding declaration, and, if so, for what purposes and under what circumstances, and by which of the directors respectively, and reserve further consideration, and the question of all costs not disposed of by this order.

Order accordingly.

Compulsory Purchase—Water undertaking—Reservation of “mines of coal, ironstone, slate or other minerals”—“Minerals”—Subsoil clay—Construction of reservation.

By s. 18 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847: “The undertakers shall not be entitled to any mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals under any land purchased by them, except only such parts thereof as shall be necessary to be dug or carried away or used in the construction of the waterworks, unless the same shall have been expressly purchased, and all such mines, excepting as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance of such lands, unless they shall have been expressly named therein and conveyed thereby.”

Ordinary subsoil clay, lying at a depth of two or three feet below the surface of the soil and being of varying thickness and normally wrought opencast, is not a “mineral” within s. 18, and so was held not to be excepted from the conveyance on a compulsory purchase of land by water undertakers.

Per LORD WATSON: In construing a reservation of mines or minerals, whether it occur in a private deed or in an inclosure Act, regard must be had not only to the words employed to describe the things reserved, but to the relative positions of the parties interested, and to the substance of the transaction or arrangement which such deed or Act embodies. “Mines” and “minerals” are not definite terms; they are susceptible of limitation or expansion, according to the intention with which they are used It appears to me that the policy of the [Waterworks and Railway Clauses] Acts in excepting certain minerals from conveyances to compulsory takers of land favours a liberal and not a limited construction of the reservation to the seller My present impression is that “other minerals” must necessarily include all minerals which can reasonably be said to be ejusdem generis with any of those excavated.

Per LORD MACNAGHTEN: The exception in favour of the vendor in s. 18 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, does not extend to minerals other than minerals of which mines are composed. The word “mines” in its primary significance means underground excavations or workings.

Notes. Section 18 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, was repealed by the Water Act, 1945 (26 HALSBURY’S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 913), and replaced by s. 11 of Sched. 3 to that Act. Section 77 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (19 HALSBURY’S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 590), is in the same terms as s. 18 of the Act of 1847.

Appeal by the plaintiffs in the action from a decision of the First Division of the Court of Session consisting of the Lord President (LORD INGLIS), and LORD SHAND and LORD ADAM (LORD MURE dissenting), reversing a decision of the Lord Ordinary (LORD MACLAREN) in favour of the appellants.

The action was brought by the appellants, the Lord Provost and magistrates of Glasgow, as commissioners under the Glasgow Waterworks Act, 1855, to restrain the respondent from working a bed of clay which formed the subsoil of a piece of land compulsorily purchased by them from the respondent's predecessor in title, for the purposes of their special Act, which incorporated the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, and the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845. The respondent claimed a right to work the clay, contending that it had not passed to the appellants, but was included in the reservation of "other minerals" provided in s. 18 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847.

The Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.) and Balfour Browne, Q.C. (Robertson, Q.C., with them) for the appellants.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and Byrne for the respondent.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Aug. 10, 1888. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I cannot conceal from myself the importance and the difficulty of the question involved in this case. The consequences flowing from a decision either way seem to me to be very grave, and I desire, therefore, to say at the outset that I wish to decide nothing but what is necessarily involved in the particular case now before your Lordships.

That question may be thus summarily stated—whether clay is included in the reservation of mines and minerals under the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. I cannot help thinking that the true test of what are mines and minerals in a grant was suggested by JAMES, L.J., in Hext v. Gill (1), to which I shall have occasion hereafter to refer, and although the lord justice held himself bound by authority so that he yielded to the technical sense which had been attributed to those words, I still think (to use his language) that it is a question of fact what the words “mines and minerals” mean in the vernacular of the mining world, the commercial world, and landowners, at the time when they are used in the instrument it is necessary to consider. I will not at present say how far I think we are bound by authority because, as I have already intimated, I desire to keep myself entirely free if the question should arise in this House with respect to any other statute or with respect to any grant not controlled by the statute in question in which the words “mines and minerals” occur. It may be that I am influenced by the considerations to which WICKENS, V.-C., referred in Hext v. Gill (1), when he said (7 Ch. App. at p. 705, n.) that “it might be thought that some inclination had arisen on the part of judges to give more weight than ought to have been attributed to some small circumstances of context in order to cut down the proper and ordinary meaning of the words ‘mines and minerals.’ ”

I think no one can doubt that if a man purchased a site for his house with a reservation of mines and minerals, neither he nor anybody else would imagine that the vendor had reserved under the reservation of mines and minerals the stratum of clay upon which his house was built.

There is no doubt that more accurate scientific investigation of the substances of the earth and different modes of extracting them have contributed to render the sense of the word “minerals” less certain than when it originally was used in relation to mining operations. I should think that there could be no doubt that the word “minerals” in old times meant the substances got by mining, and I think mining in old times meant subterranean excavation. I doubt whether, in the present state of the authorities, it is accurate to say that in every deed or in every statute the word “minerals” has acquired a meaning of its own independently of any question as to the manner in which the minerals themselves are gotten. MELLISH, L.J., in the case to which I have already referred, sums up the authorities by saying (ibid. at p. 712) that and he says that the result of the authorities appears to be

“that a reservation of minerals includes every substance which can be got from underneath the surface of the earth for the purpose of profit, unless there is something in the context or in the nature of the transaction to induce the court to give it a more limited meaning.”

I cannot myself assent to such a definition. In the first place, it introduces as one element the circumstance that the substance can be got at a profit. It is obvious to see that if that is an essential part of the definition, the question whether a particular substance is or is not a mineral may depend on the state of the market, and it may be that a mineral one year is not a mineral the next. If, on the other hand, one is to have recourse to etymology or science, and to disregard the mode of working as reflecting any light on the nature of the substance, it is obvious to inquire whether coal is a mineral. Its vegetable origin would, to some minds, exclude its being regarded as a mineral, while the substance kaolin was held by WICKENS, V.-C., in Hext v. Gill (1) (7 Ch. App. at p. 705) to be a mineral: A

“According to the evidence, kaolin, or china clay, is a metalliferous mineral, perfectly distinguishable from and much more valuable than ordinary agricultural earth, and which produces metal in a larger proportion to its bulk as compared with ordinary ones, but which it was not commercially profitable to work in England for the purpose of extracting metal from it.” B

The difficulty of dealing with this case is not diminished but rather increased by the state of the authorities upon the question. C

In Great Western Rail. Co. v. Bennett (2) all that was decided in this House was that the common law principle which would have prevented an owner who had sold his surface land to a railway company from defeating his grant by withdrawing support from the surface land so used did not apply to a state of things created by the statute, in which the statute itself creates the distinction between the surface owner and the mineowner, and gives power to the mineowner to work his minerals unless the railway company purchases or gives compensation to the mineowner for leaving his mines unworked. In that case it was admitted that the word “minerals” was properly applicable to the substances to be worked, and the only question was the application of the common law principle to which I have adverted. But the legislature must have meant something by the distinction which it recognises and acts upon in drawing the distinction which, as a matter of business and understanding in the mining and commercial world, I think every one must be familiar with. D E

It appears to me that the effect of some of the decisions pushed to their logical consequences would altogether efface the distinction which all the statutes recognise. One might summarise these decisions and say that a mineral need not be metallic. It need not be subjacent; it need not be worked by a mine; it need not be in any one particular distinguished from any part of the substance of the earth, using the word “earth” as applicable to this habitable globe. Even the word “organic” must be rejected if referred to some of the substances which form part of the earth. The bones of extinct animals are limestone, and as curiosities for research and scientific inquiry would find a ready market. Are they minerals? I find myself called upon to construe the words with reference to the known usage of the language employed in distinguishing proprietary rights in Scotland and having relation to Scottish land and Scottish mines or minerals. I am not insensible to the observation that this is only one of a group of statutes which may be supposed to have had the same object, and might be, therefore, assumed to use the same phraseology in the same sense. Still, I am construing the application of general words to a purchase under the statutes made in Scotland, and if there be any difference in the law of Scotland from that of England the legislature must be supposed to have been familiar with it and to have legislated accordingly. F G H

The case is stated by the Lord Ordinary thus: I

“Here the thing which the defender claims to work is the common clay which constitutes the subsoil of the greater part of the land of this country, which never can in any locality be wrought by underground working, but under all circumstances is only to be won by tearing up and destroying the surface over the entire extent of the working. When such a right is claimed against the owner of the surface, I ask myself: Did anyone who wanted to purchase or acquire a clay field, whether by disposition or reservation, ever bargain for it under the name of a right of working minerals? In the case

A of a voluntary sale of land with reservation of minerals, I am satisfied that we should not permit the seller to work the clay to the destruction or injury of the purchaser's estate, because we should hold that the conversion of the estate into a clay field was not within the fair meaning of the reservation. That being so, I see no reason for concluding that the statutory reservation of minerals means anything different from a reservation of minerals in a private deed. The consequences of the reservation are different but the thing to be reserved is, to my mind, essentially the same, being neither more nor less than the right to work such substances and strata as are ordinarily known by the denomination of minerals in contracts between sellers and purchasers, or superiors and feuars."

3 If that is the correct view, and I find myself unable to differ from it, I think that Menzies v. Earl of Breadalbane and Holland (3) is a binding authority in this House. There the words were "haill mines and minerals of whatever nature and quality," and were held not to include a vein of stone suitable for building. I feel it impossible to resist the reasoning of LORD MURE in this case, but I hold myself free, if the question should arise in England, to consider quite independently of this decision what may be the law as applicable to an English case. I only regret that the test which JAMES, L.J., suggested, and which I think would have been the true one, was not adhered to in Hext v. Gill (1). In that case, as I have pointed out before, the substance which was called china clay was assumed to be metalliferous ore, and it was held that, though the lord of the manor had reserved it, he could not work it, because he had not also reserved a right to work it so as not to injure the land he had sold to a copyhold tenant. I hesitated very much to adopt the reasoning of that case, notwithstanding the high authority by which it was decided. I am satisfied with the view so clearly put forward by LORD MURE, and, upon the reasoning of that learned Lord's judgment, I move your Lordships that the interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session be reversed.

F LORD WATSON.—The question raised for decision in this appeal, which is one of general importance, has led to differences of judicial opinion in this House, as well as in the Court of Session. For my own part I have experienced considerable difficulty in forming an opinion upon it, owing to the very indefinite terms which the legislature has used to describe the minerals reserved by statute to proprietors whose land is compulsorily purchased, for the purposes of railway or waterworks undertakings. The present controversy is between a statutory body of water commissioners and a landowner, who is now asserting his right to work out a seam of clay within a parcel of ground, about twenty-one acres in extent, which they acquired from him, under compulsory powers, in the year 1871; but the question which your Lordships have to consider would, in my opinion, have been precisely the same if the purchasers had been a railway company. The court below disposed of the case without inquiry into the facts; and these must consequently be gathered from the statements made by the parties on record, which are unfortunately, in some respects, conflicting. It appears, however, and it was assumed in the arguments addressed to us, that the seam in dispute is composed of ordinary subsoil clay, such as is generally found throughout the district; that it lies at a depth of not more than two or three feet below the surface of the soil; that it is of considerable but variable thickness; and that it has been wrought opencast by the respondent in close proximity to the appellants' land, where its extreme thickness has proved to be from twenty to thirty feet. Since their acquisition of the ground, the appellants have constructed upon it two reservoirs, each capable of storing nearly four million gallons of water, which have been sunk into and now rest upon the clay.

Section of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, is identical, mutatis mutandis, with s. 77 of the English, and s. 70 of the Scottish Railway Clauses Act, 1845. It enacts :

“The undertakers shall not be entitled to any mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals under any land purchased by them, except only such parts thereof as shall be necessary to be dug or carried away or used in the construction of the waterworks, unless the same shall have been expressly purchased, and all such mines, excepting as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance of such lands, unless they shall have been expressly named therein and conveyed thereby.”

The Act of 1847 is a British statute, whereas there is separate railway legislation for England and Ireland, on the one hand, and Scotland, on the other; but it does not appear to me to admit of doubt that the legislature intended the words “mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals” to have the same meaning in all three countries. In considering whether subsoil clay, such as we have to deal with in the present case, is one of the “other minerals” meant to be excepted, I have been unable to derive much assistance from such authorities as Menzies v. Earl of Breadalbane and Holland (3), in which it was held that the reservation by a superior in a feu-contract of the “haill mines and minerals” that might be found within the lands disposed in feu, did not give him right to a freestone quarry. Nor have I been able to obtain much light from Hext v. Gill (1) and other English cases referred to in the opinion of LORD SHAND, which his Lordship seems to regard as almost decisive of the present question.

The only principle which I can extract from the authorities is that in construing a reservation of mines or minerals, whether it occur in a private deed or in an inclosure Act, regard must be had not only to the words employed to describe the things reserved, but to the relative positions of the parties interested, and to the substance of the transaction or arrangement which such deed or Act embodies. “Mines” and “minerals” are not definite terms; they are susceptible of limitation or expansion, according to the intention with which they are used. In Menzies v. Earl of Breadalbane and Holland (3), LORD ELDON observed that the reservation

“is not contained in a lease, but in a feu, and I take it there is a very great difference as to the principles that are to be applied to the construction of a feu and a lease; it is a question of a very different nature.”

In Hext v. Gill (1) the controversy, which related to china clay worked for the purpose of obtaining the felspar which it contained, arose between the lord of the manor and the purchaser of the freehold of a copyhold tenement within the manor under a contract which excepted “all mines and minerals,” and in these circumstances it was sufficiently clear that the copyholder had only right to the surface, and had no right to minerals of any kind.

I need not refer in detail to the provisions of the Waterworks and Railway Clauses Acts, which follow and are connected with the sections of these Acts already noticed. The relation which they establish between seller and purchaser, in regard to all minerals which may be held to be excepted, appears to me to be, as LORD WESTBURY said in Great Western Rail. Co. v. Bennett (2), clearly defined, useful to the railway company or waterworks undertakers, and at the same time fair and just to the mineowner. The latter, who is forced to part with the surface of his land, and all uses for which it is available, is not compelled to sell his minerals, while he is not in a position to ascertain their marketable value, or the impediments which might be occasioned to the convenient working of his mineral field by his parting with a strip which intersects it. On the other hand, those who deprive him of the right to a portion of the surface and its uses by compulsory purchase, enjoy the benefit of subjacent and adjacent

A support to their works without payment, so long as the minerals below or adjoining these works remain undisturbed; but it is upon the condition that, if they desire such support to be continued, they must make full compensation for value and intersectional damage whenever the minerals required for that purpose are approached in working, and would in due course be wrought out. It appears to me that the policy of the Acts in excepting certain minerals from conveyances
B to compulsory takers of land favours a liberal and not a limited construction of the reservation to the seller. The difficulty which I have felt in construing their enactments is due to the fact that they do not deal with "minerals" as something which may be different from and additional to "mines." They do not except mines and minerals, but mines of coal, ironstone, slate, and other minerals; that is to say, they only except minerals which, when worked, will constitute
C "mines" within the meaning of s. 18 of the Act of 1847, and of the corresponding sections of the Railway Clauses Acts.

It, therefore, becomes necessary to consider what meaning ought in these sections to be attributed to the word "mine," and also what are the "other minerals," mines of which are specially excepted? The solution of the second of these queries must necessarily be, in a great measure, dependent upon the
D answer to be given to the first. There is a class of cases in the English books which determine that the word "mine" is, according to its primary meaning, significant merely of the method of working by which minerals are got, but that is not its only or necessary meaning. Shortly after the passing of the [repealed] Poor Relief Act, 1601, it was established by a series of decisions, the E soundness of which has been often doubted, that occupiers of mines other than coal mines are exempted from the incidence of the poor rate. That point being settled beyond recall, the courts gave a restricted meaning to the word "mine," and decided that, in the sense of the Act of Elizabeth, it must be taken to be a subterranean excavation. It was accordingly held that persons who worked lead, freestone, limestone, or even clay, by means of a shaft and under-
F ground levels, were not liable to be rated in respect of their occupancy; while others who worked the same substances by means of excavations open to the light of day were held to be liable as occupiers of land. I do not suggest that the courts erred in limiting, so far as they could, the exemption which, for some reason or other, had been established; but I may venture to express a doubt whether any such exemption or distinction with regard to the mode of working
G would have been recognised if the Act of 1601 had not become law until the year 1847. I am unable to assent to the appellants' argument that, in s. 18 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, "mines" must be understood in the same sense which it has been held to bear in the statute of Elizabeth. Such may have been the original meaning of the word, but it appears to me to be beyond question that for a very long period that has ceased to be its exclusive meaning and that H the word has been used in ordinary language to signify either the mineral substances which are excavated or mined, or the excavations, whether subterranean or not, from which metallic ores and fossil substances are dug out. It does not occur to me that an open excavation of auriferous quartz would be generally described as a gold quarry. I think most people would naturally call it a gold mine.

I The whole frame of s. 18 indicates, in my opinion, that the legislature intended it to include minerals got by open working as well as minerals got by what has been termed mining proper. The clause excepts mines of slate and also of "other minerals"—an expression which must, at the least, include rock strata of the same homogeneous character, and generally worked, or capable of being worked, by the same methods as slate. The fact is of sufficient notoriety to be noticed here that, although in the extreme south-west of the island slate is obtained by subterranean workings, the reverse is the rule in North Wales and in Scotland, where it is quarried. The word "quarry" is no doubt inapplicable to underground excavations; but the word "mine" may without impropriety be used to denote some quarries. DR. JOHNSON defines a quarry to be a stone mine. In passing s. 18 and the corresponding railway clauses, the legislature plainly intended that waterworks undertakers and railway companies should, at the time when they take land by compulsion, pay full compensation for and become at once proprietors of all surface and other strata which are not excepted.

To adopt in these clauses the same construction of "mines" which has been followed for the purposes of the English poor rate would, in my opinion, lead to consequences which the legislature cannot have contemplated. In that case the extent to which minerals in the land were sold or excepted, at the date of the conveyance, would depend upon the mode, under ground or open cast, by which they might be found, at some future and far distant time, to be workable, or upon the method according to which the landowner might then choose to work them. These factors being indeterminate, it would be well-nigh impossible, at the date of the purchase, to arrive at a fair estimate of the compensation payable for it. I cannot conceive that the legislature, in using the expression mines of slate, meant to distinguish between the different methods of getting it, and to enact that slate, which may never be disturbed, shall be taken and paid for at once, if it would naturally be quarried, but shall not be taken and paid for until it is actually worked if it would naturally be got by means of an underground level. It was certainly within the contemplation of the legislature that water or railway works may rest upon excepted minerals; because it is expressly provided that the undertakers or the company are to be entitled to such parts of these minerals as require to be excavated for the purpose of constructing their works. When a railway company or water undertakers excavate in order to obtain foundations for their works, there is no roof to the excepted minerals; and it is difficult to understand how, in these circumstances, they could be got by proper mining. I am, accordingly, of opinion that in these enactments the word "mines" must be taken to signify all excavations by which the excepted minerals may be legitimately worked and got. If coal, ironstone, or slate crops out at any part of the surface taken for waterworks or railway purposes, the undertakers or the company acquires, in my opinion, no right, save the right to use that part of the surface; they acquire no right to the minerals themselves, except in so far as these are dug out or excavated in order to construct their works.

The important question still remains: What are the minerals referred to, other than coal, ironstone, or slate? My present impression is that "other minerals" must necessarily include all minerals which can reasonably be said to be ejusdem generis with any of those excavated. Slate being one of them, I do not think it would be possible to exclude freestone or limestone strata. I may add that, so far as I can see, it is possible that there may be some strata which would pass to the compulsory purchasers, if they lay on the surface, but may possibly be reserved to the seller, if they occur at some depth below it. But I desire to say that, in the view which I take of the present case, it is not necessary to determine any of these points. The enactments in question describe the excepted mines of minerals, as lying under the land compulsorily acquired; and they appear to me to contemplate that the purchasers, as soon as they obtain a conveyance, shall become the owners of "the land." That expression, as it occurs in these enactments, obviously refers to surface; and the question, therefore, arises what, in ordinary acceptation, is understood to be the surface crust of the earth which overlies its mineral strata? It is, of course, conceded that vegetable mould, which commonly forms a large ingredient of the topmost layer of the crust, is not within the exception; but it is also the fact that, in many districts, the cultivable soil is mainly composed of clay, which is a mineral in the sense that it is an inorganic substance. I have come to the conclusion that the expression "the land" cannot be restricted to vegetable mould, or to cultivated clay; but that it naturally includes, and must be held to include, the upper soil, including the subsoil whether it be clay, sand, or gravel; and that the exceptional depth of the subsoil, while it may enhance the compensation payable at the time, affords no ground for bringing it within the category of excepted minerals. I am, accordingly, of opinion that the interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session ought to be reversed, and that of the Lord Ordinary allowed.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I have the misfortune to differ from the rest of your Lordships who heard the arguments in this case. I confess that my mind has wavered much as to the proper conclusion to be arrived at, and I need hardly say that I have the less confidence in my opinion when I find it differs from those which your Lordships entertain.

The point for decision in this case is a simple one, and may be shortly stated, but, to my mind, it is one of very considerable difficulty. The appellants in 1871 purchased a piece of land from a predecessor in title of the respondent for the purpose of constructing works authorised by the Glasgow Corporation Waterworks Act, 1866, for the sum of £11,000, and have constructed their works upon it. The disposition to the appellants contained a reservation in favour of the sellers of the “whole coal and other minerals in the said lands in terms of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847.” The Act just named, which is incorporated with the appellants’ private Act, under which the land was purchased, provides (s. 18): [His LORDSHIP read the section] I may observe here that I cannot accede to the view that the present case is to be dealt with as if the “coal and other minerals” had been reserved to the respondent by the operation of the disposition alone without regard to the statutory provision I have quoted.

It appears to me that whatever the statute excluded from the purchase was excluded in the present case, and that the issue between the parties depends entirely upon the construction to be put upon the statute in relation to the circumstances before us. Within and under the lands purchased, and the adjoining land, there is a seam of clay which the respondent had been for some time working in the adjoining lands, and in March, 1885, he intimated that he was desirous of working it under the ground acquired by the pursuers, and called upon them to state whether they would avail themselves of their right to prevent his working the seam by making him compensation therefor in terms of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. Hence the present action, the appellants insisting that the clay was included in their purchase, and that the respondent had no title to it. In the fourth condescendence it is alleged that the seam of clay lies at an average depth of only two feet below the surface, and that it can be worked only by open workings, which would destroy or endanger the appellants’ works. This is not admitted by the answer, which alleges that the clay in the ground adjoining has been wrought open cast, “but previous tiring of the surface is not necessary.” I understand this to mean that the clay under the appellants’ land could be worked otherwise than from the surface. The answer further states that the seam is of great value. No proof was led, the learned Lord Ordinary being of opinion that it was unnecessary to do so.

Upon the allegations I have referred to the question arises, and I think it is the sole question in the case, whether this seam of clay was reserved within the terms “mines of coal, slate, ironstone, and other minerals,” or whether the whole of it lying under the land conveyed passed by the conveyance. The real question, then, to be determined is the meaning to be given to the words “mines and other minerals” in construing the Act of 1847. And I doubt whether we are very much assisted by the interpretation which has been put upon the same words appearing in a different collocation or in other instruments or enactments. Your Lordships were referred to various English authorities for the purpose of showing that clay had been held in a case in the Court of Appeal to be within a reservation of minerals, and that in other cases a definition of minerals had been adopted sufficiently wide to include it. On the other hand, reliance was placed upon some Scottish authorities, and notably on Menzies' Case (3) in your Lordships' House, as establishing that in a contract between superior and vassal a reservation of mines and minerals did not comprise freestone, which could only be obtained by quarrying. LORD MURE, whose judgment in the court below was in favour of the appellants, based his opinion upon the ground that, though it might be settled by the English authorities that minerals had the extensive meaning contended for, yet it was settled by the Scottish law that in an ordinary contract of conveyance a more restricted interpretation must be adopted, and that there was no reason for construing differently the statutory reservation in question. It is to be observed, however, that the enactment with which we have to deal is intended to be incorporated with all Waterworks Acts, whether in England or Scotland, and that both the Scottish and English Railways Clauses Acts contain similar provisions.

When the object and purview of these various statutes is regarded, it is not to be supposed that the legislature intended the same or similar enactments in these various statutes to have a different meaning. What we have to do, then, is, I think, to look at the purview and intent of the Acts, and to consider what the legislature meant by the language they have employed. It is impossible to peruse the various provisions of the Act we are considering without seeing that the words "mines" and "minerals" are somewhat loosely used. Before proceeding to the interpretation of them, it may be well to inquire what was the object of the legislature in reserving the minerals and not vesting them in the undertakers of the works authorised by the Acts with which the general Act is incorporated. This object is, I think, clearly stated by the learned Lords who delivered their opinions in Great Western Rail. Co. v. Bennett (2). I think these provisions were inserted for the common advantage of the landowner and the undertakers. He was not to be compelled to sell minerals which were not needed for the purpose of the undertaking, and they were not to be compelled to purchase and pay for minerals which they did not want, which the owner of them might never desire to work, and as to which it would be often difficult to determine beforehand whether their working would be likely to affect the waterworks or railway constructed on the surface of the land. I think, therefore, that we should expect to find reserved all minerals under the land of such a nature as are commonly worked and possess a value independent of the surface.

I propose first to inquire what meaning ought to be attached to the word "minerals," supposing only the words "coals, ironstone, slate or other minerals" had been employed without any mention of "mines." I think that the word "minerals" imports, prima facie, and apart from any context, all substances other than the vegetable matters forming the ordinary surface of the ground. In this widest sense clay is unquestionably a mineral. But we have to look to the context to see whether the word is here used in a more limited sense, and if so, what is the limitation to be put upon it. I think the popular use of the word is often narrower, and that when people talk of minerals they frequently use the word in reference to metals or metalliferous ores. But it is impossible to give this restricted meaning to the word in the enactment we are seeking to construe. Coal and slate are specifically mentioned, and the words "other minerals" cannot be confined to metallic substances. Coal, slate, and ironstone are minerals most dissimilar in their character, and I have sought in vain for any mode of restricting the word "minerals" in this section, whether by confining it to things ejusdem generis with those specified, or otherwise. There is no common genus within which coal, slate, and ironstone can be comprised, except that they are mineral substances of sufficient value to be commonly worked. But the words which I have hitherto discussed do not, as has been seen, stand alone. The things reserved are "any mines" of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals under the land purchased. It appears to me that this limits the reservation to mines of the substances named, and, therefore, to "mines" of the other minerals included in the general term.

What, then, is the interpretation to be put upon the word "mines?" I think the primary idea suggested to the popular mind, by the use of the word, is an underground working in which minerals are being or have been wrought. It is certainly often used in contrast to "quarry," as indicating an underground working as opposed to one open to the surface. But to limit it in the enactment we are construing to an underground cavity in which minerals are being or have been wrought would be obviously inadmissible. The enactment was clearly intended to extend to minerals lying underground which had hitherto been undisturbed. Is the true interpretation to be found by limiting the provision to those minerals which are commonly worked by means of underground working? The word "mines" is, I think, in a secondary sense, very frequently applied to a place where minerals commonly worked underground are being wrought, though in the particular case the working is from the surface. For example, where iron is got by surface workings, they are spoken of as iron mines, and so, too, with coal which crops out at the surface. No one, I think, ever heard of a coal or iron quarry. On the other hand, the term slate quarry is undoubtedly sometimes made use of, though the workings are underground. I think it is impossible to obtain any assistance from this use of the word "mines" in construing s. 18. It is no doubt exceptional to obtain coal and iron except by underground workings, but this is not so with slate, and the word "mines" is used alike in reference to all these substances.

I thought for some time that the language used must be construed as applying only to those seams or strata of the specified and other minerals which were capable of being wrought by underground workings. It seems to me that there is much to be said for that view, but after reflection I do not feel that it affords a safe basis for decision, nor is it clear that it would assist the appellants. It must be remembered, and I think this has an important bearing on the view adopted by the learned Lord Ordinary, that it is part of the scheme of the statute that the undertakers do not purchase any right to the support of the underlying strata of minerals. No one has doubted that if they refuse to purchase the reserved minerals, whatever is really within the reservation may be got, even though the result be to cause a serious subsidence and even dislocation of the surface. In this respect the case differs from an ordinary reservation in a deed unaffected by statutory provisions. In such a case the owner of the reserved minerals can only work such portion of them as can be removed without causing disturbance of the surface, or if he remove more he must provide some substituted means of support. Therefore, where it is suggested that the reservation in question embraces only such mineral seams as are capable of being worked underground, that cannot mean such as are capable of being so worked without disturbing the surface. Once this conclusion is arrived at, it is difficult to see any firm basis for a distinction between seams which lie at a considerable depth below the surface, the removal of which would be likely to affect it little, and those which lying near it could not be got without very seriously affecting it. What valid distinction could be drawn between a seam of coal or ironstone a hundred yards beneath the surface, and one which came within two feet of it? And if the latter would be within the reservation, how can a seam of clay similarly situated be excluded?

I have said that it is not clear that the proposed interpretation of the section would be of any advantage to the appellants. For, proof not having been led, I cannot assume that the clay might not be got otherwise than by surface operations by working on from the adjoining land, though, of course, its removal would cause subsidence and great disintegration of the surface. I own I have entertained very grave doubts as to the proper conclusion to be arrived at, but I do not see my way to differ from the judgment of the court below. I think the reservation must be taken to extend to all such bodies of mineral substances lying together in seams, beds, or strata, as are commonly worked for profit, and have a value independent of the surface of the land. I desire to guard myself against being supposed to decide more than I do. The pursuers in this action seek to interdict the defender altogether from working the clay under their land in any manner whatsoever. All that, in my opinion, arises for decision is whether they are entitled to do so. I say this because it was contended before us that inasmuch as the statute authorises the use of such part of the minerals as may be necessary for the pursuers' works, and the bed of clay forms the bottom and sides of their reservoir, the defender cannot be entitled to take away this clay. But this point, which is well worthy of consideration, does not appear to me to be raised at the present time. I, therefore, forbear from expressing any opinion upon it or (assuming it to be well founded) upon the further question how much of the clay can be considered as having been used for the purpose of the waterworks, and, therefore, as having become the property of the appellants. I think the interlocutor appealed from ought to be affirmed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—Your Lordships are called upon to determine the meaning of the word “mines,” in s. 18 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. That section is the first and the most important section in the group of clauses collected under the heading “with respect to mines.” Corresponding provisions are to be found in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 77, and the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, s. 70. The argument before your Lordships proceeded on the ground that so far as the present question is concerned the three Acts must be construed alike, and that, in regard to mines under or near lands purchased for the purpose of the undertaking, railways are in precisely the same position as waterworks. The case, therefore, is one of considerable importance. But the question lies in a narrow compass, and must, I think, depend for its solution on an examination of the sections in the Waterworks Act which bear upon the subject, with the aid of such light as may be derived from parallel passages in the Railways Acts.

The exception in favour of the vendor in s. 18 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, comprehends, it will be observed, mines of all sorts—mines of coal, ironstone, and slate, and mines of other minerals—but nothing else. Taking the words in their ordinary signification, and in their grammatical construction, the exception does not extend to minerals other than minerals of which mines are composed. This seems clear from the latter part of the section, where the expression “such mines” refers to and sums up everything covered by the words of description previously used. On this exception there is engrafted an exception in favour of the undertakers. It is one of very limited extent. But it throws, I think, considerable light on the meaning of the word “mines.” It excepts “only such parts” of the mines under the lands purchased “as shall be necessary to be dug or carried away, or used in the construction of the works.”

The meaning of the word “mines” is not, I think, open to doubt. In its primary signification it means underground excavations or underground workings. From that it has come to mean things found in mines or to be got by mining, with the chamber in which they are contained. When used of unopened mines in connection with a particular mineral it means little more than veins or seams or strata of that mineral. But, however the word may be used, when we speak of mines in this country, there is always some reference more or less direct to underground working. In Darvill v. Roper (4), and again in Bell v. Wilson (5), KINDERSLEY, V.-C., had to consider the meaning of the term “mines.” In the latter case he asks the question (2 Drew. & Sm. at p. 399): “What is a mine?” and he answers it thus:

“I cannot entertain the smallest doubt that a mine and a quarry are not the same. It would, perhaps, require some labour to define precisely what each is, but we know this, that a mine, properly speaking, is that mode of working for minerals by diving under the earth, and then working horizontally or laterally, whereas a quarry is when the working is sub dio. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind as to the difference between them."

Bell v. Wilson (5) was taken to the Court of Appeal. In his judgment, on the appeal, TURNER, L.J., asks the same question, and after referring to dictionaries answers it in much the same way. As regards that part of the case he expressed his entire concurrence with the Vice-Chancellor.

It was admitted that there is no reported case which throws any doubt on the accuracy of the language used by the Vice-Chancellor in defining or describing a mine. If one wanted a recent authority to confirm the Vice-Chancellor, and to emphasise the ordinary meaning of the word "mines," one could not, I think, do better than turn to the judgment of KAY, J., in the Midland Rail. Co. v. Haunchwood Brick and Tile Co. (6). In describing the case before him the learned judge says (20 Ch.D. at p. 560):

"The subject of litigation in this case is a bed of clay used for making a peculiar kind of brick, and of some value from the circumstance that it contains a certain amount of iron. There are three or four feet of surface earth above this, except at one point where it crops out, but it is in no sense a mine, being got entirely by open workings."

Dealing, therefore, with s. 18 alone, there seems to be no reason for giving the word "mines" a strained or unnatural meaning. It has, indeed, been suggested that the mention of slate tends to show that the word "mines" is used in a loose way, without reference to any particular mode of working, because slate is usually got by open working. But, as everybody knows, there are places where slate is worked underground. The Act excepts mines of slate; it is silent as regards slate quarries. The more natural inference would be that slate mines are excepted, and that slate quarries are not, especially as the Railways Clauses Acts make mention of slate quarries in another group of sections. It has also been suggested that the exception in favour of the undertakers points to minerals near the surface, and, therefore, to minerals which may be got by quarrying. But it seems to me that there is little force in this suggestion. The exception rather tells the other way. In constructing railways and waterworks, in deep cuttings, in tunnelling, or in sinking wells, it is at least possible that minerals contained in mines may be met with. On such an event occurring, were it not for the exception, the operations of the undertakers or of the company might be brought to a standstill. And so the Act gives them, as included in their purchase, such parts of the mines, or in other words, so much of the minerals contained therein as they are obliged to interfere with in the construction of their works. But it gives them nothing more. How strictly railway companies are tied down when their powers are limited by reference to what is "necessary" is shown by the decisions on s. 16 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, as to the diversion of roads and rivers: R. v. Wycombe Rail. Co. (7); Pugh v. Golden Valley Rail Co. (8).

The rights of the undertakers or of the company are limited by the necessity of the case. They are not at liberty to interfere with mines or to use the minerals contained therein merely because it may be a convenience or a saving of expense to do so. If the intention of Parliament had been to reserve to the vendor under the exception of "mines" all minerals of every description however they might be worked, and, therefore, such things as clay, stone, and gravel, which are ordinary materials for constructing or repairing the works, one would have expected to find the undertakers and the company authorised to use not merely such parts of the "mines" as might be necessary, but such parts as might be useful or proper for constructing their works, and, on the other hand, required to pay for what might be so used, and to work under the direction or inspection of the mineowner or his surveyor. So far there seems to be no difficulty. The difficulty, such as it is, is created by the sections which follow s. 18, and which regulate the rights of owners of mineral property (if I may be allowed to use that expression as a neutral term) lying under or near the lands of the undertakers or the company. In these sections we find the expressions "mines or minerals," "such mines," "such mines or minerals," "such minerals," "parts of mines," and "mines, measures, or strata," all applied to the mineral property within the scope of the enactment.

The word "minerals" undoubtedly may have a wider meaning than the word "mines." In its widest signification it probably means every inorganic substance forming part of the crust of the earth other than the layer of soil which sustains vegetable life. In some of the reported cases it seems to be laid down or assumed that to be a mineral a thing must be of commercial value, or workable at a profit. But it is difficult to see why commercial value should be a test, or why that which is a mineral when commercially valuable should cease to be a mineral when it cannot be worked at a profit. Be that as it may, it has been laid down that the word "minerals" when used in a legal document, or in an Act of Parliament, must be understood in its widest signification, unless there be something in the context or in the nature of the case to control its meaning. It has also been held that the use of the word "mines" in conjunction with "minerals" does not of itself limit the meaning of the latter word. At the same time, it cannot be disputed that the term "minerals" is not unfrequently used in a narrower sense, and one, perhaps etymologically more correct, as denoting the contents or products of mines. Nor, indeed, are the authorities all one way in preferring the wider meaning of the word "minerals." In Church v. Inclosure Comrs. (9) WILLIAMS, J., observed, and apparently the rest of the court agreed, that "minerals in the ordinary sense" meant "minerals which could be worked in the ordinary way underground leaving the surface or crust unaffected."

In dealing with the sections which follow s. 18 it is to be observed that their scope is not, like the scope of s. 18 and the corresponding section [s. 77] of the Railways Act, limited to mineral property lying under the lands purchased and excepted or deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance. These sections have a much wider bearing. They extend to mineral property under the lands of the undertakers or the company, however it may have been severed in ownership from those lands. They also extend to mineral property within the prescribed distance, although the lands under which it lies do not belong to the undertakers or the company. It would, therefore, not be enough for the respondents to make out that these sections deal with minerals not contained in mines. They must show that on the fair reading of these sections the word "mines" includes minerals, whether got by mining or not. If that could be established it would go far towards proving that the word "mines" must have that meaning in s. 18 and in the corresponding section of the Railways Act. It may be conceded that in several places in these later sections the word "mines" is used as comprehending whatever is comprehended by the term "minerals" as therein used. But then comes the question: Is the word "minerals" to have its wider signification, and, therefore, to enlarge the meaning of the word "mines," or is the word "mines" to control the meaning of the word "minerals?" In the absence of an explanatory context or some indication to be gathered from the nature of the case it has been held that the narrower meaning of the word "minerals" is not to be preferred. Still it is not a strained or unnatural meaning. You are giving a strained and unnatural meaning to the word "mines" if you make it include minerals not got by mining.

Therefore, if the question were which of the two words should yield to the other, there could, I think, be no doubt as to the answer. The more flexible word must give way. You must do as little violence as possible to the language you have to construe. Apart, however, from this argument, it seems to me that if you look at these enactments carefully, comparing one with the other, you will find enough to show that the minerals spoken of are minerals that are "parts of mines," or minerals that are "contained in mines." I will illustrate my meaning by one or two instances. The sentence in s. 78 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845

"if it appear to the company that the working of such mines or minerals is likely to damage the works of the railways," becomes in the Scottish Act, s. 71,

"if it appear to the company that the working of such mines, either wholly or partially, is likely to damage the works of the railway."

In the rest of the latter section the two expressions, "parts of mines" and "minerals," are used indifferently as convertible terms. The section proceeds as follows :

"and if the company be desirous that such mines, or any parts thereof, be left unworked, and if they be willing to make compensation for such mines or minerals, or such parts thereof as they desire to be left unworked, they shall give notice to such owner, lessee, or occupier of such their desire, and shall in such notice specify the parts of the mines . . . which they shall desire to be left unworked . . . and in such case such owner, lessee, or occupier shall not work or get the mines or minerals comprised in such notice."

In s. 72 of the Scottish Act there is a passage which refers to minerals as being contained in mines; and the context shows that the minerals so referred to are the only minerals in the contemplation of the framers of the Act. The section begins with the following sentence :

"If before the expiration of such thirty days the company do not give notice of their desire to have such mines left unworked, and of their willingness to make such compensation as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for such owner, lessee, or occupier [that is, the owner, lessee, or occupier of any mines or minerals lying under the railway, or any of the works connected therewith, or within the prescribed distance] to work the said mines, or such parts thereof for which the company shall not have agreed to pay compensation, up to the limits of the mines and minerals for which they shall have agreed to make compensation, in such manner as such owner, lessee, or occupier shall think fit, for the purpose of getting the minerals contained therein."

The expression "the minerals contained therein" must mean "the minerals contained in the mines." So the purpose to which the owner of the minerals and the purpose to which the owner of the mines is limited are one and the same, and the purpose of the owner of the minerals in working is not to get minerals, using the word in its widest signification, but to get minerals contained in the mines.

I ought, perhaps, to refer to the passage in which the word "minerals" originally occurs in the material sections of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. It occurs first in s. 22, where it is provided that "if the owner, lessee, or occupier of any mines or minerals," lying under or near the works, "be desirous of working the same," he is to give the prescribed notice, and then certain consequences follow. Every subsequent use of the word may be traced to that passage. If the word "minerals" there means minerals whether got by mining or not, the word "mines" is plainly superfluous, whatever meaning be given to it. But if the word "minerals" be restricted to minerals contained in mines, I doubt whether either word is superfluous. The risk to be guarded against, as it seems to me, was the loss of support by the withdrawal of minerals from the minerals. The minerals might be worked by the owner, lessee, or occupier of the mines. But they might be worked by persons who could not properly be described as owners, lessees, or even as occupiers of the mines. They might be worked by persons having merely a licence to enter and search for minerals, and a grant of the minerals when obtained. The word "minerals" may have been added out of abundant caution to meet such a case as that, and as being a less awkward expression for the draftsman's immediate purpose than the expression "parts of mines" which occurs in s. 18.

At the same time, if the word "minerals" in the sense of "parts of mines," or "minerals contained in mines regarded as separate from the chamber which contains them," be deemed superfluous, I would point out that less care seems to have been given to the framing of these sections than to the framing of s. 18. That section and the corresponding sections of the Railway Acts, mutatis mutandis, are word for word the same. In the sections which follow in each of the three Acts there are changes from the language of the other two, and also variations of expression in the same Act in many cases where it is impossible to suggest any difference in meaning. These sections seem to have been taken at random from different common forms without any attempt at precision or uniformity of language. In such a composition it is not surprising that a superfluous word should be found. It would be singular that in a short clause like s. 18 of the Waterworks Act, which exhausts the particular subject dealt with, the leading word should be used in a strained and unfamiliar signification, and that the same peculiarity should be found in all three Acts. There is no passage in any one of the Acts which requires the wider signification of the word "minerals." On the other hand, the provisions for inspecting mines, both before and during working, and the provisions for the ventilation of the minerals for making airways and mining communications, all seem to point in the same direction, and to show that the Acts throughout these sections are dealing with mines, using the word in its proper and usual signification.

Little or no assistance is to be derived from the rest of the Waterworks Clauses Act. But it may be observed that s. 12 authorises the undertakers to dig and break up the soil of the lands which they enter under the powers of their special Act, and "to remove or use all earth, stone, mines, minerals, trees, and other things dug or gotten out of the same." The mention of earth and stone in conjunction with minerals seems to show that these substances were not considered by the framers of the Act to be necessarily comprehended by the term "minerals."

In considering the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, it is, I think, worth while to refer to the group of sections prefaced by the heading, "With respect to the temporary occupation of lands near the railway during the construction thereof": ss. 32 to 43 of the English Act, ss. 27 to 36 of the Scottish Act. These sections empower the company, for certain specified purposes, to enter upon and use any lands within a distance from the centre of the line not measured by, or necessarily corresponding with, the limits of deviation, and to do so at any time before the expiration of the period limited for the completion of the railway, a period which generally, if not always, extends beyond the duration of the company's powers for the compulsory acquisition of land. The purposes specified in the Acts include [s. 32] "the purpose of taking earth or soil by side cuttings therefrom," and "the purpose of obtaining materials therefrom for the construction or repair of the railway." In exercise of these powers, the company is authorised "to dig and take from out of any such lands any clay, stone, gravel, sand, or other things that may be found therein useful or proper for constructing the railway." Later comes a proviso

"that no stone or slate quarry, brick field, or other like place, which at the time of the passing of the special Act shall be commonly worked or used for

A getting materials therefrom for the purpose of selling or disposing of the same, shall be taken or used by the company."

It is clear, therefore, that in certain cases and for certain purposes a railway company may enter upon lands containing brick earth, and use that brick earth, although the lands may not be delineated in the deposited plans, and although the powers of the company to take lands compulsorily may have expired. But, while working as temporary occupiers, they are bound (s. 41) to work in accordance with the directions of the surveyor or agent of the owner of such lands. Section 42 provides that, in all cases where the company enters upon lands for temporary purposes, the owner may "serve a notice in writing on the company requiring them to purchase the said lands." The company thereupon is "bound to purchase the said lands." Nothing is said about mines or minerals in this section, or in this part of the Act, and, as I have already pointed out, there may be cases when the company is not in a position to serve a counter-notice requiring the owner to sell his mines. Section 43 provides: "where the company shall not be required to purchase such lands," compensation shall be made for their temporary occupation, and such compensation shall include "the full value of all clay, stone, gravel, sand, and other things taken from such land."

It seems to follow from the consideration of these sections that, where lands taken by the company for temporary purposes are purchased in pursuance of a statutory notice given by the owner, the purchase vests in the company, as part of the property purchased, clay, stone, gravel, sand, and other things of that sort, useful or proper for constructing the railway, although not expressly purchased or expressly named in the conveyance and conveyed thereby, and also that after the purchase the company are free to work as they please, without being subject to the directions of the surveyor or agent of the vendor. This result, however, seems somewhat incompatible with the view which the respondents take of the meaning of the term "mines" in s. 77. It must be borne in mind that that section is not confined to lands which the company require to purchase for the purpose of their undertaking. It applies to "any land purchased" by the company, and, therefore, to lands which the owner requires the company to purchase under s. 42. If the respondents' view be correct a railway company which has lawfully entered on lands for the purpose of taking clay or gravel therefrom might find its operations suspended by a notice to purchase those lands. If clay and gravel be comprehended in the term "mines," and if the time for compelling the landowner to sell mines has passed, the company is helpless. Purchase it must. But the purchase prevents its using the lands for the only purpose for which they were wanted, unless indeed you are prepared to do extreme violence to plain language, and to read the provision vesting in the company such parts only of the mines under the lands purchased by them as shall be necessary to be used in the construction of the railway, as vesting in them, to an unlimited extent, whatever may be useful or proper for constructing the railway.

It was urged before your Lordships that the enactments dealing with mines were passed for the benefit of persons authorised to construct waterworks and railways; that, to use KAY, J.'s, language, there was "no reason, therefore, for putting a narrow or restricted construction upon the word 'mines'," and that consequently the word ought to be held to include minerals of every description. I am inclined to think that when you make the word "mines" include that "which is in no sense a mine," you do something more than avoid a narrow and restricted construction. And I am not convinced that it is a proper mode of construing an Act of Parliament, to strain the language in favour of those for whose benefit the enactment may be supposed to have been passed. However that may be, it appears to me that the enactments under consideration were not intended to benefit waterworks or railways at the expense of those whose lands might be required for the purpose of the undertaking. Indeed, if LORD CRANWORTH'S suggestion in Great Western Rail. Co. v. Bennett (2) be right, the main object of these enactments in their ultimate shape was to prevent the hardships resulting to landowners from the application of common law rights to compulsory purchases. I doubt whether railway companies were special favourites with the legislature in those days. I should rather have supposed that Parliament considered the division of property and the adjustment of rights effected by these enactments a fair arrangement, and one equally beneficial to both parties. And so it is, if the language used has its ordinary and proper signification. Confine the enactment to mines, and nothing can be fairer. Where lands containing mines are taken by a railway company it would probably be a most serious injury to the vendor to compel him to include his mines in the sale. In most cases he would be selling a long narrow strip of minerals, which might form an impassable barrier in the middle of his mines. If the sale were a voluntary sale to an ordinary purchaser, it would be a matter of course to reserve the mines. On the other hand, neither railway companies nor persons who construct waterworks require mines as such, or are capable of working mines for profit. Mines are only useful to them so far as they may contribute to the support of the lands under which they lie. In many cases they may be worked without interfering with the beneficial enjoyment of the surface.

These considerations, however, do not apply to the case of gravel and clay, and things of that sort, which may be termed surface minerals. Remove surface minerals from under the track, and the railway becomes a heap of rubbish. For the very existence of the line it is necessary that they should be left undisturbed. And yet, according to the respondents' argument, a railway company is not to pay for the use they make of surface minerals which do not belong to them. Why? Because the person to whom they do belong does not actually want his property just yet. In the meantime it is more useful to the railway company than it is to the owner. In other words, to put it plainly, a railway company is to have a forced loan of their neighbour's property without consideration, without any corresponding advantage to him, so long as he may be unable to work it or get it worked at a profit. The doctrine involved seems to me somewhat advanced, and I should hesitate to attribute it to the legislature unless I found it clearly expressed in an Act of Parliament.

Observe how unreasonable the proposition is. The surface minerals must either add to the value of the lands at the time of the purchase or not. If they do not add to the value, why is the railway company paying the full value of the lands not to have the surface minerals? They may be useful for the construction of the line; they are necessary for its existence. On the other hand, if they do add to the value of the lands, why is the landowner not to be paid for them at once, though he may not be able for some time to deal with them profitably when they are separated in ownership from the surface? In the case of surface minerals there is no peculiar hardship in taking a strip of minerals. If the landowner were selling a strip of his land to an ordinary purchaser he would, in ordinary course, sell the surface minerals too, and so get a better price. When he is made to sell for the benefit of the public, why should he be compelled to sell his property in slices, and to wait for half the price (to take the figures from the present case) until he is in a position to intimidate the railway company? This seems very unreasonable and very unfair to the landowner, who gets nothing by way of compensation if the Act, as interpreted by the respondent, be honestly carried out. But I must say I much doubt whether the Act so interpreted could be carried out honestly. There is no difficulty in valuing lands on the assumption that they contain no mines. But there would, I think, be considerable difficulty in arriving fairly at the value of lands required for a railway, treating them merely as so much surface, not entitled to any right of support, and as separated for the purpose of valuation from such ordinary constituents of the subsoil as gravel, clay, and stone.

A If the decision under appeal be upheld, railway companies may no doubt protect themselves in future purchases. But I suspect that in many cases of past sales a railway company would be called upon to pay over again for what it has bought and paid for long ago. It was said that unless the word "mines" be held to include surface minerals railway companies may be exposed to the risk of having the safety of their works endangered by the removal of clay and gravel, and other surface minerals, in the immediate proximity of their lands. The answer is that railway companies must judge for themselves what extent of land is required, and take sufficient to ensure the stability of their works against accidents which can readily be foreseen when the nature of the subsoil is known. I desire to base my judgment on what seems to me to be the plain meaning of the words of the Act; but, at the same time, it is satisfactory to find that the result is consistent with what may be presumed to have been the intention of Parliament, and not likely to lead to inconvenient consequences. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the interlocutor under appeal should be reversed.

Appeal allowed.

R. v. CLARENCE

[COURT FOR CONSIDERATION OF CROWN CASES RESERVED (Lord Coleridge, C.J., Pollock and Huddleston, BB., Field, Hawkins, Manisty, Stephen, Mathew, A. L. Smith, Wills, Day, Grantham and Charles, JJ.), June 16, November 10, 1888]

G Criminal Law—Unlawful wounding—Assault occasioning actual bodily harm—Husband communicating venereal disease to wife—Offences Against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict., c. 100), s. 20, s. 47.

H By s. 20 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861: "Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously wound or inflict any grievous bodily harm upon any other person, either with or without any weapon or instrument, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour. . . ." By s. 47: "Whosoever shall be convicted upon an indictment of any assault occasioning actual bodily harm shall be liable" to imprisonment.

I The accused man had sexual intercourse with his wife at a time when to his knowledge he was suffering from gonorrhea. His wife was ignorant of that fact, and, if she had known it she would not have consented to the intercourse, the result of which was that she contracted the disease.

To constitute an offence under s. 20 there must be proved the infliction of a wound or grievous bodily harm by some direct personal violence, whether with a weapon, or without, as by a blow with the fist, or a kick, or by creating a panic in a crowd whereby people trample on one another; at the relevant time the consent by the wife to intercourse implicit in her entering into a marriage with the accused stood unrevoked, and so the act of the accused did not constitute an assault within s. 47; therefore, the accused was not liable to conviction under either section.

Case Stated by the recorder of the city of London.

C At the session of the Central Criminal Court, held on April 23, 1888, Charles James Clarence was tried on an indictment which, in the first count, charged him with unlawfully and maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm upon his wife, Selina Clarence, and in the second count charged him with an assault upon the said Selina Clarence, occasioning her actual bodily harm. It was proved that on Dec. 20, 1887, the prisoner was suffering from gonorrhœa, and that he knew it. On that night he had sexual intercourse with his wife, she being ignorant that he was suffering from the disease. She would not have consented to intercourse if she had known that the prisoner was so suffering. The result of intercourse was the communication of the disease to the prisoner's wife. The learned recorder directed the jury that, if the evidence established the facts hereinbefore set out to their satisfaction, then, notwithstanding the fact that Selina Clarence was the prisoner's wife, they might find him guilty on both counts, or on either count of the indictment. The jury found the prisoner Guilty, and the recorder respited judgment and directed that he should remain in custody pending the decision of the court on the question whether the direction was correct in point of law, and whether upon such direction and facts the prisoner could properly be convicted on both counts, or either count, of the indictment.

Cur. adv. vult.

G Nov. 10, 1888. WILLS, J., read the following judgment.—The prisoner in this case has been convicted (i) of “an assault” upon his wife, “occasioning actual bodily harm,” under s. 47 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, and (ii) of “unlawfully and maliciously inflicting” upon her “grievous bodily harm” under s. 20 of the same statute. The facts are that he was, to his knowledge, suffering from gonorrhœa; that he had marital intercourse with his wife without informing her of the fact; that he infected her; and that from such infection she suffered grievous bodily harm. The question is whether he was rightly convicted upon either count.

H First, was he guilty of an assault? In support of a conviction it is urged that even a married woman is under no obligation to consent to intercourse with a diseased husband; that had the wife known that her husband was diseased she would not have consented; that the husband was guilty of a fraud in concealing the fact of his illness; that her consent was, therefore, obtained by fraud and so was no consent at all, and, as the act of coition would imply an assault if done without consent, he can be convicted. This reasoning seems to me eminently unsatisfactory. That consent obtained by fraud is no consent at all is not true as a general proposition either in fact or in law. If a man meets a woman in the street and knowingly gives her bad money in order to procure her consent to intercourse with him, he obtains her consent by fraud, but it would be childish to say that she did not consent. In respect of a contract fraud does not destroy the consent; it only makes it revocable. Money or goods obtained by false pretences still become the property of the fraudulent obtainer unless and until the contract is revoked by the person defrauded, and it has never been held that, as far as regards the application of the criminal law, the repudiation of the contract had a retrospective effect or there would have been no distinction between obtaining money under false pretences and theft. A

A second and far more effective way of stating the argument, however, is that connection with a diseased man and connection with a sound man are things so essentially different that the wife's submission without knowledge of the facts is no consent at all. It is said that such a case rests upon the same footing as the consent to a supposed surgical operation or to connection with a man erroneously supposed to be the woman's husband. In the latter case there has been great difference of judicial opinion whether it did or did not amount to the crime of rape; but as it certainly would now be rape by virtue of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 4 [now s. 1 (2) of Sexual Offences Act, 1956], I treat it as so settled. A third way of putting the case is that, inasmuch as the act done amounts to legal cruelty according to the doctrines formerly of the ecclesiastical courts, and now of the Divorce Court, it cannot be said to be within the consent implied by the marital relation. B C

These different ways of putting the argument in favour of a conviction have some important differences. According to each the consent of the marital relation does not apply to the thing done—a fact as to which there does not seem to be room for doubt, and according to each the want of it makes the transaction an assault. According to the first it is the fraudulent suppression of the truth which destroys the consent de facto given, a proposition involving as a necessary element in the offence the knowledge of his condition on the part of the offender. According to the second, it is the difference between the thing supposed to be done and the thing actually done that negatives the idea of consent at all, and in that view it must be immaterial whether the offender knew that he was ill or not. According to the third, his knowledge is material, not on the ground of fraudulent misrepresentation, but because it is an element in legal cruelty as that term is understood in the Divorce Court. D E

It makes a great difference upon which of these grounds a conviction is supported. Each of them covers an area vastly greater than the ground occupied by the circumstances of the present case. If the first view be correct, every man, as has been pointed out, who knowingly gives a piece of bad money to a prostitute to procure her consent to intercourse, or who seduces a woman by representing himself to be what he is not, is guilty of assault, and, as it seems to me, therefore, of rape. If the second view be correct, it applies in similar events just as much to unmarried as to married people, unless the circumstances should establish that the parties were content to take their chances as to their respective states of health; and the allegation that a man had given an assurance to a prostitute before having intercourse with her that he was sound, when he was not so in fact, might be a ground for putting him upon a trial for rape. If the third view be correct, it places the married man, in the eye of the criminal law, in a much worse position than the unmarried, and makes him guilty of an assault, and possibly of rape, when an unmarried man would not be liable to the same consequences. It may be said that, from the moral point of view, his case is the worse; but there are two sides to this as to most other questions. The man who goes out of his way to seek intercourse under such circumstances—and, be it remembered that the hypothesis I am now dealing with assumes knowledge of his condition on the part of the man—is without excuse. There may be many excuses for the married man suggested by the modes of life with which poverty and overcrowding have to do. F G H I

We are thus introduced, as it seems to me, to a set of very subtle metaphysical questions. If we are invited to apply the analogy of the cases in which a man has procured intercourse by personating a husband, or by representing that he was performing a surgical operation, we have to ask ourselves whether the procurement of intercourse by suppressing the fact that the man is diseased is more nearly

A allied to the procurement of intercourse by misrepresentation as to who the man is, or as to what is being done, or to misrepresentations of a thousand kinds in respect of which it has never yet occurred to anyone to suggest that intercourse so procured was an assault or a rape. There are plenty of such instances in which the knowledge of the truth would have made the victim as ready to accept the embraces of a man stricken with smallpox or leprosy. Take, for example, the case of a man without a single good quality, a gaol bird, heartless, mean, and cruel, without the smallest intention of doing anything but possessing himself of the person of his victim, but successfully representing himself as a man of good family and connections prevented by some temporary obstacle from contracting an immediate marriage, and with conscious hypocrisy acting the part of a devoted lover, and in this fashion, or perhaps under the guise of affected religious fervour, effecting the ruin of his victim. In all that induces consent there is not less difference between the man to whom the woman supposes she is yielding herself and the man by whom she is really betrayed, than there is between the man bodily sound and the man afflicted with a contagious disease.

Is there to be a distinction in this respect between an act of intercourse with a wife who on this special occasion would have had a right to refuse her consent, and certainly would have refused it had she known the truth, and the intercourse taking place under the general consent inferred from a bigamous marriage obtained by the false representation that the man was capable of contracting a legal marriage? In such a case the man can give no title of wife to the woman whose person he obtains by the false representation that he is unmarried, and by a ceremony which, under the circumstances, is absolutely void. Where is the difference between consent obtained by the suppression of the fact that the act of intercourse may produce a foul disease, and consent obtained by the suppression of the fact that it will certainly make the woman a concubine, and while destroying her status as a virgin withhold from her the title and rights of a wife? Where is the distinction between the mistake of fact which induces the woman to consent to intercourse with a man supposed to be sound in body, but not really so, and the mistake of fact which induces her to consent to intercourse with a man whom she believes to be her lawful husband but who is not? Many women would think that, of two cruel wrongs, the bigamist had committed the worse.

These are but specimens of the questions which must be faced before the circumstances of the present case can be pronounced to constitute an assault; and such considerations lead one to pause on the threshold and inquire whether the enactment under consideration could really have been intended to apply to circumstances so completely removed from those which are usually understood when an assault is spoken of, or to deal with matters of any kind involving the sexual relation or act. The description of the offence constituted by s. 47 is as follows: "Whoever shall be convicted of any assault occasioning actual bodily harm." The section is the last of a group of twelve headed "Assaults." None of them except s. 43 implies that any distinction between males and females is thought of, and that section points to nothing of a sexual character. It merely provides that in cases of assaults upon males under fourteen and upon females generally, if the assault or battery is of such an aggravated character that it cannot in the opinion of the justices be sufficiently punished as a common assault or battery, it shall be lawful for them to inflict a heavier punishment. Indecent assaults, as such, upon females are dealt with by s. 52 [Sexual Offences Act, 1956, s. 14], and upon males by s. 62 [ibid., s. 15], and there is, therefore, no ground for supposing that anything specially between the sexes is pointed at either by this section, or by any of those in the group to which it belongs. The next group of eight sections (48-55) is headed "Rape, abduction, or defilement of women," and deals specially with sexual crimes. Surely this was the place in which to find an enactment dealing with the very peculiar circumstances now before us, and it cannot really have been intended that they should be embraced by a section whose terms are applicable to, and as it seems to me satisfied by, the class of cases which would naturally occur to one's mind, those of direct violence. A

The worst of the contagious diseases of this class has, I believe, been known in this country for close upon four centuries. The circumstances which have happened in this case cannot have been of infrequent occurrence during that interval, and cannot have failed justly to give rise to the bitterest resentment. B
It seems to my mind a very cogent argument against the conviction that, if the view of the law upon which it is founded be correct, thousands of offending husbands, and as I think also of offending wives, must have rendered themselves amenable to the criminal law; and yet it was reserved for the year 1866, when R. v. Bennett (1) was decided, to discover that such transgressors might have been indicted and criminally dealt with during all that long period. It is true that women C take a different place in social position, and have by Act of Parliament many rights and by common usage much social liberty which no one would have claimed for them centuries ago. This fact, however, seems to me a strangely insufficient reason for a new reading of the criminal law fraught with consequences which no one can deny to be of a very serious and widespread character.

The principle upon which a conviction in this case must be upheld will or will not apply to the intercourse of unmarried, as well as of married, men and women, according to the ground or grounds selected upon which to justify it. If it is based upon the notion of cruelty as understood in the Divorce Court, the case of the unmarried man and woman falls without its purview. If suppression of the truth be a material element in the inquiry, actual misrepresentation on the subject of health would put an unmarried man or woman in the same position as the married man or woman who conceals that fact against which the married state ought to be a sufficient guarantee. I intentionally refer to women as well as men, for it is a great mistake to look at questions of this kind as if sexual faults and transgressions were all on the side of one sex. The unmarried woman who solicits and tempts a perhaps reluctant man to intercourse which he would avoid like death itself if he knew the truth as to her health, must surely, under some circumstances at least, come under the same criminal liability as the man. If, again, the conviction be upheld on the ground of the difference between the thing consented to and the thing done, the principle will extend to many, perhaps most, cases of seduction and to other forms of illicit intercourse, including at least theoretically the case of prostitution, and if such difference be the true ground upon which to base a confirmation of the conviction, knowledge of his or her condition on the part of the person affected is immaterial. It is the knowledge or want of knowledge on the part of the person who suffers from contagion alone that is the material element. D

Surely these considerations point to the conclusion that a wide door will be opened to inquiries not of a wholesome kind, in which the difficulties in the way of arriving at truth are often enormous, and in which the danger of going wrong is as great as it is by people in general inadequately appreciated. A new field of extortion may be developed, and very possibly a fresh illustration afforded of the futility of trying to teach morals by the application of the criminal law to cases occupying the doubtful ground between immorality and crime, and of the dangers which always beset such attempts. Of course, if by legislation such cases should be brought within the criminal law, all we shall have to do will be to face the difficulties and do our best to administer the law. It seems to me, however, that such an extension of the criminal law to a vast class of cases with which it has never yet professed to deal is a matter for the legislature and the legislature only. I understand the process of expansion by which the doctrines of the common law are properly made by judicial construction to apply to altered modes of life and to new circumstances and results thus brought about which would have startled our ancestors could they have foreseen them. I do not understand such a process H

A and I do not think it legitimate, when every fact and every circumstance which goes to constitute the alleged offence is identical with what it has been for many hundreds of years past. Whether further legislation in this direction is desirable is a question for legislators rather than lawyers, and the only remark that I desire to make upon this subject is that, apart from cases of actual violence, and of children so young that the very fact of touching them in the way of sexual
B relation may fairly be treated as a crime, the mysteries of sexual impulses and intercourse are well nigh insoluble, and the difficulty of arriving at the truth in the case of imputed misconduct enormous; and I doubt whether they can be thoroughly appreciated without the experience gained by trying cases of intercourse with girls near the age of sixteen, and they certainly suggest the necessity of the utmost care in dealing by way of legislation with the subject under discussion.

C If intercourse under the circumstances now in question constitute an assault on the part of the man, it must constitute rape, unless, indeed, as between married persons rape is impossible—a proposition to which I certainly am not prepared to assent, and for which there seems to me to be no sufficient authority. As between D unmarried people this qualification will not apply. I cannot understand why, as a general rule, if intercourse be an assault, it should not be a rape. To separate the act into two portions, as was suggested in one of the Irish cases, and to say that there was consent to so much of it as did not consist in the administration of an animal poison, seems to me a subtlety of an extreme kind. There is, under the circumstances, just as much and just as little consent to one part of the transaction as to the rest of it. No one can doubt that in this case, had the truth been known,
E there would have been no consent to even a distant approach to it. I greatly prefer the reasoning of those who say that, because the consent was not to the act done, the thing done is an assault. If an assault, a rape also, as it appears to me. I am well aware of the respect due to the opinion of the very learned judges from whom I differ; but I cannot help saying that to me it seems a strange misapplication of language to call such a deed as that under consideration either
F a rape or an assault. In other words, it is, roughly speaking, where the woman does not intend that the sexual act shall be done upon her either at all, or, what is pretty much the same thing, by the particular individual doing it, and an assault which includes penetration does not seem to me, under such circumstances, to be anything but rape. Of course, the thing done in the present case is wicked and cruel enough. No one wishes to say a word in palliation of it.
G But that seems to me to be no reason for describing it as something else than it is, in order to bring within the criminal law an act which, up to a very recent time, no one ever thought was within it. If coition, under the circumstances in question, be an assault, and if the reason why it is an assault depends in any degree upon the fact that consent would have been withheld if the truth had been known, it cannot the less be an assault because no mischief ensues to the woman,
H nor, indeed, where it is merely uncertain whether the man be infected or not. For had he disclosed to the woman that there might be the peril in question, she would, in most cases other than that of mere prostitution, have refused her consent, and it is, I should hope, equally true that a married woman, no less than an unmarried woman, would be justified in such a refusal. In all such cases, therefore, apart from the suggested impossibility of rape upon a wife, rape must
I be committed, and a great many rapes must be constantly taking place without either of the parties having the least idea of the fact.

The question raised is of very wide application. It does not end with the particular contagion under consideration, but embraces contagion communicated by persons having smallpox or scarlet fever, or other like diseases quite free from the sexual element, and while so afflicted coming into a personal contact with others which would certainly have been against the will of those touched had they known the truth. This species of assault, if assault it be, must have been of much longer standing than the four centuries I have alluded to, and it involves no considerations depending upon the social status of women, yet no one has ever been A prosecuted for an assault so constituted. On this point I desire only to express my concurrence in the observations of my brother STEPHEN, which I have had the opportunity of reading.

I wish to observe that, if an assault can be committed by coition to which consent has been procured by suppression of the truth or misrepresentation as to the state of health of one of the parties, questions of the kind I have indicated B will be triable, may be tried now, at petty sessions. The observation is not, of course, conclusive; but it is well to appreciate whither a conviction in the present case must lead us, not only as regards the subject-matter of the criminal law, but as to the tribunals which will have to administer it. When the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, was passed, it had never occurred to any human being, so far C as our legal history affords any clue, that the circumstances now under consideration constituted an assault. The term is as old as any in our law, but it had never been so applied. The doctrine owes its origin to the remarks of WILLES, J., at the Taunton Assizes, held in 1866, and reported in R. v. Bennett (1). It was pointed out in the Irish case of Hegarty v. Shine (2), that the conviction might be upheld, on the ground that the girl was, as she alleged, asleep when intercourse D took place, and, therefore, gave no consent. In spite of all my respect for everything that fell from the lips of that very great lawyer, I am compelled to think that it was a case in which he strained the law for the purpose of punishing a great wrong, and I confess myself unable to follow his view that the thing done in that case might be an assault and yet not a rape. Were it, however, possible that the mere words of the section would apply to the transaction in question, and that it were capable of being described as an assault, I am still of opinion that the E context shows that sexual crimes were intended to be dealt with as a class by themselves, the only rational way of legislating upon such a subject, and if the letter of the section could be satisfied by the present circumstances, there never was a case to which the maxim qui haeret in litera haeret in cortice more emphatically applied.

I proceed to inquire whether the conviction under s. 20 can be supported. That section says, F

“Whoever shall unlawfully and maliciously wound or inflict any grievous bodily harm upon any other person, either with or without any weapon or instrument, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour. . . .”

While of opinion that it is not every breach of moral duty that will satisfy the term “unlawfully,” I am clearly of opinion that an act which would give a right to a judicial separation is abundantly sufficient to answer to it. I am also of opinion that an unlawful act done wilfully and intentionally, and without any circumstances to justify it and take away its prima facie character of unlawfulness, is malicious within the meaning of the section. But I think the section clearly G points to the infliction of direct and intentional violence, whether with a weapon or the fist, or the foot, or any other part of the person, or in any other way not involving the use of a weapon, as, for instance, by creating a panic at a theatre whereby people trampled upon one another: R. v. Martin (3). The prisoner in that case did what was certain to make people crush one another, perhaps to death, and the grievous bodily harm was as truly inflicted by him as if he had hurled I a stone at somebody’s head. Take also the illustration of my brother STEPHEN, of a man who digs a pit for another to fall into, whereby that other is injured. I do not think this section was ever intended to apply to the administration of poison, and most of the arguments I have used to show that sexual offences were not intended to be dealt with in s. 47 apply with equal force to s. 20. The Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved, in R. v. Taylor (4), decided that in the offence of “unlawfully and maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm” an assault is necessarily included. So far as that decision is concerned the same

A question may be said to arise under s. 20 as under s. 47. But I think the argument is even stronger here, for the context seems to me to show that direct personal violence of some kind was intended; so that, even if the constructive assault contended for by those who support a conviction under s. 47 were established, a conviction under this section would still be wrong. I am of opinion, therefore, that the conviction should be quashed.

A. L. SMITH, J., read the following judgment.—In my judgment, this conviction cannot be supported. I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment of my brother STEPHEN, and I agree in it and in his reasons. There is one point I wish to add, which also appears to me to show that this conviction is erroneous. At marriage the wife consents to the husband's exercising the marital right. The consent then given is not confined to a husband when sane in body, for I suppose no one would assert that a husband was guilty of an offence because he exercised such right when afflicted with some complaint of which he was then ignorant. Until the consent given at marriage be revoked, how can it be said that the husband in exercising his marital right has assaulted his wife? In the present case, at the time the incriminatory act was committed, the consent given at marriage stood unrevoked. Then how is it an assault? The utmost the Crown can say is that the wife would have withdrawn her consent if she had known what her husband knew; or, in other words, that the husband is guilty of a crime, viz., an assault, because he did not inform the wife of what he then knew. In my judgment, in this case the consent given at marriage still existing and unrevoked, the prisoner has not assaulted his wife. As to the unlawfully and maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm, it appears to me that this offence cannot be committed unless an assault has in fact been committed, and indeed this has been so held; and, inasmuch as, in my judgment, in this case no assault has been committed, the graver offence equally has not been committed.

MATHEW, J.—I am of opinion that this conviction must be quashed, and agree with the judgment of my brother STEPHEN.

STEPHEN, J., read the following judgment.—The question in this case is whether a man who knows that he has gonorrhœa, and who by having connection with his wife who does not know it infects her, is or is not guilty of an offence either under s. 20 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, or under s. 47 of the same Act. Section 20 punishes everyone who "unlawfully and maliciously inflicts any grievous bodily harm upon any other person." Section 47 punishes everyone who is convicted of "an assault occasioning actual bodily harm to any person."

Before discussing in detail the meaning of these words I will make one general observation. The present case is the first, so far as appears, in which any person has ever been indicted for, or, at all events, convicted of, any offence whatever for infecting another with a disease of any kind, although diseases of this kind are unhappily common, and legislation in reference to them has taken place. The legislation in question is contained in the Contagious Diseases Act, 1866, and some other Acts which amend it. These Acts were repealed in 1886 [by the Contagious Diseases Acts Repeal Act, 1886]. They authorised the detention in hospitals of diseased women under certain circumstances, but they contained nothing to suggest that the communication of the disease was in itself a crime. If such had been the case the Acts in question would probably have been made supplementary to the ordinary administration of criminal justice. If the present conviction is right it must be so on some principle which would apply to women as well as to men, and to unmarried women as well as to wives. Section 47 indeed could hardly apply to women, but s. 20 would make no distinction between the sexes. It is also, I think, clear that, unless some distinction can be pointed out which does not occur to me, the sections must be held to apply, not only to venereal diseases, but to infection of every kind which is in fact communicated by one person to another by any act likely to produce it. A man who, knowing that he has scarlet fever or small-pox, shakes hands with a friend may be said to fall under s. 20 or s. 47 as much as the prisoner in this case. To seize a man's hand without his consent is an assault; but no one would consent to such a grasp if he knew that he risked small-pox by it, and, if consent in all cases is rendered void by fraud, including suppression of the truth, such a gesture would be an assault occasioning actual bodily harm as much as the conduct of the prisoner in this case.

Not only is there no general principle which makes the communication of infection criminal, but such authority as exists is opposed to such a doctrine in relation to any disease. The following are the authorities on this subject. By 1 Jac. 1, c. 31, s. 7 [the repealed Plague Act, 1603], it was made felony for any person who had, under other provisions of the Act, been commanded to keep his house "to go abroad and converse in company having any infectious sore upon him uncured." Upon this HALE (1 P.C. 432) remarks that the statute is now discontinued, and he adds :

"But what if such person goes abroad to the intent to infect another, and another is thereby infected and dies? Whether this be not murder by the common law might be a question; but if no such intention evidently appears, though de facto by his conversation another is infected, it is no felony by the common law, though it be a great misdemeanour, and the reasons are : (i) Because it is hard to discern whether the infection arises from the party or from the contagion of the air. It is God's arrow. (ii) Nature prompts every man in what condition soever to preserve himself, which cannot be well without mutual conversation. (iii) Contagious diseases, as plague, pestilential fevers, small-pox, etc., are common among mankind by the visitation of God, and the extension of capital punishments in cases of this nature would multiply severe punishments too far and give too great latitude and loose to severe punishments."

Some of the expressions in this passage would scarcely be employed now, but it may be taken as a caution against wide and uncertain extensions of the criminal law, and as a distinct proof that HALE did not regard the transmission of disease as an ordinary case of the infliction of bodily harm. His statement that, though not a felony, it would be a great misdemeanour at common law to infect another unintentionally by going about with a plague sore may at first sight appear to favour the maintenance of the conviction in this place, but it is, I think, explained, and its generality is limited, by R. v. Vantandillo (5). It was held in that case to be an indictable misdemeanour to carry a child which had the small-pox along a street, and the passage from LORD HALE was the principal authority relied upon. The offence referred to by LORD HALE is, therefore, the offence of committing a public nuisance, and his authority is opposed rather than favourable to the notion that to infect another with a contagious disease is in the nature of an offence against the person. The provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 120, 130, and, in particular, s. 126 [see now Public Health Act, 1936, Part 5], treat offences by spreading infection in the same way. By that section an infected person who without proper precaution exposes himself in any street, etc., is liable to a penalty of £5. These considerations make it antecedently improbable that the abominable conduct of which the prisoner has been convicted should be in the strict legal sense of the word a crime.

I now come to the construction of the precise words of the statute. Section 20 punishes

A It is said upon s. 20 that the prisoner did not act "unlawfully" because he had by law a right to have intercourse with his wife. It is said in answer to this that he did act unlawfully because his right ceased when he knew himself to be suffering under the disease which he communicated, and because the word "unlawfully" must here be construed to mean "unlawfully" in the wide general sense in which the word is used with reference to acts which, if done by conspirators,

B are indictable, though not if they are done by individuals. This general sense may, I think, be said to be "immoral and mischievous to the public." I do not agree with the doctrine that the word "unlawfully" is used here in this wide sense. The use of the word in relation to conspiracy appears to me to be exceptional. I think that no act can for this purpose be regarded as unlawful merely because it is immoral. It must I think be forbidden by some definite law; but I pass this

C over, for I think that in this case the word "unlawfully" applies because the act done is forbidden by the law relating to marriage according to which it constitutes cruelty, and is as such a cause for a judicial separation, while it is strong evidence of adultery which coupled with cruelty [but see now Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 1 (1) (a)] would be a ground for a complete divorce. The word "maliciously" obviously applies.

D But is there an "infliction of bodily harm, either with or without any weapon or instrument?" I think there is not, for the following reasons. The words appear to me to mean the direct causing of some grievous injury to the body itself with a weapon, as by a cut with a knife, or without a weapon as by a blow with the fist or by pushing a person down. Indeed, though the word "assault" is not used

E in the section, I think the words imply an assault and battery of which a wound or grievous bodily harm is the manifest immediate and obvious result. This is supported by R. v. Taylor (4), in which it was held that a prisoner could upon an indictment under that section be convicted of a common assault because each offence, "wounding" and "inflicting grievous bodily harm," "necessarily includes an assault," though the word does not occur in the section. It is further illus-

F trated by reference to s. 4 of the Prevention of Offences Act, 1851 [repealed], of which the present section is a re-enactment. It begins with the preamble: "And whereas it is expedient to make further provision for the punishment of aggravated assaults," and then proceeds in the words of the present section with a trifling and unimportant difference in their arrangement. Infection by the applica-

G tion of an animal poison appears to me to be of a different character from an assault. The administration of poison is dealt with by s. 24, which would be superfluous if poisoning were an "infliction of grievous bodily harm either with or without a weapon or instrument." The one act differs from the other in the immediate and necessary connection between a cut or a blow and the wound or harm inflicted, and the uncertain and delayed operation of the act by which infection is communicated. If a man by a grasp of the hand infects another with small-pox

H it is impossible to trace out in detail the connection between the act and the disease, and it would, I think, be an unnatural use of language to say that a man by such an act "inflicted" small-pox on another. It would be wrong in interpreting an Act of Parliament to lay much stress on etymology, but I may just observe that "inflict" is derived from "infligo," to which in FACCIOLOTTI'S LEXICON three Italian and three Latin equivalents are given, all meaning "to strike," viz., dare, ferire, and percuotere in Italian, and infero, impingo, and percutio in Latin.

I

There is authority for the proposition that poisoning is not an assault, though in R. v. Button (6), in 1838, SERJEANT ARABIN, after consulting the Recorder of London, MR. LAW, held that it was. In R. v. Dilworth (7), in 1843, a man was indicted for administering poison with intent to murder, and it was suggested that if the intent was not made out the prisoner might be convicted under the [repealed] Offences Against the Person Act, 1837, of a common assault, as it was involved in the charge, and R. v. Button (6) was cited, but COLTMAN, J., said that he disagreed with R. v. Button (6), and that the prisoner must either be convicted or acquitted of the whole charge. In R. v. Hanson (8), in 1849, A VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., after consulting CRESSWELL, J., held that the administration of cantharides was neither a common assault nor a common law misdemeanour; and R. v. Walkden (9) was a decision to the same effect by PARKE, B. Upon these grounds I am of opinion that s. 20 does not apply to the case.

Is the case, then, within s. 47 as "an assault occasioning actual bodily harm?" B
The question here is whether there is an assault. It is said there is none because the woman consented, and to this it is replied that fraud vitiates consent, and that the prisoner's silence was a fraud. Apart altogether from this question I think that the act of infection is not an assault at all, for the reasons already given.
Infection is a kind of poisoning. It is the application of an animal poison, and poisoning, as already shown, is not an assault. Apart, however, from this, is the C man's concealment of the fact that he was infected such a fraud as vitiated his wife's consent to his marital rights, and converted the act of connection into an assault? It seems to me that the proposition that fraud vitiates consent in criminal matters is not true if taken to apply in the fullest sense of the words, and without qualification. It is too short to be true as a mathematical formula is true. If we apply it in that sense to the present case it is difficult to say that D Clarence was not guilty of rape, for the definition of rape is having connection with a woman without her consent, and, if fraud vitiates consent, every case in which a man infects a woman or commits bigamy, the second wife being ignorant of the first marriage, is also a case of rape. Many seductions would be rapes, and so might acts of prostitution procured by fraud, as for instance by promises not intended to be fulfilled.

These illustrations appear to show clearly that the maxim that fraud vitiates E consent is too general to be applied to these matters as if it were absolutely true.
I do not at all deny that in some cases it applies, though it is often used with reference to cases which do not fall within it. For instance, it has nothing to do with such cases as assaults on young children. A young child who submits to an indecent act no more consents to it than a sleeping or unconscious woman. F
The child merely submits without consenting. The only cases in which fraud indisputably vitiates consent in these matters are cases of fraud as to the nature of the act done. As to fraud, as to the identity of the person by whom it is done, the law is not quite clear. In R. v. Flattery (10) in which consent was obtained by representing the act as a surgical operation, the prisoner was held to be guilty of rape. In the case where consent was obtained by the personation of a husband, G there was before the passing of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, a conflict of authority. The last decision in England, R. v. Barrow (11), decided that the act was not rape, and R. v. Dee (12), decided in Ireland in 1884, decided that it was. The Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, "declared and enacted" that thenceforth it should be deemed to be rape, thus favouring the view taken in R. v.
Dee (12) [see now Sexual Offences Act, 1956, s. 1 (2)]. H

I do not propose to examine in detail the controversies connected with these cases. The judgments in R. v. Dee (12) examine all of them minutely, and I think they justify the observation that the only sorts of fraud which so far destroy the effect of a woman's consent as to convert a connection consented to in fact into a rape, are frauds as to the nature of the act itself, or as to the identity of the person who does the act. There is abundant authority to show that such frauds I as these vitiate consent both in the case of rape and in the case of indecent assault.
I should myself prefer to say that consent in such cases does not exist at all, because the act consented to is not the act done. Consent to a surgical operation or examination is not a consent to sexual connection or indecent behaviour. Consent to connection with a husband is not consent to adultery. I do not think that the maxim that fraud vitiates consent can be carried further than this in criminal matters. It is commonly applied to cases of contract, because in all cases of contract the evidence

A of a consent not procured by force or fraud is essential, but even in these cases care in the application of the maxim is required, because in some instances suppression of the truth operates as fraud, whereas in others at least a suggestion of falsehood is required. The act of intercourse between a man and a woman cannot in any case be regarded as the performance of a contract. In the case of married people that act is part of a great relation based upon the greatest of all contracts, but standing on a footing peculiar to itself. In all other cases the immorality of the act is inconsistent with any contract relating to it.

B Thus in no case can considerations relating to contract apply to it. The effect of fraud upon a contract is to render it voidable at the option of the party defrauded. This clearly cannot apply to sexual intercourse. It is either criminal if the woman does not consent, or if her consent is obtained by certain kinds of fraud, or it is, as this was, a breach of matrimonial duty, or it is not criminal at all. The woman's consent here was as full and conscious as consent could be. It was not obtained by any fraud, either as to the nature of the act or as to the identity of the agent. The injury done was done by a suppression of the truth. It appears to me to be an abuse of language to describe such an act as an assault. It is not stated at what interval after Dec. 20 the disease showed itself, but there must have been some interval during which it was uncertain whether infection had been communicated or not. During this interval was the man guilty or not? If he was, it seems extraordinary to say that he had committed an assault from which an event which was not in his power could set him free. If he was not, it seems to me equally strange to say that he could be deprived of his innocence by such an event.

E In some instances no doubt such an interval might elapse. If a man laid a trap for another, into which he fell after an interval, the man who laid it would, during the interval, be guilty of an attempt to assault, and of an actual assault as soon as the man fell in. In the case of death inflicted by violence, the criminal might at first be guilty of an assault or an unlawful wounding, and his crime would become murder or manslaughter on the death of the person wounded; but in the case of an attempt the intention to consummate the crime exists from the first, and in the case of murder the act which ultimately becomes murder is in itself a crime whether death ensues or not. In this case there was no intention, and, therefore, no attempt, to infect, and it seems anomalous to make a consequence, which, though highly probable, was neither intended nor necessary, relate back on its occurrence in such a way as to make an act not punishable itself into a crime.

G Two authorities were quoted to show that such an act as this is a crime. They are R. v. Bennett (1), in which WILLES, J., decided, in 1860, that a man who infected his niece, a girl of thirteen, might be convicted of an indecent assault, though she consented to sleep with him; and R. v. Sinclair (13), in which this decision was followed, in 1867, by SHEE, J. R. v. Bennett (1) was disapproved of in Hegarty v. Shine (2), though, as the Irish courts point out, the verdict may possibly have been justified by the facts as proved, the girl having sworn that she was asleep and could not say what happened to her. If this was believed, there was evidence of indecent assault at least, if not of rape. R. v. Sinclair (13) was decided on the authority of R. v. Bennett (1).

H For these reasons I think there was no assault in the present case, and that, therefore, it does not fall within s. 47. I wish to observe, on a matter personal to myself, that I was quoted as having said in my DIGEST OF THE CRIMINAL LAW that I thought a husband might, under certain circumstances, be indicted for rape on his wife. I did say so in the first edition of that work, but on referring to the last edition (1887 Edn., p. 124, note) it will be found that that statement was withdrawn. I think that this conviction should be quashed. No one can doubt the abominable nature of the prisoner's conduct, but, if it is to be treated as a crime, it must, I think, be done upon express statutory authority. The whole matter is surrounded with difficulties with which the legislature alone is competent to deal, A and to which it would be out of place to refer. I am informed that GRANTHAM, J., agrees with this judgment.

HAWKINS, J., read the following judgment.—I am of opinion that the prisoner was rightly convicted upon both counts of the indictment. The first count was B framed under s. 20 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, and charged the prisoner with “unlawfully and maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm” upon Selina Clarence. The second count was framed under s. 47 of the same Act, and charged him with an “assault” upon the said Selina Clarence, “occasioning” her “actual bodily harm.” At the time of the committing of the offences charged Selina Clarence was and still is the wife of the prisoner. At that time the C prisoner was suffering from gonorrhœa, as he knew, but his wife was ignorant of the fact. In this condition of things, the prisoner had sexual intercourse with his wife, and in so doing communicated to her his disease, and thereby caused her grievous bodily harm. It must also be taken as a fact that, had the prisoner’s wife known that he was so suffering, she would have refused to submit to such intercourse. On the prisoner’s behalf it was contended that the conviction was wrong D upon several grounds: first, that the injury caused to the wife was the result of a lawful act—viz., the sexual communion of a husband with his wife; secondly, that the charge in the first count involved, and that in the second count was based on, an assault, and that no assault could be committed by a husband in merely exercising his marital right upon the person of his wife; and, thirdly, that the sections of the statute under which the indictment was framed had no applica- E tion to such circumstances as those above mentioned.

About the unlawfulness and maliciousness of the prisoner’s conduct it seems to me impossible to raise a doubt. It has long been established by authority that, if a husband knowingly communicates to his wife a venereal disease, such misconduct amounts to legal cruelty, and is ground for judicial separation; and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it may be presumed that a man suffering F under venereal disease knows it, and knows also that, if he has communion with his wife, he will in all human probability communicate his malady to her: see Brown v. Brown (14). It is equally clear that wilfully to do an unlawful act to the prejudice of another is to do it maliciously. We have, then, these elements established, grievous bodily harm unlawfully and maliciously caused. To complete the offence, according to the language of s. 20, it is only necessary to prove that G such injury was “inflicted” by the prisoner within the meaning of that word as used in s. 20. For the prisoner it was contended that bodily harm cannot legally be said to be “inflicted,” unless it has been brought about by some act amounting to an assault, and that there was no evidence of any assault in the present case. I think both these contentions untenable, and that the first count may be supported, even assuming no assault to have been proved. I think more- H over that an assault was proved. I will, however, defer what I have to say upon that point until I come to deal with the second count.

With reference to the question, whether it was necessary to prove an assault in order to establish the first count, it may be, though I do not say it is so, that some support is afforded to the argument of the prisoner’s counsel if the word “inflict” is read only according to its strict etymological interpretation. I am aware also I that the argument has the support of the dictum of KELLY, C.B., in delivering the judgment of the court in R. v. Taylor (4). In that case the prisoner was indicted in one count for unlawfully wounding, and another for “unlawfully and maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm.” The jury found him guilty of “an assault,” and the conviction was affirmed, the Lord Chief Baron saying, “each of the counts is for an offence which necessarily includes an assault.” With reference to this dictum it will be seen at a glance that it was not at all essential for the judgment, inasmuch as the conviction for an assault might be supported if either

A count involved an assault, which the count for wounding most unquestionably did. I feel, therefore, at liberty respectfully to dissent from that dictum so far as it applies to the count for "inflicting grievous bodily injury," and I do so with the more confidence because I do not find it supported by any later authority.

B In my opinion the legislature, in framing the various sections of the statute already and hereafter referred to, used the words "inflict," "cause," and "occasion" as synonymous terms for the following among other reasons. Let me begin by calling attention to the language of s. 18 which runs thus :

"Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously by any means whatsoever wound or cause any grievous bodily harm to any person . . . with intent . . . shall be guilty of felony. . . ."

C If the prisoner had been indicted under this section, could anybody doubt that, upon proof of his intention to cause the grievous bodily harm he in fact occasioned, he would have fallen within not only the spirit but the precise language of the section according to the strictest interpretation which could be applied to it?

D I next ask myself, what was the object of s. 20? Clearly it was to provide for cases in which the grievous bodily harm mentioned in s. 18, though unlawfully and maliciously caused, was unaccompanied by the felonious intent, which is the aggravating feature of the felony created by that section, and accordingly s. 20 made such last-mentioned offence a misdemeanour only, by enacting as follows :

E "Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously wound or inflict any grievous bodily harm upon any other person, either with or without any weapon or instrument, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour."

F Surely the object of these two sections could only have been to make the doing of grievous bodily harm with intent a felony, without intent a mere misdemeanour; and to hold that no man could be convicted under s. 20 without proof of an assault would practically amount to holding that maliciously to do grievous bodily harm to another without felonious intent is unpunishable unless such harm is done through the medium of an assault. It is impossible that the legislature could have intended this.

I must refer now to s. 47, which enacts :

G "Whosoever shall be convicted upon an indictment of any assault occasioning actual bodily harm shall be liable"

H to imprisonment. Here it will be observed that where the legislature intends that an assault shall be the foundation of the offence it says so in express terms. If, in using the word "inflict" in s. 20, it had intended that it should be interpreted as "cause by means of an assault," s. 47 would have been superfluous; for by merely substituting the word "actual" for "grievous" in s. 20, the whole object of both sections would have been attained; for the punishment awarded in each is the same, and "actual" harm of necessity includes "grievous" harm, and if for any reason, which I am unable to discover, the legislature had thought fit to separate the two sections, applying one to an assault causing "grievous," the other to an assault causing "actual," bodily harm, I should at least have expected I it to use the same phraseology in each. If, on the other hand, it intended s. 20 to bear the construction I put upon it, I should expect to find that which I do, viz., difference in the language. As the sections now stand, construing them as I do, it looks as if the framers of the Act intended, as I think they did, that when grievous bodily harm was maliciously caused by any means, the offender should be liable to a punishment of five years' penal servitude, and that the same punishment might follow upon a conviction for occasioning any actual injury, though short of that which could be termed "grievous" if such injury was caused by an assault.

I am not without authority for the view I have expressed upon this part of the case. By s. 23 of the same Act it is enacted : A

“Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously administer to, or cause to be administered to or taken by any other person any poison, or other destructive or noxious thing, so as . . . thereby to inflict upon any such person any grievous bodily harm, shall be guilty of felony. . . .” B

Clearly there may be an administering or a causing of poison, etc., to be taken so as to inflict harm under that section without even the semblance of an assault : see R. v. Dilworth (7), per COLTMAN, J., and note b to the case; see also R. v. Wilson (15), where, upon the trial of an indictment under the [repealed] Offences Against the Person Act, 1837, s. 6, the prisoner was charged with administering or causing to be taken by a woman a noxious drug with intent to procure her miscarriage; it was proved that the prisoner had procured the drug and given it to the woman at her own request, and she had taken it in his absence : it was held that he might be convicted of causing it to be taken. Under such circumstances, no one could say the prisoner had committed an assault in procuring and handing the drug to the woman in compliance with her request. These considerations lead me to the conclusion that the word “inflict,” when used in the statute, was not intended to be construed as involving an assault, whatever may be its strict etymological interpretation, as to which I do not think it necessary to enter upon a discussion : see also R. v. Martin (3), where the prisoner was convicted upon an indictment under s. 20 of “inflicting grievous bodily harm” under circumstances which it would be difficult to say amounted to an assault. It is right, however, to say that the point under consideration was not raised in that case, although it is unlikely to have escaped the attention of the four astute judges by whom, with myself, that case was decided. C

I proceed now to consider the question whether there was in fact an assault by the prisoner on his wife occasioning her either grievous or actual bodily harm. I answer this question also in the affirmative. By the marriage contract a wife no doubt confers upon her husband an irrevocable privilege to have sexual intercourse with her during such time as the ordinary relations created by such contract subsist between them. For this reason it is that a husband cannot be convicted of a rape committed by him upon the person of his wife. But this marital privilege does not justify a husband in endangering his wife's health and causing her grievous bodily harm by exercising his marital privilege when he is suffering from venereal disorder of such a character that the natural consequence of such communion will be to communicate the disease to her. LORD STOWELL in Popkin v. Popkin (16) said (1 Hag. Ecc. at p. 767, n.) : D

So, to endanger her health, and cause her to suffer from loathsome disease contracted through his own infidelity cannot, by the most liberal construction of his matrimonial privilege, be said to fall within it; and, although I can cite no direct authority upon the subject, I cannot conceive it possible seriously to doubt that a wife would be justified in resisting by all means in her power—nay, even to the death, if necessary—the sexual embraces of a husband suffering from such contagious disorder. In my judgment, wilfully to place his diseased person in contact with hers without her express consent amounts to an assault. F

It has been argued that, to hold this would be to hold that a man who, suffering from gonorrhœa, has communion with his wife might be guilty of the crime of rape. I do not think this would be so. Rape consists in a man having sexual intercourse with a woman without her consent, and, the marital privilege being equivalent to consent given once for all at the time of marriage, it follows that the mere act of G

A sexual communion is lawful; but there is a wide difference between a simple act of communion which is lawful and an act of communion combined with infectious contagion endangering health and causing harm which is unlawful. It may be said that, assuming a man to be diseased, still, as he cannot have communion with his wife without contact, the communication of the disease is the result of a lawful act, and therefore cannot be criminal. My reply to this argument is that, if a person, having a privilege of which he may avail himself or not at his will and pleasure, cannot exercise it without at the same time doing something not included in this privilege, and which is unlawful and dangerous to another, he must either forego his privilege or take the consequences of his unlawful conduct.

I may further illustrate my view upon this part of the case by applying, by way of test, to an indictment for assault the old form of civil pleadings. This: Indictment for an assault; plea of justification, that the alleged assault was the having sexual communion with the prosecutrix, she being the prisoner's wife; new assignment, that the assault charged was not that charged in the plea, but the unlawful and malicious contact of her person with dangerous and contagious disease. What possible justification could be pleaded or answer given to such new assignment? I ought, perhaps, to state that, even if to hold a husband liable for an assault under such circumstances would be to subject him also to a charge of rape, the opinion I have expressed would not be changed. No jury would be found to convict a husband of rape on his wife except under very exceptional circumstances, any more than they would convict of larceny a servant who stealthily appropriated to her own use a pin from her mistress's pincushion. I can, however, readily imagine a state of circumstances under which a husband might deservedly be punished with the penalty attached to rape, and a person committing a theft even of a pin to the penalty attached to larceny. The cases put of a person suffering from small-pox, diphtheria, or any other infectious disorder, thoughtlessly giving a wife or child a mere affectionate kiss or shake of the hand from which serious consequences never contemplated ensued, seem to me cases in which it is impossible to suppose any criminal prosecution would be tolerated, or could, if tolerated, result in a conviction; but I can picture to myself a state of things in which a kiss or shake of the hand given by a diseased person, maliciously with a view to communicate his disorder, might well form the subject of criminal proceedings.

I will not, however, stop to discuss such imaginary cases further. R. v. Bennett (1), decided in 1866, is an authority directly in support of the view I have taken. The indictment was for an indecent assault on a girl who had consented to sleep with the prisoner, who had connection with her, and communicated to her a foul disease. WILLES, J., before whom the case was tried, in summing-up, told the jury that, though it would have been impossible to have established rape, yet, if the girl did not consent to the aggravated circumstances—i.e., to connection with a diseased man—his act would be an assault. WILLES, J., no doubt, according to the report, based his observations upon the rule that fraud vitiates consent; but it is clear his mind was alive to the point I have been considering, viz., that, though there might be such consent to sexual intercourse as to make the connection no rape, nevertheless the infectious contact might amount to an assault: see also Hegarty v. Shine (2); and R. v. Sinclair (13).

I In dealing with the present case my judgment is not based upon the doctrine that fraud vitiates consent, because I do not think that doctrine applies in the case of sexual communion between husband and wife. The sexual communion between them is, by virtue of the irrevocable privilege conferred once for all on the husband at the time of the marriage, and not at all by virtue of a consent given upon each act of communion, as is the case between unmarried persons. My judgment is based on the fact that the wrongful act charged against the prisoner was not involved in or sanctioned by his marital privilege, and was one for which no consent was ever given at all. For this reason it is unnecessary to discuss or express any opinion upon the various cases cited during the argument relating to connection obtained by fraud, and I accordingly abstain from doing so. A

Another argument used for the prisoner was that such cases as the present were not contemplated by the statute under which he was indicted, and it was also said that, if it had been intended that the communication of a venereal disease to a woman during an act of sexual intercourse, consented to by her, should be punishable as a crime, some special enactment to that effect would have been introduced into one or other of the Acts of Parliament relating to women and offences against them. This is an argument to which I attach no weight, assuming the facts bring the case within the fair interpretation of the sections to which I have referred. Moreover, I may point out that R. v. Bennett (1), to which I have referred, was tried in the year 1866, and it is strange, if the law as there laid down was thought to be contrary to the law of the land or to the intention of the legislature, that in no subsequent legislation during the twenty-two years which have since elapsed has any enactment been introduced in which any expression is to be found indicative of a disapproval of that decision or that the intention of the statute was at variance with it. I think the legislature contemplated the punishment of all grievous bodily harm, however caused, if caused unlawfully and maliciously; and I cannot bring my mind for an instant to believe that, even had the circumstances before us been present to the minds of the framers of the Act, they would have excluded from its operation an offence as cruel and as contrary to the obligation a man owes to his wife to protect her from harm as can well be conceived. B C D

It has been urged that the case of husband and wife does not differ from that of unmarried persons, and that to affirm this conviction would tend to encourage undesirable prosecutions where disease has been communicated during illicit communion. I do not by any means assent to these propositions. I think the two cases are substantially different. The wife submits to her husband's embraces, because at the time of marriage she gave him an irrevocable right to her person. The intercourse which takes place between husband and wife after marriage is not by virtue of any special consent on her part, but in mere submission to an obligation imposed upon her by law. Consent is immaterial. In the case of unmarried persons, however, consent is necessary previous to every act of communion, and if a common prostitute were to charge with a criminal offence a man who, in having had connection with her, had infected her with disease, few juries would under ordinary circumstances hesitate to find that each party entered into the immoral communion tacitly consenting to take all risks. In the case of women other than prostitutes, the circumstances of each particular case would have to be considered, and the question how far fraud vitiates consent to such communion would also have to be dealt with. In such cases, too, shame would deter most decent women from appealing to the law; and, if a man were the sufferer, seldom would he incur the ridicule and exposure which would be brought upon him. E F G H

Considering how few prosecutions have been instituted for such causes since the decision in R. v. Bennett (1), and entertaining moreover, as I do, a doubt whether any person, man or woman, could, as against the public interest, consent to the infliction of grievous bodily harm, so as to give a legal defence to a criminal prosecution, although such consent might afford a good defence to a civil action, I do not see any reason for such fears on the subject as have been entertained. I Anyhow they cannot affect the law. Fortified in my opinion, as I believe myself to be, by the plain words of the statute, and by the authority of WILLES, J., one of the greatest and most accurate lawyers of modern times, I have arrived at the conclusion that this conviction is right and in accordance with the law, and I cannot, therefore, be a party to a judgment which in effect would proclaim to the world that by the law of England in this year 1888 a man may deliberately, knowingly, and maliciously perpetrate upon the body of his wife the abominable outrage charged against the prisoner, and yet not be punishable criminally for such atrocious

A barbarity. I may state that this judgment has been read by DAY, J., who requests me to say that he thoroughly concurs in it.

B MANISTY, J.—I am of opinion that this conviction should be quashed. I abstain from giving the reasons stated by my learned brothers who take the same view that I take, and propose only to add a few words. This is a statute which relates to circumstances of violence to the person. It is so stated in the title of the Act, which is “An Act to consolidate and amend the statute law of England and Ireland relating to offences against the person,” and all the crimes of violence include an assault. What is an assault? It is either an act of infliction of violence on a person, or it is an attempt with force or violence to do or inflict, whether by C force or by holding up the fist with threatening words, coupled with the capability of doing actual violence to the person of another. That being the principle of the Act it seems to me that what the prisoner here has done is not within the purview of the Act. I question whether it was ever intended or thought of, and I am of opinion that no assault was committed. An assault is a crime of violence, and the opinion of my learned brothers, who are of opinion that this conviction D should be supported, is founded chiefly on this being a case of an assault. If it be a crime punishable by statute to act as the prisoner did, I should have expected to find it provided for among the statutes relating to the communication of contagious diseases, some of which have lately been repealed. That is the real nature of the crime alleged here; but I believe you will not find anything in those statutes as to this case. I need say no more, therefore, than that it is not, in my E opinion, within the purview of this Act. If it had been it would have been mentioned.

HUDDLESTON, B.—I am of opinion that this conviction cannot be affirmed. I have had the advantage of reading the judgment of my brother STEPHEN, and entirely concur with it. I also concur with the judgments of my brother WILLS and F my brother A. L. SMITH.

FIELD, J., read the following judgment.—This indictment contained two counts expressed respectively in the actual words of ss. 20 and 47 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, and charging the prisoner under s. 20 with “unlawfully and G maliciously inflicting” upon his wife “grievous bodily harm;” under s. 47, with “an assault” upon his wife “occasioning actual bodily harm.” The facts proved were, that the prisoner had sexual intercourse with his wife at a time when to his knowledge he was suffering from gonorrhœa, his wife being ignorant of this fact; that had she known of it she would not have consented to the intercourse, and that the result of the connection was to communicate to her the disease. The learned H Recorder of London directed the jury that if those facts were established they might find the prisoner guilty on both or either of the counts. The jury found the prisoner Guilty, and the learned recorder has stated the Case now before us, in which he asks the opinion of this court whether his direction was right in point of law, and whether upon these facts the prisoner could be properly convicted on both or either of the counts.

I The answer to this question depends on the true construction of the Act under which the indictment was preferred; and on a consideration of the authorities, and I have come to the conclusion that the direction of the learned recorder was right, and that the prisoner was properly convicted on both counts. The questions then are: First, Did the prisoner “unlawfully and maliciously inflict grievous bodily harm” on his wife; secondly, Did the prisoner “occasion bodily harm” to his wife by an “assault?” It has long been established that a man who takes indecent liberties with a woman or has or attempts to have connection with her, may be properly convicted either of indecent assault or rape, which includes an assault, according to the circumstances of the case, if the acts were done without her consent, express or implied, or against her will. It is, I think, also clear that if the condition of the man is such that it is an ordinary and natural consequence of the contact to communicate an infectious disease to the woman, and he does so, he does in fact inflict upon her both "actual" and "grievous bodily harm." Such an act produces what a great authority, LORD STOWELL, describes as "an injury of a most malignant kind:" see Popkin v. Popkin (16), 1 Hag. Ecc. at p. 768, n. It is also well settled that every sane man must be taken to intend the natural and reasonable consequences of his acts, and the intentional infliction of grievous bodily harm, unless justified or excused by law, is, to my mind, "malicious and unlawful."

Thus far the case rests upon what seem to me to be known and generally adopted principles. But it is argued that here there is no offence because the wife of the prisoner consented to the act, and I entertain no doubt that, if that was so, there was neither assault nor unlawful infliction of harm. Then did the wife of the prisoner consent? The ground for holding that she did so, put forward in argument, was the consent to marital intercourse which is imposed upon every wife by the marriage contract, and a passage from HALE'S PLEAS OF THE CROWN, vol. 1, p. 629, was cited, in which it is said that a husband cannot be guilty of rape upon his wife,

The authority of LORD HALE, C.J., on such a matter is undoubtedly as high as any can be, but no other authority is cited by him for this proposition, and I should hesitate before I adopted it. There may, I think, be many cases in which a wife may lawfully refuse intercourse, and in which, if the husband imposed it by violence, he might be held guilty of a crime. Suppose a wife for reasons of health refused to consent to intercourse, and the husband induced a third person to assist him while he forcibly perpetrated the act, would anyone say that the matrimonial consent would render this no crime? And there is the great authority of LORD STOWELL for saying that the husband has no right to the person of his wife if her health is endangered: Popkin v. Popkin (16).

It seems to me, however, unnecessary to decide that question in the present case, because the prisoner's wife undoubtedly did consent in fact to the act of intercourse, and, therefore, consented to all natural and ordinary attendant circumstances or consequences of the act, and also to such as were reasonably within her knowledge and contemplation. Had then the harm inflicted upon or occasioned to the prisoner's wife been one of the consequences of an ordinary natural and healthy connection, or had she known, or had reasonable grounds for thinking, that her husband was in a diseased condition, her consent to the consequences would, I think, be implied, and so no offence would have been committed. In the same way I think that, if a man knowingly consorts with a prostitute who gains her livelihood by promiscuous intercourse, it may well be implied that he accepts all the consequences. Also, had the prisoner in this case not been aware of his condition, his act would not have been malicious or an assault, for, as he would have had no reason to suppose that his wife would do other than consent, he would have a right to act upon the implication, and I think, therefore, that, upon the construction which I am putting upon the Act, there will be no danger of bringing within its definitions an injury caused by an innocent or merely thoughtless act of affection between husband and wife.

But I have said that here there undoubtedly was consent on the part of the prisoner's wife to the act of intercourse, and it is now necessary to consider what were the actual circumstances attending this act of intercourse, and what was the nature and condition of the intercourse to which the consent was given. The

A actual circumstances were, that the prisoner, knowing he had a foul and infectious disease upon him, and that the infection of his wife would be the natural and reasonable consequence of intercourse, solicited it. He also knew that his wife consented to it in ignorance of his condition. Under these circumstances I think that her consent to the intercourse in fact was given upon the implied condition
B which she had bound herself to consent and had been accustomed to consent, i.e., a natural and healthy connection. But the intercourse which the prisoner imposed upon his wife was of a different nature, one which in all probability would communicate to her a foul disease, and to which the jury had found that she would not have consented had she known the state of his health. It seems to me, therefore, to follow that the mere consent of the prisoner's wife to an act innocent
C in itself, and in no way injurious to her, was no consent at all to what the prisoner did; and, moreover, that he obtained such consent as she gave by wilfully suppressing the fact that he was suffering from disease. Such an act between husband and wife is, I cannot doubt, unlawful. In the Divorce Court it has been held that the wilful or reckless communication of disease by the one to the other amounts to legal cruelty, involving the liability to rescission of the marriage con-D tract so far as regards cohabitation and intercourse: Boardman v. Boardman (17)
[and now to dissolution of the marriage: Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 1 (1) (c)]. There was, I think, a clear duty cast upon the prisoner before he solicited the intercourse to communicate his condition to his wife, and the imposition of intercourse without such communication amounted to a false repre-E sentation by act and conduct that he was in the same healthy and natural condition as he had been upon previous occasions of lawful intercourse.

The result, therefore, at which I have arrived is that there was no consent in fact by the prisoner's wife to the prisoner's act of intercourse, because, although he knew, yet his wife did not know, and he wilfully left her in ignorance as to the real nature and character of that act. This being so, it follows that there was both an assault and a criminal infliction of harm. I have arrived at this result by my F own unaided construction of the statute and consideration of the law.

I now proceed to consider the authorities. They may be divided, according to the facts which they present, into three classes of cases. The first class consists of cases in which a wife's consent has been obtained by the fraud of the prisoner inducing her to believe that he was her husband: R. v. Saunders (18); R. v.
G Williams (19). The second class consists of cases in which the woman's consent was obtained by fraudulent conduct, inducing her to believe that she was undergoing medical treatment or examination: R. v. Rosinski (20); R. v. Case (21); R.
v. Flattery (10). The third class consists of cases in which, as in the present case, the consent of the woman was given in consequence of the wilful and unlawful suppression of an injurious change of natural and previously known condition:
H R. v. Bennett (1); R. v. Sinclair (13); Hegarty v. Shine (2). Although these cases differ in themselves as to the facts and as to the language used by the court, all of them, except Hegarty v. Shine (2), are, as it seems to me, governed by the same principle, which is that, though the woman consented to the act of intercourse, she did not consent to it in its actual nature and conditions.

In R. v. Case (21) the girl did not resist from a bona fide belief wilfully induced
I by the prisoner that she was being treated medically, and the learned Recorder of London, a judge of wide experience in criminal cases, directed the jury that, if they were satisfied that the act was committed under such circumstances, the prisoner's conduct amounted to an assault. This direction was approved on appeal.
WILDE, C.J., says in his judgment (4 Cox, C.C. at p. 223):

"She made no resistance to an act which she supposed to be quite different from what was done, and, therefore, that which was done was done without her consent."

COLERIDGE, J., whose knowledge and experience in those matters could not be surpassed, said (ibid.) : A

“She makes no resistance only in consequence of the confidence which she reposed in the defendant as her medical adviser. If there had been no consent the defendant’s act would have been indisputably an assault.”

PLATT, B., said (ibid. at pp. 223, 224) : B

“The girl consents to one thing, and the defendant does another, that other involving an assault.”

This was a decision of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved. In R. v. Flattery (10), in the same court, a case of the second class, the same doctrine was held, KELLY, C.B., saying (2 Q.B.D. at p. 413) : C

“The girl only submitted to the plaintiff touching her person in consequence of the fraud and false pretences of the prisoner, and the only thing she consented to was the surgical operation.”

In these cases the fraud by which the consent was obtained was a fraud as to person and circumstances, and did not, as in this case, relate to the very act of connection, its physical nature and conditions, and it seems to me to follow that a consent induced by a fraud relating to the physical nature and conditions of the act itself falls still more clearly within this principle. Accordingly so it was held in R. v. Bennett (1). There that very eminent judge, WILLES, J., applied this doctrine and held that the consent to one act obtained by fraud as to its physical nature was no consent to a different act injurious in its nature and to which the consent was never intended to be applied. In this respect he was followed by SHEE, J., in R. v. Sinclair (13). It is true that in Hegarty v. Shine (2) some of the judges in the Irish courts expressed disapproval of the ruling of WILLES, J., in R. v. Bennett (1), as tending to show that any fraud is sufficient to convert a civil act of breach of duty into a criminal one, and reliance was placed on this in the argument against the conviction. But I think this disapproval rests upon a misunderstanding of the direction, as I understand that very learned judge never meant to say that any fraud must vitiate the consent, but that a consent obtained to one act is not a consent to an act of a different nature, and if obtained by a fraud as to its nature would not render the act lawful. In Hegarty v. Shine (2) in the Court of Appeal R. v. Bennett (1) was distinguished and in no way departed from, and the actual decision in Hegarty v. Shine (2) does not seem to me in any way to touch the present case. I think, therefore, that the conviction should be affirmed. I am desired to add that CHARLES, J., concurs in this judgment. D

POLLOCK, B., read the following judgment.—I agree with the judgment delivered by my learned brothers who are against the conviction, and had I seen these judgments before I prepared my own I might have been content to say simply that I assent to them; but, as I have set out my own reasons, I think it is only respectful to those from whom I differ that I should read them. H

The first count of the indictment is based upon s. 20 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, which provides that

“Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously wound or inflict any grievous bodily harm upon any other person, either with or without any weapon or instrument, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour. . . .” I

This provision is founded upon and in continuation of the earlier legislation upon the same subject contained in s. 4 [repealed] of the Prevention of Offences Act, 1851, which was as follows :

“And whereas it is expedient to make further provision for the punishment of aggravated assaults; be it enacted that, if any person shall unlawfully and maliciously inflict upon any other person either with or without any weapon or instrument any grievous bodily harm, or unlawfully and maliciously cut, stab, or wound any other person, every such offender shall be guilty of a misdemeanour."

Looking at the language of these two Acts, it appears to me that the "grievous bodily harm" which is "unlawfully" inflicted must be the natural consequence of some act in the nature of a blow, wound, or other violence, which is in itself illegal and not merely the result of conduct which is immoral and injurious by reason only of a fraud or breach of good faith; or, to put the proposition in another form, "grievous bodily harm" which is the ultimate effect of treachery in the doing of that which is not a "wounding or inflicting etc., with or without any weapon or instrument," but is the doing of an act of an entirely different character, is not within the terms of the statute. It is also to be observed that, although a man is by law held to be responsible for the necessary consequences of his acts, in the case before us it cannot be suggested that the real intent of the prisoner was to inflict grievous bodily harm, or indeed any harm, upon his wife.

The second count charges an assault, and upon this more difficulty arises. Some of the observations which I have already made are equally applicable to this question. Apart from authority I should be inclined to hold that, in this case also, an assault must in all cases be an act which in itself is illegal, and it is not unimportant to notice that the case is one of first impression, as no trace can be found of any previous attempt to bring such conduct, foul and cruel though it be, within the scope of the criminal law. As to this count, however, there is some authority. In R. v. Bennett (1) an uncle was indicted for an indecent assault upon his niece, he being diseased and she ignorant of the fact. It was held by WILLES, J., that the prisoner could be properly convicted, and in his summing-up that learned judge said:

"An assault is within the rule that fraud vitiates consent, and, therefore, if the prisoner, knowing that he had a foul disease, induced his niece to sleep with him, intending to possess her, and infected her, she being ignorant of his condition, any consent which she may have given would be vitiated, and the prisoner would be guilty of an indecent assault."

This case was followed by R. v. Sinclair (13), in which the prisoner being diseased had connection with a girl who, being ignorant of the fact, consented.

As far as I can discover, these are the only decisions which have any material bearing upon the case now before us. They are not binding upon this court, and they have been much questioned in the civil case in Ireland of Hegarty v. Shine (2). As at present advised I see great difficulty in adopting them in their entirety. If the reasoning upon which they are founded be sound, I should have thought that the offence of which the prisoners were guilty was not an assault but rape. Without, however, further argument and consideration, I am not prepared to say that they should be overruled, especially as in cases of a similar kind, which may well arise, they are undoubtedly important and useful in the administration of the criminal law; but I cannot assent to the proposition that there is any true analogy between the case of a man who does an act which in the absence of consent amounts to an indecent assault upon his niece, or any woman other than his wife, and the case of a man having connection with his wife. In the one case the act is, taken by itself, in its inception an unlawful act, and it would continue to be unlawful but for the consent. The husband's connection with his wife is not only lawful, but it is in accordance with the ordinary condition of married life. It is done in pursuance of the marital contract, and of the status which was created by marriage, and the wife as to the connection itself is in a different position from any other woman, for she has no right or power to refuse her consent. As is said by LORD HALE in his PLEAS OF THE CROWN (p. 1629):

up herself in this kind unto her husband which she cannot retract.”

Such a connection may be accompanied with conduct which amounts to cruelty, as where the condition of the wife is such that she will or may suffer from such connection; or, as here, where the condition of the husband is such that the wife will suffer.

To hold that an act in itself innocent becomes a criminal assault by reason of the concealment of a material fact, which, if communicated, might give rise to an objection by the person affected by the act, would, where there is disease, include a variety of cases beyond that which is now under discussion; such as a kiss given by a parent suffering from small-pox or scarlet fever to his child, or even the shaking of a friend's hand by one who is suffering from a contagious disease. On C the other hand, to say that the prisoner has been properly convicted would not under all circumstances cope with the evil and moral wrong which it is desired to punish, for I suppose no one would contend that if a wife, being diseased, encouraged her husband to have connection with her she was guilty of an assault. All this goes to show that the real offence is not an assault, but the suppression or concealment of that which ought to have been communicated; and that, if it be D desirable to bring it within the criminal law, it should be done by legislation.

As to the decision of R. v. Case (2), and R. v. Flattery (10), cited by counsel for the prosecution, in which medical men, who, under the pretence of affording medical or surgical assistance to girls, had connection with them, were held guilty of rape, they afford no assistance. In these cases the intent of the prisoners to commit a rape was clear, though the means by which they accomplished their E purpose was fraud, the fraud being of such a nature that, under the pretence of performing an act in itself lawful and beneficial to their patient, they committed an act of a totally different character, which was in itself illegal and criminal. These considerations have led me to the conclusion that this conviction cannot be supported.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—I was for some time of opinion that this conviction could be sustained; and, of course, everyone, I suppose, would desire to sustain the conviction in this particular case if it could be done without violating the principles of sound law. I confess that the logical deduction drawn from the words of the statute by my brothers FIELD and HAWKINS is one that I find it difficult to contradict. Yet, if in construing a statute a logical construction leads one to a G result which it is impossible to believe was intended, that is a reason for making one believe that that is not the meaning of the statute. If this conviction can be sustained it seems to me impossible logically to deny that a conviction could be sustained for inflicting grievous bodily harm on a child by communicating small pox to it, if its father or a relative, being aware that he had the small-pox, were to kiss the child and so infect it. I give that simply as an example, and upon that H ground it is that I am unable to believe that the statute could have contemplated results which nevertheless logically follow the construction placed upon the statute by my learned brothers who would uphold the conviction. I am unable to agree with them; and I am, therefore, of opinion that this conviction must be quashed, and I agree with the whole or nearly the whole of the judgment of my brother WILLS, I which I have had the opportunity and satisfaction of reading.

Conviction quashed.

37 W.R. 17; 5 T.L.R. 21]

Solicitor—Trustee—Right to profit costs—Charging clause—Attesting witness to will—Wills Act, 1837 (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict., c. 26), s. 15.

Will—Beneficiary—Capacity to benefit—Attesting witness—Solicitor-trustee—Charging clause—Right to profit costs—Wills Act, 1837 (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict., c. 26), s. 15.

By s. 15 of the Wills Act, 1837: “. . . If any person shall attest the execution of any will to whom or to whose wife or husband any beneficial devise, legacy, estate, interest, gift, or appointment, of or affecting any real or personal estate (other than and except charges and directions for the payment of any debt or debts), shall be thereby given or made, such devise, legacy, estate, interest, gift, or appointment shall, so far only as concerns such person attesting the execution of such will, or the wife or husband of such person, or any person claiming under such person or wife or husband, be utterly null and void, and such person so attesting shall be admitted as a witness to prove the execution of such will, or to prove the validity or invalidity thereof, notwithstanding such devise, legacy, estate, interest, gift, or appointment mentioned in such will.”

The testatrix appointed B. and P. executors and trustees of her will which contained a charging clause providing that any trustee who might be a solicitor should be entitled to charge the estate for all business done by him in relation to the estate in the same manner as if he had been engaged to do such business by the executors as their solicitor. P., a solicitor, was an attesting witness and proved the will, and later brought in a bill of costs against the estate.

Held: apart from the charging clause P. would not be entitled to any professional charges; the charging clause gave him a beneficial interest which, as an attesting witness, s. 15 of the Wills Act, 1837, precluded him from claiming; and, therefore, he was not entitled to any profit costs.

Notes. See however Re Royce's Will Trusts, Tildesley v. Tildesley, [1959] 3 All E.R. 278, where a solicitor was appointed trustee subsequent to the death of the testator.

Appeal by Edmund Pooley, a solicitor and trustee of the will of the testatrix, from a decision of STIRLING, J., upholding, on a summons for review of taxation, the order of the taxing master disallowing all profit costs.

By her will, the testatrix, Jane Johnson, who died in July, 1887, appointed A H. C. Brown and Pooley, executors and trustees, and declared that:

“any trustee of this my will who may be a solicitor shall be entitled to charge my estate for all business done by him in relation to my estate in the same manner as if he had been engaged to do such business by my executors as their solicitor.”

Pooley, a solicitor, was one of the witnesses who attested the will, and he proved the will in July, 1887, leave being reserved to Brown to come in and prove. In February, 1888, Pooley brought in a bill of costs as solicitor against the estate. Brown and the tenant for life having obtained the common order for taxation, the taxing master, following Re Barber, Burgess v. Vinnicome (1), disallowed all the professional costs. B

Pooley took out a summons for review of taxation which was dismissed by C
STIRLING, J. Pooley appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and W. F. Hamilton for Pooley.

Wintle for Brown and the tenant for life, was not called on to argue.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of STIRLING, J., who followed D
the decision of CHITTY, J., in Re Barber (1). I am of opinion that the decision of CHITTY, J., was right, and that STIRLING, J., was right in following it. The question is, whether, under s. 15 of the Wills Act, 1837, a direction in the testatrix's will, that every trustee of the will who is a solicitor shall be entitled to charge for professional business done for the estate, is void as regards the solicitor by reason of his being an attesting witness to the will. In my opinion, it is void as E regards him. Pooley, as a trustee of the will, could not charge profit costs in respect of professional work done for the estate. It is urged that if we hold a clause enabling a trustee to do so to have the effect of giving him a legacy, a difficulty will arise, for that in that case a solicitor-trustee will be liable to pay legacy duty on his profit costs. I decline to give any opinion on that point; it may hereafter come before us for decision, and I do not wish to bind myself upon it; but F that consideration ought not to prevent us from giving a fair construction to the words of the enactment now before us. [HIS LORDSHIP read s. 15 of the Wills Act, 1837, and continued:] It is contended that if we hold this to be a legacy to Mr. Pooley, it will be a legacy to any future trustee of the will who may be a solicitor, and that the consequences as to legacy duty will follow. That may possibly be so, but, as regards Pooley, we have only to consider whether this direction is not G in substance a gift to him of so much of the estate as is required to pay the profit costs, and, therefore, void. It is urged that it is not a gift, for that he has to work for what he receives. That is true; but the clause gives him a right, which he would not otherwise have, to charge for the work if he does it, and that, in my opinion, is a beneficial gift within the meaning of s. 15 of the Wills Act, H

LINDLEY, L.J.—I think it is impossible to escape from the words of s. 15 of the Wills Act, 1837, and the case appears to me to fall within its policy. I think that under the old law Mr. Pooley would have taken, by force of this clause, such an interest as would have made him incompetent as a witness to the execution of the will. The policy of the Wills Act, 1837, was to leave the will good and to make void the gift which would have made the witness incompetent. Apart I from this clause, Mr. Pooley could not get anything out of the estate for his services, and I cannot say that a clause which enables him to get something out of the estate is not a gift to him within the meaning of s. 15 of the Wills Act, 1837.

BOWEN, L.J. I am of the same opinion.

By her will, dated June 16, 1885, the testatrix gave £14,000 to her trustees upon trust to be invested and to pay the annual income therefrom to W., the incumbent of the district church at H., so long as he should permit all sittings in the church to be occupied free of pew rents, but, if W. or any later incumbent should claim and receive pew rents, the testatrix directed that the £14,000 should fall into and be dealt with as part of her personal residuary estate. The testatrix also gave a field of three acres of arable land for the benefit of the church at H. upon the same trusts and conditions as the gift of £14,000.

Held: (i) the income of the £14,000 was a charitable gift limited for so long as the condition was observed and was not one for general charitable purposes enabling a cy-près scheme to be applied on failure of the condition; the gift over being a direction that on failure of the condition the fund should go in the manner in which it would otherwise necessarily go by law, the gift over was not void for perpetuity: (ii) the gift of the field being a gift of land for a charitable purpose and not being one which could be supported as a gift for glebe under the Gifts for Churches Acts, 1803 and 1811, was void in mortmain.

Summons by the trustees of the will of the testatrix to determine, among A other questions, (i) whether on the ground of perpetuity or otherwise the proviso in the will carrying over the bequest of £14,000 into the residue was void in a certain event; and (ii) whether the gift of the Red Lion Field [about three acres] was valid as a gift of glebe under the Gifts for Churches Acts, 1803 and 1811.

By her will, dated Nov. 16, 1885, the testatrix, Elizabeth Randell, gave £14,000, free from legacy duty, out of her pure personal estate, and on which the same B should, after the payment of the thereafter mentioned charitable legacies, be a primary charge to trustees upon trust to invest as therein mentioned, and proceeded :

“And in case the Rev. J. I. Penfold Wyatt, the present incumbent of the district church of Holy Trinity at Hawley, shall be such incumbent at my C decease, and shall during his incumbency, or during such part thereof as he shall permit all the sittings in the said church to be occupied free of all claim for pew rents, pay to him the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds arising from the said sum of £14,000 and the investments thereof; and from and after the determination of the said incumbency of the said J. I. Penfold D Wyatt by death or otherwise do and shall, so long as his successors, incumbents of the said district church, shall permit all the sittings of the said district church to be occupied free of all claims for pew rents, pay the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds of the stocks, funds, and securities in or upon which the . . . £14,000 may be invested to the incumbent for the time being of the said district church, and I direct and declare that in case any such E incumbent shall make any claim for and receive any such payment as aforesaid in respect of the occupation of any pews or sittings in the . . . church that from thenceforth the said trust moneys and the interest, dividends, and annual income arising therefrom shall fall into and be dealt with as part of my residuary personal estate.”

The testatrix devised a piece of arable land, about three acres, called the F Red Lion Field, to the same trustees for the benefit of the church of the Holy Trinity at Hawley, upon the same trusts and conditions as those respecting the £14,000 bequeathed. The testatrix then disposed of the advowson of the church, and gave a number of charitable and pecuniary legacies, and she gave all the residue of her real and personal estate, subject to the payment thereof of G her debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, to Mary Jane Dixon and Jesse Michell in equal shares.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 10, 1888. NORTH, J.—For the purpose of deciding the point on which I reserved my judgment, it is necessary to deal with the gift of the £14,000 now, because the land in question, which is three acres, is to be held upon the same I trusts and conditions as those respecting the £14,000 bequeathed by the will.

The effect of the gift of the £14,000 is, that the gift of the income of this £14,000 is a charitable gift, and is not in itself obnoxious to any rule against perpetuities. But it seems to me that the charitable gift is one for a definite limited particular purpose. It is intended to be devoted to one thing and nothing else; it is intended to continue so long as the pews in the church are allowed to be used without payment of any pew rents of any sort and no longer. Then the gift over is (whatever its construction may be) important as showing that

A the testatrix intended the gift to be for a limited special purpose and no other, because it says that in case the definite purpose specified can no longer be carried into effect then the property is to fall into the residue of the personal estate. Under these circumstances it seems to me that there is a charity created for a definite limited time and no longer, and there is no general purpose of charity with respect to which a scheme could be made, altering entirely the destination
B of the income of these investments.

C It seems to me startling to say that the Charity Commissioners might, if they pleased, make a new scheme for the application of this income in any way they pleased, possibly for the benefit of the incumbent and possibly not, and that when they have done that, although the purpose for which the money is given can no longer be carried into effect, yet the money is to be applied for a totally different purpose. I know no case at all like it, but the case that most resembles it is Walsh v. Secretary of State for India (1). There was beyond all question a trust for charity for a limited period, but there it was held that when the trust came to an end it fell into the estate of Lord Clive. In the present case it seems to me that there is a definite particular special charitable bequest which must have effect given to it so long as it lasts, and no longer, and that when it comes to an end there is no general devotion of the fund to general charitable purposes at all, the intention of the testatrix being distinctly opposite, and that, on the construction of the will, the charity is for a particular limited purpose, and nothing beyond that is declared; as soon as that particular purpose comes to an end the fund which was subjected to that particular trust falls into the residue of the estate, and it would do so just as much if there was no such limitation as this in the will, as it does when the limitation is found here. The limitation is that in D that case

“the trust moneys, and the interest, dividends, and annual income arising therefrom, shall fall into and be dealt with as part of my residuary personal estate.”

F If the testatrix had said that it would fall into and form part of her residuary personal estate, she would simply have been stating what the law is; but saying that it shall do so, is simply directing what the law would do without such a statement.

G In my opinion, a direction that in a particular event a fund shall go in the way in which the law would make it go in the absence of such a direction cannot be said to be an invalid gift or contrary to the policy of the law. In my opinion, therefore, this direction means that the fund is to go as the law, independently of direction, would give it, and that therefore that gift is not obnoxious to any rules of law. That being so, it belongs (subject of course to the trust created) to the residuary legatees, and they take it just as they would take it if there were
H no gift, or if the gift failed for perpetuity. It goes to them as part of the estate of the testatrix. I feel, therefore, able to answer the question in the summons in this way: that the direction in the will in the events therein mentioned, that the trust moneys arising from the investment of the £14,000, and the interest, dividends, and annual produce thereof shall fall into and be dealt with as part of my residuary personal estate, is not void on the ground of perpetuity. The
I question is perpetuity or otherwise, but no objection has been made except that for perpetuity.

There remains the question upon which I specifically reserved judgment, as to the operation of the gift of all that piece of arable land (describing it), which contains about three acres, now in the occupation of the present incumbent, to the trustees of the will, their heirs, executors, and assigns, as trustees for the benefit of the district church of the Holy Trinity upon the same trusts and conditions as those respecting the £14,000 bequeathed. The trust of the £14,000 is clearly a charitable gift to a limited extent. This, therefore, is a gift of land for a charitable purpose, and that gift is void, unless it can be brought within the Gifts for Churches Act, 1803. [His LORDSHIP read the preamble and s. 1 of the Act of 1803, and continued:] It is said that the devotion of those three acres in the way I have mentioned is a gift of glebe within the meaning of that statute. I postponed judgment in order to look into the Acts to which counsel for the incumbent of the district church referred in general terms, dealing with the glebe to see whether I could find anything in them which would enable me to put a larger construction on the word "glebe," as used in this Act, than I otherwise could have done. I have looked at several Acts upon the subject. One of them was the Clergy Residences Repair Act, 1776. [His LORDSHIP then read s. 10 of the Act of 1776, and continued:] It seems to me to be impossible to hold that such a gift as this, which, in my view, is one which would come to an end as soon as the purposes for which the limited charity is created failed, is a gift of land within the meaning of the Gift for Churches Act, 1803, and, under those circumstances, although I would have held otherwise if I could, I must hold that that gift of three acres is contrary to the Statute of Mortmain, and is inoperative.

Order accordingly.

SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE WATERWORKS CO. v. R. MASON & SONS

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Wills and Grantham, JJ.), December 16, 1886]

Water Supply—Pipes—Right of support—Mining—Pipes damaged by subsidence—Failure by undertakers to deposit map of pipes pursuant to Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict., c. 17), ss. 19, 20.

The deposit of the map of the district, showing the situation of all existing pipes, prescribed by ss. 19 and 20 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, is a condition precedent to the right of the water undertakers to recover from the owner of minerals lying under the pipes for damage caused to the pipes by working the minerals.

Notes. The Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, has been repealed by the Water Act, 1945, the third schedule to which provides a new waterworks code which is intended to replace the code under the 1847 Act. The code under the 1847 Act, however, continues to apply where that Act has been incorporated into a special Act unless the special Act has been varied by order of the Minister of Housing and Local Government by the substitution of a new code: see the Water Act, 1945, s. 32(2). The Water Act, 1945, Sched. 3, Pt. IV, ss. 12, 13, 14, 19, correspond to ss. 19, 22, and 28 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, respectively. The 1945 Act does not reproduce s. 20 of the 1847 Act.

C Action by the South Staffordshire Waterworks Co. against Richard Mason & Sons, to recover a sum of £709 12s. 3d. in respect of injury caused to the plaintiffs' pipes by a subsidence of the soil by reason of the working of the defendants' collieries.

In 1877 and 1881 the plaintiffs in pursuance of the powers conferred on them by the several Acts of Parliament which incorporated the provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, caused certain main water pipes to be laid in and under certain roads known as the Bridge Road, and Toll End Road, in the parish of Tipton, and the plaintiffs in their statement of claim contended that they thereby acquired under the Acts a right to subjacent and lateral support for their mains from the soil and minerals in and above which they were laid. The defendants were possessed of two collieries, comprising minerals lying under and adjoining Bridge Road and Toll End Road, in which the plaintiffs' mains had been laid. The defendants, after the laying of the plaintiffs' mains, so worked their collieries and minerals as to cause the same and the soil which supported them from time to time to subside, and thereby caused the mains to break and become damaged, and the plaintiffs were put to expense in raising and repairing their mains consequent on the subsidence. The defendants in their statement of defence did not admit the right of the plaintiffs to the subjacent and lateral support alleged in their statement of claim, and denied that they had so worked their collieries as to cause the plaintiffs' mains and the soil supporting them to subside, and that the leaking of the mains was occasioned by any subsidence of the soil, or withdrawal of subjacent or lateral support. The defendants also said that the plaintiffs had not, as required by ss. 19 and 20 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, caused a survey map to be made of the district or situation of the main water pipes alleged to have been laid in 1877 and 1881 in and under the roadways mentioned, and had not deposited the same with the clerk of the peace for the parish of Tipton, and that there had been no plan or map open to the inspection of the defendants as required by the said sections. The plaintiffs in their reply joined issue, save that with respect to the allegations of the defendants as to the survey, plan, and map, which they did not admit, they further contended that compliance with the provisions of ss. 19 and 20 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, was not in point of law a condition precedent to the acquisition of the right to support for their main water pipes, and that independently of any such compliance they became and were entitled under and by virtue of the said Act to subjacent and lateral support for their pipes from the defendants' soil and minerals from and after the time of the laying of the same. It was ordered that the point of law thereby raised should be set down for hearing, and disposed of before the trial of the action under Ord. 25, r. 2, and this was the point of law which now came on for hearing.

By the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 :

Section 19. "The undertakers shall from time to time within six months from the time at which any pipes, conduits, or underground works, shall have been laid down or formed by them, cause a survey map to be made of the district within which any such pipes or underground works shall be laid, on a scale not less than one foot to a mile, and shall cause to be marked thereon the course and situation of all existing pipes or conduits for the collection, passage, or distribution of water and underground works belonging to them in order to show all such underground works within the said district, and shall within six months from the making of any alterations or additions cause the said map to be from time to time corrected, and such additions made thereto as may show the line and situation of all such pipes, conduits, and underground works as may be laid down or formed by them from time to time after the passing of the special Act; such map and plan, or a copy thereof, with the date expressed thereon of the last time when the same shall have been so corrected as aforesaid, shall be kept in the office of the undertakers, and shall be open to the inspection of all persons interested in the same within the district."

Section 20. "The undertakers shall from time to time within three months from the time at which any such map or plan, or any such correction thereof or addition thereto shall have been made, deposit with the clerks of the peace in England of every county in which such district or any part thereof may be situate, and also with the parish clerks of the several parishes in England in which such underground works shall be situate, copies of the map or plan with all such particulars and all such corrections and additions so far as relates to such counties and parishes respectively."

Section 22. "Except where otherwise provided for by agreement between the undertakers and other parties, if the owner, lessee, or occupier, of any mines or minerals lying under the reservoirs or buildings belonging to the undertakers, or under any of their pipes or works which shall be underground, and shall be described in the map or plan which shall be so kept and deposited as hereinbefore mentioned, or within the prescribed distance, if any, and if no distance be prescribed within forty yards therefrom, be desirous of working the same, such owner, lessee, or occupier, shall give the undertakers notice in writing of his intention so to do thirty days before the commencement of working; and upon the receipt of such notice it shall be lawful for the undertakers to cause such mines to be inspected by any persons appointed by them for the purpose; and if it appear to the undertakers that the working of such mines or minerals is likely to damage the said works, and if they be willing to make compensation for such mines to such owner, lessee, or occupier thereof, then he shall not work the same."

Section 28. "The undertakers, under such superintendence as is hereinafter specified, may open and break up the soil and pavement of the several streets and bridges within the limits of the special Act, and may open and break up any sewers, drains, or tunnels, within or under such sheds and bridges, and lay down and place within the same limits, pipes, conduits, service pipes, and other works and engines."

Henn Collins, Q.C. (with him Johnston Watson) for the defendants.

WILLS, J.—In this case I have come to the conclusion that our decision must be in favour of the defendants, on the broad, simple, and intelligible ground that in the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, there is a group of sections expressly intended to meet and cover the class of cases to which this belongs, and to do away with the effect of the construction placed by the Court of Appeal on a similar enactment in Re Dudley Corpn. (1). If s. 28 of the Act stood alone it would, on the authority of that case, prevail; and it would be a necessary implication that the ordinary right of action for personal injury remained, and was not interfered with. But it seems to me that to decide in that way would be to pass over the fact that the legislature has provided for the mutual protection of water companies and mineowners, by a group of sections containing

A provisions beneficial to both, and expressly intended to meet such cases as the present.

I think, therefore, that the existence of the body of legislation contained in ss. 18 to 23, prevents us from giving a like meaning to s. 28 to that given by the Court of Appeal in the case I have mentioned to the section there discussed. These sections, in my judgment, form a code which is perfectly adequate to do justice between the rival owners of water pipes and of mines, and provide the machinery, into the details of which I will not go, for the regulation of their conflicting rights. The owner of the pipes is not to be called upon to compensate the owner of the minerals until there is a danger that the necessary support will be taken away and the pipes interfered with, and then he is at once relieved from the danger by taking the steps provided by the Act.

C The knowledge of the existence of pipes resting upon the support of the minerals is doubtless in some cases a temptation to mineowners, and there may have been cases in which when markets have been dull mineowners have worked in a particular direction with the object of obtaining the compensation provided by the Act, but in this case the plaintiffs have, either from negligence or design, failed to deposit the plan prescribed by the Act for the purpose of giving information to the mineowner when he is in danger of damaging the pipes of the water company. Their failure to do so has made it impossible for us to apply s. 22 of the Act. No plan was deposited showing the pipes laid down by them. Consequently the mineowner was deprived of his chance of making use of the section, and it would, therefore, be highly unreasonable for us to hold that the plaintiffs had a right to compensation for the interference with their pipes, when by their conduct they had rendered it impossible for the mineowner to take advantage of the provisions of the statute. It seems to me plain that where these sections are applicable the general right of support does not exist, and the plaintiffs having rendered it impossible for the mineowner to act under the sections, cannot avail themselves of that right to bring an action for interference with their pipes. E Their right it must be remembered is not founded on common law, but is a right given by statute, and their claim to exercise it when they have shut the defendants out from the statute is unreasonable. F

G GRANTHAM, J.—The whole of the argument on which the learned counsel for the plaintiffs relies, is based upon a statute and a decision dealing with an entirely dissimilar state of circumstances. Were it not for the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Re Dudley Corpn. (1), and perhaps also Normanton Gas Co. v. Pope and Pearson, Ltd. (2), there would be nothing to be said in favour of the plaintiffs. The circumstances of those cases are different, and they do not apply.

H With reference to the circumstances of this case, I can imagine many cases in which great injustice would be done if we decided in favour of the plaintiffs. It is urged on their behalf that the pipes were laid in a public street, and that, therefore, it cannot be said that the owner of the mine did not know that they were there; but I can easily understand that many cases might occur in which the mineowner would be able to say that he did not know they were there. The Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, s. 22, provides that the mines lying near the pipes I shall not be worked until the owners have given notice of their intention to do so to the company; and if no distance is prescribed by the special Act, forty yards is mentioned as the distance. This distance was taken, I imagine, from the Railways Clauses Act, as in many respects it is not applicable to water companies, and no doubt, if the provision had been originally framed for water companies, a different distance would have been prescribed. Still that distance was prescribed by the legislature, and the provision is perfectly clear.

Then it is said that the mineowner might have known notwithstanding the failure to deposit the map that the pipes were there. Let us see what might have happened. The plaintiffs date their origin from the year 1834 when the Dudley Waterworks Co. were incorporated, and the pipes might have been laid so long ago as that. It is true that the plaintiff company had nothing to do with this district until the year 1860; but they seem at that time to have purchased the whole undertaking of the Dudley company, and it is, therefore, quite possible that they might not themselves know exactly where some of their own pipes were situate. On the other hand, the mine might also have changed hands frequently since that time. I think that if we listened to this argument we should be throwing a great burden where it ought not to be thrown. It is suggested that by a strained interpretation of a later section in the Act we might hold that the plaintiffs are entitled to an absolute right of support, but in the face of these specific provisions giving the undertakers, if they choose to act in accordance with them, every protection which they need, I do not feel justified in giving that effect to the later section which the plaintiffs suggest.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., FRY and LOPES, L.JJ.), reported 20 Q.B.D. 483, affirming a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (MATHEW and CAVE, JJ.), reported 57 L.T. 99, upon a Special Case.

The action was brought in April, 1886, by the respondents, who were the urban sanitary authority of the borough of Bury, for the purposes of the Public Health Act, 1875, against the appellants, a railway company, to recover the sum of £273 18s. 3d. for work done and materials provided in paving and flagging a railway bridge in Manchester Road, Bury. The question raised was, whether under s. 46 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the appellants were liable to maintain the roadway of the bridge as well as the fabric of the structure in repair. The courts below held that the appellants were liable to repair the road in question.

By the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 46 :

“If the line of the railway cross any turnpike road or public highway, then (except where otherwise provided by the special Act) either such road shall be carried over the railway, or the railway shall be carried over such road, by means of a bridge, . . . and such bridge, with the immediate approaches, and all other necessary works connected therewith, shall be executed and at all times thereafter maintained at the expense of the company. . . .”

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., and W. Graham (Henn Collins, Q.C.), with them) for the appellants.

Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., and R. S. Wright for the respondents, were not called upon to address the House.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed, and that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed. The question turns upon the construction of s. 46 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the point involved being whether the appellant company are bound to maintain in repair the roadway passing over a bridge constructed by them under the authority of their special Act, which incorporated the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

I think that there are reasons in this case which should induce your Lordships A to exercise very great caution before yielding to the argument of the learned counsel for the appellants, because a construction was put upon the clause with which we are now dealing as long ago as the year 1858 by very learned judges in the Court of Queen's Bench in North Staffordshire Rail. Co. v. Dale (1). The view so taken was shortly afterwards approved and followed by the Court of B Exchequer in Newcastle-under-Lyne and Leek Turnpike Roads Trustees v. North Staffordshire Rail. Co. (2), and there are, as it seems to me, special reasons why a judgment so given should not be disturbed, unless it be clearly shown to have proceeded upon an erroneous view of the law, inasmuch as the clause which then received construction was contained in an enactment which did not of itself C produce any legal results. It only had effect if incorporated by a subsequent Act of the legislature in statutes giving powers to railway companies; and one cannot but see that the construction put upon an enactment of that description may well have affected the action of the legislature in subsequent cases when they had to consider what obligations they should or should not impose upon the railway companies to whom they were giving powers. At the same time, if it could be D established that the decision was manifestly erroneous, your Lordships would be bound to give effect to that view, and to hold that the statute must be construed according to its natural meaning, notwithstanding the interpretation which had so long ago been put upon it by eminent judges.

But, when we come to consider the terms of the enactment, I myself see no reason to question the propriety of the decision which was pronounced by the Court of Queen's Bench so long ago, and has been often followed since. I quite E admit that a plausible argument has been advanced on behalf of the railway company by the learned counsel for the appellants, drawn from a consideration of the subsequent sections of the Act, and of the circumstances arising when the road, instead of being carried over the railway by means of a bridge, is carried under the railway, the railway passing by means of a bridge over the road. It is suggested that there is no more reason why the railway company should be F bound permanently to maintain the roadway in the one case than in the other.
But I think that we have first of all to look at the language used in s. 46, and to see whether, according to its natural meaning apart from the other provisions of the Act, with which I will deal in a moment, the road which passes over the bridge is a part of the bridge within the meaning of s. 46. It appears to me, that according to the natural use of language, it would be spoken of and considered as a part G of the bridge, and I think that the Court of Queen's Bench were justified in saying that the language was in its natural use such as to create the obligation which is contended for on the part of the respondents.

But it is said that it is possible to construe the word "bridge" as excluding the highway passing over it, inasmuch as that distinction has been recognised in the Turnpike Acts, which were in force at the time when this statute was passed. H
I quite agree that it is possible to do so; but I do not think that in the language of
s. 46 any such distinction is to be discovered, and it appears to me that the Court of Queen's Bench showed good reasons why the legislature should not so have distinguished it in the present case. They pointed out that there would be an inconvenience, not only in the case of the bridge itself, but still more so in some respects in the case of the approaches, in having two different I authorities to repair the bridge structurally and the road, inasmuch as it might, especially in the case of the approaches, often be a question of some nicety to determine how much was what is here called the approach, and how much was the road upon the approach, between which the learned counsel for the appellants seem to make a distinction. And then, too, it may have been considered by the legislature that, as a general rule, there being an ascent and a descent contemplated on either side of the bridge, the cost of repairs would be enhanced by the fact that the road passed over the bridge instead of passing in its former

A course, and that that would be a reason for imposing this perpetual obligation upon the railway company.

It is said by the learned counsel for the appellants that similar reasons, at all events as regards the latter point, might exist where a road was to be carried under a bridge, and I quite admit that that is the case; but in such an enactment as the present I do not feel pressed by that argument, and for this reason, that all that the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, does is to lay down what one may call a general rule, which has no force or effect, except in so far as that general rule is made effective by subsequent special legislation, and when you come to deal with the matter in the special Act, if in the particular case the general rule is not the best rule, or a rule which would be fair or just, it can be accepted or modified as the legislature may think fit; and, therefore, in either case, whether as regards the road under the railway, or as regards the road over the railway, when the special Act is passed the legislature is not bound to incorporate in its exact terms either the provision relating to the one or the provision relating to the other, but may make it suitable, as it may deem fit, to the particular circumstances of the case. Therefore, it seems to me that in the present case it is of very little force to show that a different general rule has been laid down as regards roads under a bridge from the rule laid down in relation to roads over a bridge, because it may well be that, while in the one case it was thought that in most instances it would be more just and more convenient to leave the railway company to carry out those works of repairs, in the other case it may have been thought that the same principle was not so fully applicable.

For these reasons I think that the proper construction has been put upon s. 46, if one reads that section without reference to the other parts of the Act, and I find nothing in the other parts of the Act to justify a departure from its natural interpretation. I, therefore, move your Lordships that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

LORD FITZGERALD.—I am of the same opinion. There appears to me to be no distinction in fact between the case now before your Lordships and the case which was decided thirty-one years ago in the Court of Queen's Bench, a decision subsequently adopted and universally acted upon down to the present time. To disturb a decision of that kind we should require to be satisfied that there was some cardinal error connected with it, and I am not satisfied at all that there is any error. On the contrary, forming the best opinion that I can, I should say that the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in 1858 was a decision according to law, according to the true interpretation of s. 46 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. It might have been very convenient indeed at the time when this Act was framed to have established one general rule if it was consistent with its provisions, namely, that when the railway company had given back the road into the hands of the county authorities unaltered in its character, repaired and made perfectly fit for use, the expense of repairs should afterwards rest with the latter body; but the statute does not say so; the decisions are to the contrary, and I adhere to the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

Legitimacy—Presumption of legitimacy—Reversal of presumption—Spouses living apart under separation order—Non-access—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict., c. 19), s. 4.

From the moment when a separation decree or order is made authorising a husband and wife to live apart the presumptions which exist in the case of married persons as to access and legitimacy of children are reversed. If, therefore, a child is born more than nine months after the separation, unless it be shown as a matter of fact that the husband and wife came together again, it is presumed that such child is illegitimate.

Notes. The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, has been repealed. Where a husband has committed an aggravated assault on his wife, the wife may apply to the magistrates' court under s. 1 of the Matrimonial Proceedings (Magistrates' Court) Act, 1960, for a "matrimonial order," such an order has the same effect with regard to cohabitation as a separation order under the Act of 1878. The procedure for discharging or varying a "matrimonial order" and for appeal is contained in the Act of 1960, and in so far as this case relates to the interpretation of the 1878 Act with regard to the jurisdiction of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division to entertain proceedings under the Act, it is obsolete. So much of the holding as concerns the presumption of legitimacy, however, remains authoritative.

Motion for the discharge of an order made by justices of Chester Ward, Durham.

On Jan. 1, 1883, William George Hetherington, the applicant, was convicted under s. 43 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, of an aggravated assault upon his wife Elizabeth Hetherington, and an order was made under s. 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, that she no longer be bound to cohabit with him. On Sept. 20, 1886, the husband appeared before the magistrates on a warrant for payment of arrears of maintenance under the order. During cross-examination the wife admitted that she had given birth to a child of which her husband was not, and could not be, the father, as she had not cohabited with him since the date of the order in 1883. After these admissions, the husband took

A out a summons to vary the original order, and this summons was heard at Consett Police Court on Oct. 9 and 16, 1886. The magistrates refused to admit the evidence of the husband as to non-access or the admissions made by the wife, on the grounds that neither husband nor wife was competent to give evidence tending to bastardise a child born in wedlock.

SIR JAMES HANNEN, P. --I regret very much that this litigation has reached the pitch that it has, and I hope that the opinion I am about to express upon the main point of the case will, in some way or other, bring the controversy to an end; the point being, whether or not there is evidence upon which the magistrates might have acted to discharge the original order of 1883. It appears that an order was then made equivalent by the Act of Parliament to a judicial separation, and a judicial separation is equivalent to the ancient divorce a mensa et thoro. From the time that the decree was pronounced the parties were forced to live apart, and the husband was bound not to molest his wife in any way, or to resume cohabitation. From that moment the presumptions which exist in the case of married persons as to access and legitimacy of children are reversed, and from that moment, if a child is born more than nine months after the separation, unless it be shown, as a matter of fact, that the husband and wife came together again, it is presumed that such child is illegitimate, and that appears to have been lost sight of altogether when this matter was before the magistrates. If it had not been lost sight of, it probably would have led them to a different decision. That point has been settled long ago in law by Parish of St. George v. Parish of St. Margaret (1). The wife seems to have made certain statements with regard to the birth of her child: that it was born eight weeks before the matter came on for hearing in 1886. Upon that point, I think it does, by implication, lead to an inference, a conclusive inference, of the illegitimacy of the child. A woman, though she be a married woman, may prove that a child was born at a particular time, and it must depend on other circumstances whether the child was legitimate or not. It was proved that the child was born eight weeks before the hearing in 1886, and there was a legal presumption that any child born after 1883 was illegitimate. The magistrates seem, however, to have been led to think that this was an issue of bastardy, but it was not; it was an issue of adultery.

G HIS LORDSHIP considered the jurisdiction of the court under s. 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, now obsolete, and refused the application.

The plaintiff and the defendant were the tenants from year to year of adjoining farms, A and B, both of which were in the ownership of the same landlord. A private road over farm A led to the highway, but the most convenient way from that farm to the highway was by a lane leading from a point on the private road on farm A and passing through farm B. Though the lane was on farm B, it had no communication with that farm except at the end where it joined the highway and it served no purpose for farm B. The lane was a made and fenced road subsisting visibly for the convenience of farm A and had been used by the plaintiff without the defendant's permission for some 30 or 40 years, being repaired by the plaintiff from time to time. Before 1873 the defendant occupied farm B as a tenant from year to year, but in 1873 the landlord granted him a lease which was silent as to the lane in question and any user thereof. In 1878 farm A was demised to the plaintiff, who had held the farm as a yearly tenant up to that time, together with “all houses, buildings and appurtenances thereto.” The defendant interfered with the plaintiff's right of way over the lane over farm B.

Held: (i) although the demise of farm B to the defendant was silent as to the lane the right of using the lane constituted an easement of farm A, and no demise could be made of the soil of the lane free from that right without derogating from the grant to the plaintiff under which his then subsisting tenancy was constituted; (ii) the mere grant of “appurtenances” in the demise of farm A to the plaintiff was not sufficient to create a new right of way not pre-existing at the date of grant, but was sufficient to pass the right of way already reserved for the benefit of farm A.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (MATHEW and CAVE, JJ.), refusing a new trial.

This was an action for interference with a right of way tried before Mr. McINTYRE, Q.C., sitting as commissioner, at Anglesey, with a jury. The jury found that the plaintiff was entitled by reason of user to the right of way claimed, and judgment was entered for the plaintiff accordingly. The Divisional Court refused to order a new trial, and the defendant appealed.

H

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 14, 1887. FRY, L.J., read the following judgment of the court.—This is an action brought for interference with a right of way, and the question is whether the plaintiff has the right of way which he claims.

The plaintiff and the defendant are tenants of adjoining farms in the island of Anglesey under Sir Richard Bulkley, the plaintiff's farm being known as Ty Wian, and the defendant's farm as Caerau. A parish road, leading from Llanrhyddlad to a place on the coast known as Cemlyn Bay, passes through Caerau, the defendant's farm; the plaintiff's farm communicates with this highway by a road which, from the plans and other evidence before us, we hold to be a private road. This private road joins the parish road at a place called the Old Bar. From a point on the plaintiff's farm, and on this private road about half way between the home-
Istead of Ty Wian and the Old Bar, a lane known as Lon Car Glas, runs westward, and leads from the plaintiff's farm and the private road to a spot on the parish road nearer to Cemlyn Bay than to the Old Bar. It is, therefore, the nearest way A from Ty Wian to Cemlyn Bay and the parts thereabout, and besides being nearer than the private road, it is level, while the private road is steep and hilly. The right of way claimed by the plaintiff is along this Lon Car Glas.

This lane is, we conclude from the evidence before us, an ancient lane; it is 418 yards in length and twenty-two yards wide; for a short distance on one side near B its eastern end the lane is bounded by the plaintiff's land; but with this slight exception it has the defendant's land on both sides; it is bounded by turf banks with hedges on the top for its whole length; it has no communication on either side with the defendant's land. The roadway is made with cobble stones, and is partly grown over with grass. The lane is a made road perfectly visible; it is a long strip between two roads intersecting the defendant's farm, separated from C that farm on both sides, and only open to the defendant's access at its western end where it joins the parish road; it subserves no use for the defendant's farm except so far as it may be grazed by his cattle; but it leads from the high road to the plaintiff's land and towards the plaintiff's farmhouse, and that is its only visible purpose and reason for existence.

Such is the present condition of the road, and such we conclude from the D evidence has been its condition for thirty or forty years before the action was brought. It has for many years past been used by the plaintiff as occasion required, both for himself and his family, in going to chapel and elsewhere, and by his carts in bringing coal, gravel, seaweed, and guano from Cemlyn Bay; and it has from time to time been repaired by him. These acts have been done by the plaintiff without asking or receiving permission from the defendant, and E until immediately before action, without interference on his part. We conclude from the evidence that the user for thirty or forty years past has been in accordance with the modern user by the plaintiff, as we have stated it.

The defendant has occupied his farm prior to 1873 as tenant from year to year.
But in that year he accepted a lease from Sir Richard Bulkley, under which he now holds. By that lease the landlord demised to the defendant, among other F things, all those tenements usually known by the name of Caerau, containing by admeasurement 305a. 1r. 24p., described as then in the tenure or occupation of the defendant. This description was followed by general words, and by reservations of timber, mines, and game. The lease is silent as to the lane in question and any user thereof, but it is admitted by the plaintiff that the lane is comprised in the 305a. 1r. 24p. of Caerau. The plaintiff had occupied his farm as tenant G from year to year to Sir Richard Bulkley down to the year 1878, when he accepted a lease from his landlord, under which he now holds. By this instrument the lessor demised to the plaintiff the messuage known as Ty Wian, together with all the land and all houses, buildings, and appurtenances thereto belonging, subject to reservations of timber, mines, and game. This lease contains no other general words than the word appurtenances.

We think it a just inference or conclusion from the evidence before us that, H both in 1873 and 1878, the use of the lane in question was visibly necessary to the comfortable enjoyment of the plaintiff's farm in the manner in which it was enjoyed at and before those dates respectively. We think further that, in construing the leases of 1873 and 1878, we are bound to attend to the previous user of the plaintiff's and defendant's farms respectively: Hall v. Lund (1). The I defendant interfered with the plaintiff's user of the lane, and thereupon this action was brought. It was tried before Mr. Commissioner McINTYRE and a jury, who found that the plaintiff was entitled to a right of way along the lane by reason of user. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff accordingly; and from that judgment this appeal is brought.

The main contention of the defendant has been that, even assuming the user as found by the jury, and as we have stated it, the plaintiff cannot recover. The defendant has, in addition, raised certain contentions as to the facts, in respect

A of which we have already stated our conclusions. The evidence, in our opinion, amply justifies the verdict and judgment in point of fact, if they can be justified in point of law. The defendant has contended before us that, according to the true construction of the lease of 1873, Sir Richard Bulkley thereby purported to demise to him Lon Car Glas free from all rights of way in the plaintiff; that the lessor was estopped by this lease, and that the plaintiff, having taken a subsequent lease from Sir Richard Bulkley, is likewise estopped from denying the defendant's title to the lane free from any right of way. The defendant further contends that, even if Sir Richard Bulkley was able to grant a right of way to the plaintiff over Lon Car Glas, he did not in fact grant it by the lease of 1878, under which the plaintiff claims, and consequently that the plaintiff has no title to the way claimed.

C With regard to the lease of 1873, it is not necessary to consider how the matter would have stood if the lessor had himself been in possession of the plaintiff's farm at the date of this lease to the defendant, for this was not the case. On the contrary, at the date in question, the material facts stood thus: The farm, now the plaintiff's, was then in his occupation as tenant from year to year under Sir Richard Bulkley. The lane in question was a made and fenced road, subsisting visibly for the convenience of the plaintiff's farm, and of no use as a road to the defendant. It was, and had been, openly used by the plaintiff and his predecessors in title for many years, and had been repaired by them. The right of using this road constituted an easement of the farm occupied by the plaintiff, and no demise could be made of the soil of the lane free from that right without derogating from the grant to the plaintiff under which his then subsisting tenancy was constituted. In this state of circumstances, the presumption that the demise in question of Lon Car Glas was one free from any right of way is, in our opinion, rebutted by a consideration of these circumstances, just as in Doe d. Freeland
v. Burt (2) the presumption that the demise of a house extended to the centre of the earth was rebutted by the existence at the time of the demise of a cellar by the same lessor, and the occupation of that cellar by a person claiming under that demise.

But then it was urged that alike in implied reservations and in implied grants a rule exists to this effect, that while such an implication may arise in the case of easements of necessity and continuous easements, it cannot arise in the case of easements which are neither of necessity nor continuous, and for this proposition Polden v. Bastard (3) is cited, and many other authorities might have been invoked. But on this principle as established by such decisions there has been engrafted by other decisions an exception in the case of a formed road made over an alleged servient tenement to and for the apparent use of the dominant tenement (per BRAMWELL, B., in Langley v. Hammond (4); Watts v. Kelson (5)); and if the exception arises in the case of a grant we think it ought to arise in the case of a reservation made to support an earlier grant, as in the present case.
For these reasons we are of opinion that the lease of 1873 was according to its true construction subject to the right of way over Lon Car Glas then existing in the plaintiff, and that consequently no question of estoppel can arise.

Then arises the question whether the lease of 1878 from Sir Richard Bulkley to the plaintiff conveyed to him the right of way in question. Under the circumstances of this case as we have found them, it appears to us to follow from Watts
v. Kelson (5) and Kay v. Oxley (6) that the right to the way in question would pass if the lease had contained general words descriptive of easements and rights usually enjoyed with the demised premises. But it was contended before us that the absence in the lease of 1878 of any other general words than the word appurtenances made an important difference and distinguished this case from the earlier authorities to which we have referred. No doubt the word appurtenances is not apt for the creation of a new right; and the word appurtenant is not apt to describe a right which had never previously existed; and, therefore, the mere grant of all appurtenances or of all ways appurtenant to the principal subject of the grant has been held in many cases not to create a new right of way where the right was not pre-existing at the date of the grant. But from as long ago as 1557 (Hill v. Grange (7)) the word appurtenances has easily admitted of a secondary meaning, and as equivalent in that case to usually occupied. Here at the date of the lease of 1878 Lon Car Glas was not in the occupation of the lessor but in that of the defendant, and the defendant had, as we have held, acquired an estate in it as against which the right of way was reserved, and reserved for the benefit of the land and house of the plaintiff; and under these circumstances we think that the right of way did pass under the word appurtenances. This conclusion is, we think, aided by sufficient authority; for which purpose it will suffice to refer to Nicholas v. Chamberlain (8), Hall v. Lund (1) and Ewart v. Cochrane (9). For these reasons we hold the judgment appealed from to be right, and dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Divorce—Maintenance of wife—Order—Dum sola clause—Discretion of court—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict., c. 85), s. 32.

When making an order for the permanent maintenance of a wife after a divorce, the court has an unfettered discretion to decide whether or not in the circumstances of the case the maintenance should be payable for the wife's whole life or until her second marriage.

In December, 1876, when she was 17 years of age, the petitioner married the respondent. On Aug. 3, 1888, she obtained a decree nisi for dissolution on the grounds of the adultery and cruelty of the respondent, which decree was subsequently made absolute. There were no children of the marriage. On Mar. 1, 1889, the petitioner filed a petition for permanent maintenance. The registrar in his report stated that the petitioner had no property of her own, but the respondent had property producing an income of about £560, and he recommended that the respondent be ordered to secure for the permanent maintenance of the petitioner the sum of £195 per annum "for her life, or until she marry again." The petitioner applied for a variation of the report by the omission of the limitation "until she marry again." The judge held that he had an absolute discretion whether to strike out the limitation or not and ordered that the limitation be struck out.

Held: in the circumstances of the case the discretion of the judge had not been improperly exercised in removing the limitation "until she marry again" from the registrar's report.

Notes. The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 32, was repealed by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1907. Substantially the same power to make an order for

A maintenance is now contained in s. 19 (2) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. The effect of a dum sola clause has now lost much of its significance as a result of the increased powers of the court to vary a maintenance order, see s. 28 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950.

G The petitioner, Rosa Caroline Fredericka Lister, was married to the respondent, George Leopold Greville Lister, in December, 1876. At that time the petitioner was only seventeen years of age. There was no issue of the marriage. On Aug. 3, 1888, the petitioner obtained a decre nisi for dissolution on the grounds of the adultery and cruelty of the respondent, and on Feb. 12, 1889, that decree was made absolute. On Mar. 1, 1889, the wife filed a petition for permanent maintenance. The registrar reported that the petitioner was without means; that the respondent was possessed of securities from which he derived an income amounting to £567 10s. per annum, after deducting income tax. The registrar recommended that the respondent be ordered to secure, upon the securities named in the report, for the permanent maintenance of the petitioner, the sum of £195 per annum "for her life, or until she marry again."

H On July 23, 1889, a motion, on behalf of the petitioner, was made to BUTT, J., to vary the report by omitting the limitation "until she marry again." BUTT, J., held that the judge has an absolute discretion to decide whether the words "until she marry again" ought to be included or omitted and ordered that the words of limitation be struck out. The respondent appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 19, 1889. COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal by a husband from an order of BUTT, J., directing the husband to secure payment to his wife of an annual sum as permanent alimony. The wife had obtained against her husband a decree for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of his cruelty and adultery, and the appeal was brought on the ground that the learned judge had excluded from the order the clause which was for a long time usually introduced into such orders, limiting the allowance to the period during which the wife should remain unmarried. It was said that BUTT, J., had laid down a general rule that the clause “so long as she remain unmarried” should be left out of orders for permanent maintenance, and that the allowance should be made to the wife for her life absolutely. If he had laid down any such general rule fixing the practice of the court, I think I should have desired to have had the case re-argued before the full Court of Appeal. But it appears from his judgment that BUTT, J., did not lay down any such general rule, but under the particular circumstances of the case considered that he had an absolute discretion to make the order now appealed from. I think he had such a discretion under the Act of Parliament. Section 32 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 [see now s. 19 (2) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950] provides that

“the court may, if it shall think fit, on any such decree, order that the husband shall to the satisfaction of the court secure to the wife such gross sum of money, or such annual sum of money, for any term not exceeding her own life, as, having regard to her fortune (if any), to the ability of the husband, and to the conduct of the parties, it shall deem reasonable.”

In my opinion, the section leaves the matter entirely within the discretion of the judge, though I do not say that it is a discretion the exercise of which is not subject to an appeal. I think an appeal does lie in such a case. But I see no reason in the present case for differing from the learned judge as to how his discretion should be exercised. He must have known more about the facts of the case and the circumstances of the parties than we can possibly do. In my opinion, it would be wrong to interfere with his discretion, and the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—The discretion to be exercised by the judge in allowing permanent alimony is a discretion given by s. 32 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857. By that section the court may order the husband to secure to the wife either such gross sum of money or such sum of money as, having regard to the circumstances of the case and the conduct of the parties, it shall deem reasonable. It was said that BUTT, J., had laid down the general rule that permanent maintenance ought to be secured during the life of the wife obtaining the divorce; but a reference to his judgment shows that he laid down no such rule. It was also said that the rule ought to be to give the wife the annual sum allowed as alimony only until her second marriage. In my opinion, that proposition is equally untenable. The Act empowers the judge to give the wife an annual sum for any period not exceeding her life, or, in the alternative, to give her a gross sum of money, and it could not be said that the enjoyment of the latter could be taken from her on her second marriage. Therefore, it must be inferred that the legislature was clearly not unfavourable to the grant of the alimony being for the whole life of an innocent wife.

It appears to me that the effect of the section is to leave an unfettered discretion in the judge in each case, and it would be wrong to lay down any prima facie rule whether the annual sum should be payable during the wife's whole life or until her second marriage. It is the duty of the judge to exercise his discretion according to the particular circumstances of each case, and the only question therefore in the present case is whether the learned judge has exercised his discretion in a proper manner. The facts of the case are these: The

A wife was married at the age of seventeen. She had no property of her own, but the husband had property producing an income of about £560 a year. The respondent has been a cruel husband and an unfaithful husband, and he has made the life of his wife unbearable. His conduct has driven her from his home and compelled her to seek the aid of the Divorce Court. That is as great a wrong as it is possible for a man to inflict on his wife. She is now about thirty-two or thirty-three years of age, and under these circumstances the judge has allowed her an annuity of £195, about a third of her husband's income, out of his property for life. Can it be said that this is an unreasonable compensation to be paid by a man who has violated his marital duties in this manner? I think the amount of the allowance is not excessive, and that the term for which it is given is not unreasonable, and I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Malicious Prosecution—Evidence—Reasonable and probable cause—Onus of proof.

In an action for malicious prosecution the jury was directed that the burden of proof as to the want of reasonable and probable cause for the prosecution and as to malice lay on the plaintiff, and that it was for him to show that the defendants had not taken reasonable care to inform themselves of the true facts of the case. The following questions were left to the jury: "Did the defendants take reasonable care to inform themselves of the true facts of the case and did the defendants honestly believe in the case which they laid before the magistrates?" Both questions having been answered in the affirmative by the jury, judgment was entered for the defendants.

H

Held: there was no misdirection and judgment was rightly entered for the defendants.

Notes. LORD BRAMWELL stated in his opinion that an action for malicious prosecution would not lie against a corporation aggregate as it was incapable of malice or motive. Because of this opinion and of other cases following it, doubt existed whether such an action would lie against a corporation, but now it appears that such an action will lie: see 25 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 352, and the cases there cited.

Appeal by the plaintiff, in an action for malicious prosecution, from a decision D of the Court of Appeal (SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ.), reported 11 Q.B.D. 440, reversing a decision of the Divisional Court (GROVE and LOPES, JJ.), reported in 11 Q.B.D. 79, making absolute a rule for a new trial on the ground of misdirection at the trial before CAVE J., with a jury.

The action was brought by the appellant, who was a doctor of medicine and surgery of the University of Heidelberg, and a licentiate of the Apothecaries E Company of London, practising in Sunderland, against the North Eastern Railway Co. to recover damages for the alleged malicious prosecution. The matter arose out of a claim put forward by Michael M'Mann, a general dealer in Sunderland, in respect of personal injuries which he alleged he had sustained in an accident which occurred on the respondents' railway on Sept. 10, 1880. The claim of M'Mann was settled by the respondents paying him £725 and £300 costs. Shortly F after the settlement the respondents brought a charge of conspiracy against the appellant and M'Mann, alleging that the symptoms from which the latter appeared to be suffering at the time of the settlement had been simulated by him with the aid of the appellant. When the charge of conspiracy came on for trial the accused were acquitted. The present action for malicious prosecution was then brought by the appellant. G

CAVE, J., who tried the cause at the Durham Summer Assizes, 1882, left to the jury the following questions:—Did the defendants take reasonable care to inform themselves of the true facts of the case, and did they honestly believe in the case which they laid before the magistrates? The jury answered both these questions in the affirmative, and the judge directed a verdict to be entered for the respondents, and gave judgment for them. H

Walton for the respondents.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE. The argument of counsel for the appellant has I cleared up any difficulty which there might have been as to the real grounds on which we should decide this case. The question really is one of the weight of evidence and nothing else. The burden of satisfying the jury that there was no reasonable and probable ground for the prosecution lies upon the plaintiff. It is not now seriously disputed that it does. The learned judge having left the two questions of fact to the jury, they found, first, that proper care had been used by the prosecutors to inform themselves of the facts; and, secondly, that the prosecutors honestly believed the case which they laid before the magistrates. In

A my judgment the learned judge did not misdirect the jury, and the Court of Appeal were right in their view of the law, and the only question is, is there any ground for saying that upon the weight of evidence the jury miscarried and that a new trial ought to be directed?

B Speaking for myself, I cannot imagine a more hopeless case in that point of view. The railway company had to determine whether or not they would institute this prosecution; and the evidence given by the gentleman who was acting for them in the matter is, to my mind, as completely sufficient to negative the idea of the absence of reasonable and proper care on the part of the company to inform themselves of the facts as anything for the purpose of an action of this sort can be. The statements of certain persons were obtained, carefully considered, and laid before counsel, and counsel advised a prosecution upon those materials. C A prosecution having been instituted, it was thought by the magistrates that the preponderance of evidence was such that they ought to send the case for trial. Taking the evidence as it was presented to the railway company, to those who advised them, and to the magistrates, it was a body of evidence which, if believed, tended to prove the charge, and justified those who believed it in making the charge in perfect good faith. How it can be said that taking such a body of D evidence as that, without the suggestion, much less proof, of the use of any fraudulent or improper means to obtain it, shows a want of reasonable care on the part of the company to inform themselves about the facts, I cannot imagine. I cannot conceive better prima facie evidence of reasonable care in that respect. [His Lordship discussed the evidence, and concluded:] So far from thinking E that there is a preponderance of evidence against reasonable and probable cause, my doubt is rather on the other side, whether on the whole evidence there was really anything to go to the jury in favour of that conclusion. I move your Lordships that the order appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

F LORD WATSON.—I am of the same opinion. I have no doubt that the learned judge rightly directed the jury, and that there is nothing to show than the defendants acted without reasonable and probable cause. The authorities cited by counsel for the appellant in the course of his able argument do not form, in my opinion, any exception to the ordinary rule that the burden of proof lies upon G the plaintiff. Some of them establish that a slight amount of evidence may be sufficient to launch the plaintiff's case, when the whole circumstances of the case are in themselves sufficient to raise a presumption of want of reasonable care on the part of the prosecutor, but that is not the case here. As to the finding of the jury being contrary to the evidence, I concur in the observations which H have been made by the noble and learned Earl. I entertain considerable doubt whether there was any evidence to go to the jury. It is unnecessary to determine that point, but of this I feel persuaded from the argument which we have heard, that looking at the evidence which was before the jury they could not honestly and fairly have given any other verdict.

LORD BRAMWELL. I am of opinion that no action for a malicious prosecution will lie against a corporation. I take this opportunity of saying that as directly I and peremptorily as I possibly can; and I think the reasoning is demonstrative. To maintain an action for a malicious prosecution it must be shown that there was an absence of reasonable and probable cause, and that there was malice, or some indirect and illegitimate motive in the prosecutor. A corporation is incapable of malice or of motive. If the whole body of shareholders were to meet, and in so many words to say, "prosecute so and so, not because we believe him guilty, but because it will be for our interest to do it," no action would lie against the corporation, though it would lie against the shareholders who had given such an unbecoming order. If the directors even, by resolution at their board, or by order under the common seal of the company (I am putting the case plainly in A order that there may be no mistake about it), were maliciously, with the view of putting down a solicitor who had assisted others to get damages against them, to order a prosecution against that man, if they did it from an indirect or improper motive no action would lie against the corporation, because the act on the part of the directors would be ultra vires; they would have no authority to do it. They B are only agents of the company; the company acts by them, and they have no authority to bind the company by ordering a malicious prosecution.

I say, therefore, that no action lies, even if you assume the strongest case, namely, that of the very shareholders directing it, or the very directors ordering it, because it is impossible that a corporation can have malice or motive; and it is perfectly immaterial that some subordinate officer or individual, or individuals C of the company, have such malice or motive. In the case which I put, an action would lie against the directors personally who had ordered an improper prosecution. It may be that no action would lie against any subordinate who had malice, and had not ordered or caused or procured the prosecution, because, although the two ingredients existed, which are necessary for the maintenance of such an action, that is to say, malice and the absence of reasonable and probable cause, D yet in the case which I surmise the man would not be a prosecutor, and, unless you find the absence of reasonable and probable cause and malice in him who is the prosecutor, an action is not maintainable. It is not enough, therefore, to show that there was an absence of reasonable and probable cause, and that the subordinate had malice—not that I for a moment suggest that that is the case here.

In my opinion, this is not merely what is commonly called a technical point. E although if a point were untechnical it would be very objectionable. This is a substantial objection, because every one, or every counsel and solicitor listening to me, knows that the only reason why a railway company is selected for an action of this sort is, that a jury would be more likely to give a verdict against a company than against an individual. Everybody knows it, and perhaps there is a sort of hope of confusion; it is said “the man was innocent; somebody ought F to be punished for it; here is a railway company; there was an improper motive”; and so there is a jumble; the case gets before a jury, and a railway company is exactly the party to have damages awarded against it. If ever there was a necessity for protecting persons it is in an action for malicious prosecution, and for two reasons: First of all a prosecutor is a very useful person to the community. We have something in the nature of a public prosecutor, but every- G body knows that the greater number of prosecutions in this country are undertaken not by the state, but by private persons, or, as in this case, corporations.

One may venture to quote BENTHAM even upon this matter. He said that laws would be of very little use if there were no informers, and that it is necessary for the benefit of the public that people when they prosecute, and prosecute duly, should be protected. And there is an additional reason. A man brings an action H for a malicious prosecution; he gives evidence which shows or goes to show that he is innocent. You may tell the jury over and over again that that is not the question, but they never, or very rarely can be got to understand it. They think that it is not right that a man should be prosecuted when he is innocent, and in the end they pay him for it. It is, therefore, all important that these actions should not be permitted to be brought against persons or bodies, or others who are I not properly liable in respect of them. It may be said “Well, but this is rather hard upon a man who has been prosecuted, and improperly prosecuted.” That is to say the corporation is innocent, but its officers are guilty. But the same thing happens in the case of an individual prosecutor. A man receives false information; he prosecutes upon that information. The person who gave him the information is not liable, because he did not prosecute. He may be liable for the untrue statement, because it may be slander, in the same way as he would be liable if he charged an indictable offence against a person, or possibly he may be liable

A for having procured the prosecution; and it may be that, in such a case as this, some of the people employed by the company were actuated by an indirect motive. I do not say that they were—it is impossible to say so; but what I say is, that it is no harder upon a man that he has no remedy against a public company, who has prosecuted him when the servants of the company have been malicious, than B it is that there is no remedy against any individual man who has prosecuted, he having no malice, but somebody who gave him information having malice. It is said that this is an old-fashioned sort of notion. It is; but this opinion is one that I have entertained ever since I have known anything about the law; and, although it is an old-fashioned one, I trust that it is one which will not die out, for reasons which I have given.

C But it is said, “Well, but a variety of actions have been allowed against corporations which did not formerly exist.” I deny it. It is certain a corporation may order a thing to be done which is a trespass, because there the act of those who act for the corporation is not ultra vires. For instance, take the case of false imprisonment. A railway company gives somebody power to take up persons who it believes are doing some wrong to the company. If a person is so authorised, that is an authority which may be unreasonably exercised. You cannot D give an authority maliciously to prosecute, but you may give an authority to take up persons who are cheating a railway company. If that person to whom authority is given makes a mistake, and takes up a person who is not cheating, it may in such a case be said properly to be the act of the company, and they are properly liable. But in that case there is neither malice nor motive in question. So also they may be liable for the publication of a libel. That unfortunate E word “malice” has got into cases of action for libel. We all know that a man may be the publisher of a libel without a particle of malice or improper motive. Therefore, the case is not the same as where actual and real malice is necessary. Take the case where a person may make an untrue statement of a man in writing, not privileged on account of the occasion of its publication, he would be liable F although he had not a particle of malice against the man, so would a corporation. Suppose that a corporation published a newspaper, or printed books, and suppose that it was proved against them that a book so published had been read by an officer of the corporation, in order to see whether it should be published or not, and that it contained a libel, an action lies there, because there is no question of actual malice or ill will or motive.

G For these reasons, which I dwell upon at no greater length, more particularly as counsel for the appellant did not cite any cases upon this point, or go into it at all, I am clearly of opinion that this action does not lie against this company. But, assuming that the difficulty did not exist, there is no absence of reasonable and probable cause in this case. I doubt very much whether CAVE, J., needed to have left to the jury the question whether reasonable care had been H used. I doubt it very much indeed. I doubt very much whether he might not I will not say ought not—to have said to the jury:

“If you are of opinion that these directors honestly believed the statements that were laid before them, and honestly acted upon the opinions that were given to them, there not only was no absence of reasonable and probable cause, but it existed in abundance.”

I However, he did put the question, and the jury did answer it: and it does seem to me, I must say, one of the strongest cases of an unfounded action that ever was brought, even for a malicious prosecution.

LORD FITZGERALD.—I do not intend to make any observation upon the grave question on which my noble and learned friend LORD BRAMWELL has expressed his opinion so forcibly, whether this action lies against a corporation. That question is not now properly before us. We have had no argument upon it, and in the view which your Lordships have taken it is unnecessary for the decision A of the case. I have no doubt that the weighty observations of my noble and learned friend will be instructive in future and will always carry with them that force before any tribunal which they so eminently deserve. But I shall only say of corporations, and of these trading corporations especially, that I have often heard it observed that they certainly are very frequently without conscience and sometimes very malicious. B

To deal with the case as it comes before us, I do not entertain any doubt that the issue upon the question of probable cause, as well as upon the question of malice, lies upon the plaintiff in this sense, that the plaintiff is bound to offer evidence sufficient, if uncontradicted, to sustain both these issues on his behalf.
At the close of the plaintiff's case, supposing it had closed there, and no evidence had been offered directly on behalf of the defendants, was there such a case C upon the two issues as that it could be said that there was evidence to sustain the issues for the plaintiff? I so far differ from the opinion of my noble and learned friend that I think there was evidence upon both issues, if uncontro-verted, from which the jury might have found, and the judge who presided, drawing the proper inference from the facts himself, might have found in the plaintiff's favour. It is unnecessary for me here to point out in detail what that D evidence was. But upon the whole of the evidence produced on both sides, the learned judge put two questions, and, in my opinion, two very proper questions, to the jury for the purpose of informing his mind as to what was the proper inference for the judge to draw upon this very question of the presence or absence of probable cause. The jury answered the two questions in the defendant's E favour, and though possibly I might myself have come to a different conclusion upon the first question, I cannot say that the verdict was an unreasonable one, or so far against the weight of evidence that it ought not to stand. As to the alleged misdirection, I do not think that the summing-up of the learned judge, taken as a whole, and together with the questions he put, could have misled the jury.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE.—My noble and learned friend, LORD BRAMWELL, F has raised a question which has not been argued before your Lordships, a question of the greatest importance, whether it is of the essence of an action of this sort that malice should be proved in a sense not imputable to a corporation. The importance of that question would certainly have led me, before I could arrive satisfactorily at an opinion of my own upon it, to desire to hear it argued. It has not been argued at your Lordships' Bar. It was not, as far as I can see, a G ground of decision in the court below. What has been said by my noble and learned friend, I am sure, will have the weight due to all opinions of his whenever the question comes to be solemnly examined, but I do not think that your Lordships' decision in the present case can properly be regarded as determining that question.

Re MILLS, Ex parte OFFICIAL RECEIVER

Bankruptcy—Fraudulent preference—Need to prove intention of debtor to prefer creditor to whom payment made.

In 1882 the debtor borrowed from W. to buy stock-in-trade and gave two promissory notes which were signed by himself and G. who signed as surety. In January, 1887, the debtor, being insolvent, sold the stock-in-trade at valuation, and at the debtor's request the purchaser paid the sum due to W. The payment so made was not intended to give W. a preference, but to benefit G., the surety. On April 22, 1887, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against the debtor and subsequently a receiving order was made. The official receiver claimed the sum paid to W., as being a fraudulent preference within s. 48 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [now Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 44].

Held: in order to make it a payment made "... with a view to giving ... a preference" within s. 48 of the Act of 1883, there must be an intent in the mind of the debtor at the time of making the payment to prefer the particular creditor to whom the payment was made, and, therefore, the payment to W. having been made to benefit the surety and not to prefer W., was not a fraudulent preference within s. 48.

Notes. Fraudulent preference was extended to include a payment to a creditor in order to prefer a surety or guarantor by insertion of the words "or any surety or guarantor for the debt due to such creditor" (by s. 27, Sched. 2 (repealed) of the Bankruptcy and Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1913), as an amendment to s. 48 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which has now been replaced by s. 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914: see 2 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 381. Although the law in this case has been altered, by the extension mentioned, it is considered that a report of it will be useful as showing that an "intention to prefer" is necessary and also as showing the early statutory law: see *Re Conley, Ex parte Trustee v. Appeal (by the official receiver) from a decision of the Divisional Court (CAVE and A. L. SMITH, JJ.), affirming a decision of the county court judge at Oldham refusing to set aside a payment as a fraudulent preference.

In 1882 the debtor, Mills, borrowed from Whittaker £260, to buy the stock-in-trade of a hotel, and gave him two promissory notes, one for £200, the other for £60, which were signed by himself and by Greenwood, who signed as surety.

In January, 1887, the debtor was insolvent, and desired to give up his tenancy of the hotel. Roberts agreed to become tenant in his place, and a valuation was made of the stock-in-trade, the amount of which was £223 12s. 9d. Roberts gave a cheque for that amount to the valuer, who handed it to Whittaker at the request of the debtor. On April 22, 1887, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against the debtor, and a receiving order subsequently made. The official receiver claimed in the bankruptcy repayment of the £223 12s. 9d. by Whittaker. The county court judge found as a fact that the payment of that sum by the debtor was not made with a view of giving Whittaker a preference, but with a view of easing Greenwood, the surety to the promissory notes. The official receiver appealed.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that Marshall v. Lamb (1) is distinguishable from the present case. It was decided before there was any statutory definition of fraudulent preference; but I am not going to rely upon that or to say that the question as to whether there has been a fraudulent preference is a different question since the statute from what it was before, because I am of opinion that it was always left to the jury to say whether the payment was made with the intention of preferring the particular creditor. In the face of the finding of the county court judge it would be impossible to say that there had been a fraudulent preference in the present case without going directly contrary to the decision in Re Goldsmid, Ex parte Taylor (2). That case decided that there must be a finding as to the debtor's intent in making the payment, his intent being that which was in his mind at the time. The question is, was the payment made with intent to prefer the particular creditor to whom it was made? It is not within s. 48 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, if the debtor pays one creditor in order to benefit another. Still less is it within s. 48 if he pays a creditor with intent to benefit someone else who is not a creditor. In the present case, the debtor made a payment to Whittaker. The county court judge has found that in making that payment, he did not intend to benefit Whittaker, but intended to benefit Greenwood. To hold that that was a fraudulent preference would be to come to a decision in direct conflict with that in Re Goldsmid, Ex parte Taylor (2) and to do what the court says in that case cannot be done, namely, to strike out from s. 48 the words, "with a view of giving such creditor a preference over the other creditors."

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. A payment was made by the debtor in favour of Whittaker within three months before he was adjudged bankrupt. The county court judge has found that the payment was not made with a view of giving Whittaker a preference over the other creditors, but with a view of benefiting Greenwood, the surety. Greenwood was not a creditor of the debtor at all. It was held in Re Goldsmid, Ex parte Taylor (2) that a payment, in order to amount to a fraudulent preference, must be made with a view of giving a preference to the creditor to whom it was made. We could not hold the payment in this case to be a fraudulent preference without contravening the decision in Re Goldsmid, Ex parte Taylor (2). In that case, LINDLEY, L.J., said (18 Q.B.D. at p. 301):

"Regard must be had to the view with which the payment was made. It was urged that it is sufficient if the creditor was actually preferred. That would be to strike out from s. 48 [Bankruptcy Act, 1883], the words 'with a view of giving such creditor a preference over the other creditors.'"

I entirely agree with the decision in that case. It is immaterial whether the statute has altered the earlier law on the subject; the question has now to be decided upon its words whether it has, or has not, altered the law.

LOPES, L.J.—The finding of the county court judge, and the decision in Re Goldsmid, Ex parte Taylor (2), dispose of this case. I expressed my view as to the construction of the statute in Re Goldsmid, Ex parte Taylor (2) (18 Q.B.D. at p. 302), and I have no desire to repeat it.

Appeal dismissed.

Will—Gift—Limited gift—Illegal limitation—Gift to sister “during such period as she may live apart from her husband”—Gift terminable on resumption of cohabitation.

The testator gave all his property on trust, after payment of debts, to pay his sister M. “during such time as she may live apart from her husband before my son attains the age of twenty-one years, £2 10s. per week for her maintenance while so living apart from her husband”, and on trust to pay one moiety of the trust estate to his son on attaining twenty-one and the other moiety on his attaining twenty-five. M. and her husband had lived together since their marriage before the date of the will and until sometime after the testator’s death. The son was still under twenty-one.

Held: the gift of the weekly payments was not a gift of an annuity subject to a condition, but was a limited gift, the commencement and duration of which were fixed in a way which the law did not allow; and M. was not entitled to the weekly payments.

Appeal by Mrs. Maconochie, sister of the testator and a legatee, from a decision of KAY, J., on a summons taken out by the trustee of the will to determine, whether a gift to Mrs. Maconochie in the will was wholly void as being inseparable from a condition which was contra bonos mores and, therefore, illegal, or whether the illegal condition could be separated from the gift so as to enable the court to declare that there was a good gift coupled with a void condition which could be rejected without destroying the gift itself. KAY, J., held that the gift was not given on a condition, but was a limited gift, the limits of which the court had no power to alter, and that Mrs. Maconochie was not entitled to the weekly payments comprised in the gift.

By his will, the testator, John Moore gave all his property to a trustee upon trust, after payment of debts,

“to pay to my sister Mary Maconochie during such time as she may live apart from her husband, before my son attains the age of twenty-one years, the sum of £2 10s. per week for her maintenance while so living apart from her husband,” and upon trust as to one moiety of the trust estate to be paid to his son on attaining twenty-one, and as to the other moiety to be paid to him on attaining twenty-five. The will contained a gift of residue. At the date of the will Mrs. Maconochie had been married for some years, and had lived with her husband up to the date of these proceedings. The testator's son was still under the age of twenty-one.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 9, 1888. COTTON, L.J.—The question we have to decide is, whether the trustee of the will of Mr. John Moore ought to pay the sum of £2 10s.

per week to Mrs. Maconochie, a sister of the testator. [HIS LORDSHIP read the gift in the will, and continued:] When the will was made Mrs. Maconochie was living with her husband, and continued to do so until after the testator's death. The testator did not like the husband, and his apparent object was to induce the wife to live separate from him. If so, the gift was for a purpose which is contrary to the law of England, for that law does not allow provisions made in contemplation of a future separation between husband and wife. Mrs. Maconochie contends that the gift is to operate as a direction that £2 10s. per week shall be paid to her from the death of the testator, though she is living with her husband, thus entirely altering the amount of the gift made to her by the testator. She contends that the gift is a gift of personalty, subject to an illegal condition precedent, and that, according to the doctrine of the civil law which has been adopted by our land as to personal legacies, the illegal condition may be rejected, leaving the gift absolute.

The rule is thus stated in JARMAN ON WILLS (4th Edn.), vol. 2, p. 12 [see (8th Edn., 1951), vol. 2, at p. 1457] :

"But with respect to legacies out of personal estate, the civil law which in this respect has been adopted by courts of equity differs in some respects from the common law in its treatment of conditions precedent, the rule of the civil law being that where a condition precedent is originally impossible, or is made so by the act or default of the testator, or is illegal as involving malum prohibitum, the bequest is absolute just as if the condition had been subsequent. But when the performance of the condition is the sole motive of the bequest, or its impossibility was unknown to the testator, or has since become impossible by the act of God, or where it is illegal as involving malum in se, in these cases the civil agrees with the common law in holding both gift and condition void."

According to English law, if a condition subsequent which is to defeat an estate is against the policy of the law, the gift is absolute; but if the illegal condition is precedent there is no gift. In the civil law a distinction is taken between what is malum in se and what is only malum prohibitum; but in the view I take of this case we need not consider within which of these two classes the restriction in the present case falls. Are the words relating to living separate a condition? In my opinion, they are not a condition, but a part of the limitation, and although in some respects a condition and a limitation may have the same effect, yet in English law there is a great distinction between them. If you give effect to Mrs. Maconochie's contention, you give her what the testator never intended to give her, an annuity during the whole of her life, if the son is so long under age. It is wrong to give to an expression a forced construction in order to prevent a particular result that follows from the natural construction. The construction does not depend on the civil law, and the civil law is binding only so far as it has been adopted by our courts. I, therefore, do not enter into the question whether the civil law regards this as a condition or a limitation, for if it regards it as a limitation, and yet applies the same rule to it as to a condition, no authority has been cited to show that the civil law has been followed here to that extent.

Many authorities have been cited, but it has not been laid down in any of them that a gift in this form is to be treated as a gift upon condition. In Tennant v. Braie (1), upon the fair construction of the words, the gift was a gift upon condition, not a limited gift. A sum was to be paid once for all if a woman was divorced. There was nothing imposing a limit on the duration of the gift. In Brown v. Peck (2) the report is not clear, either as regards the facts or the principle laid down. The testator, after noticing that his niece had married without the consent of her mother, directed that if she lived with her husband his executors should pay her £2 per month and no more, but if she lived from him and with her mother then they should allow her £5 per month. LORD HENLEY treated this as a condition, for he says (1 Eden, at p. 142):

“The condition annexed being both impossible at the time of imposing it, and contra bonos mores, the legacy was simple and pure.”

What was meant by “impossible,” it is hard to say, but that is not material. All that is of importance is that it was treated as a condition, and the words could reasonably be so construed.

Wren v. Bradley (3) occasions more difficulty. There was first a gift of an annuity to the testator’s daughter, subject to conditions which were contra bonos mores. Then there was a gift of the income of one-third of an accumulated fund to the same daughter “during such time as she shall continue to live apart from her said husband Abraham Wren,” and then came a condition in the form of a subsequent condition, that if she should at any time cohabit with her husband, then during such time as she should cohabit with him the income should be paid to other persons. It was proved that at the date of the will she was living apart from her husband. KNIGHT BRUCE, V.-C., appears to have been impressed by that, and to have looked at the gift of the income as an immediate gift of it to the wife, subject to a proviso that if she returned to cohabitation the trust for payment to her should cease. I think this was the real ground of his decision, though he does not clearly state his reasons. I think his view must have been that, she being at the time separated from her husband, the gift was a simple gift to her with a subsequent condition defeating it if she returned to cohabitation.

If that construction of the will be adopted as correct, there is no difficulty about the decision, for as to the annuity the rule of the civil law clearly applied. None of the cases, in my judgment, warrants our applying it here, and, in my opinion, KAY, J., came to a correct conclusion. The gift here is not a gift of an annuity subject to a condition, but a limited gift, the commencement and duration of which are fixed in a way which the law does not allow.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. At the date of the will the testator’s sister was living with her husband. The testator directs his trustees to pay to her during such time as she may live apart from her husband before the testator’s son attains twenty-one, £2 10s. per week for her maintenance while so living apart from her husband. There can be no question that the object of this gift was to promote separation—an object which is against the policy of the law—and KAY, J., has decided that the gift is bad.

The argument for Mrs. Maconochie was twofold. First, she contended that the condition was subsequent and might be rejected, leaving the gift absolute; secondly, that if it was a condition precedent, this being a gift out of pure personalty, the doctrine of the civil law applied, and the gift was absolute, for which Harvey v. Lady Aston (4) and Reynish v. Martin (5) were referred to, where LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., states the rule of the civil law and the extent to which our courts have adopted it. There is a great distinction in our law between conditions precedent and subsequent. LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., in Reynish v. Martin (5) says (3 Atk. at p. 332):

“The civil law considering the condition whether precedent or subsequent as unlawful and absolutely void, the legacy stands pure and simple. But in our law where the condition is precedent the legatary takes nothing till the condition is performed, and consequently has no right to come and demand the legacy. But it is otherwise where the condition is subsequent, for in that case the legatary has a right, and the court will decree him the legacy; but this difference only holds where the legacy is a charge on the real assets, and, therefore, if this had been merely a personal legacy I should have been of opinion that as the marriage without consent would not have precluded Mary of her right to this legacy in the ecclesiastical court, no more

A would it have done so here, and to this purpose several cases were cited which are taken notice of in the case of Harvey v. Lady Aston (4), and which I shall not repeat, but refer to that case for them."

Accepting that as law with respect to legacies of personal estate on a condition, the question remains whether this is a legacy on a condition. If not, then, unless
B it can be shown that the rule of the civil law extends to limitations as well as to conditions, and that our law has adopted it to that extent, the rule cannot apply. Is there here a condition? In one sense the gift does contain a condition; but it contains something more than either a condition precedent or a condition subsequent, and must be held to create a limitation. If the subject of gift here had been real estate this would have been a limitation, not a condition—
C just as a gift to a woman dum sola vixerit is a conditional limitation, not a condition. But why should that be held to be a condition in the case of personalty which is not so in the case of realty? Here the sister's living apart from her husband is the measure of the gift to her, and if that be taken away the quantum of the gift is altered. This was the ground taken by KAY, J. No authority has been cited to show that limitations are treated by the civil law
D in the same way as conditions; but if they were, it would not follow that they should be so treated in our courts. This is a gift which begins when the sister begins to live apart from her husband, continues while she lives apart from him, and comes to an end when she ceases to live apart from him.

As regards the cases cited, Tennant v. Braie (1) is a clear case of a gift upon condition, though it is so meagrely reported that I should hesitate before acting E upon it. Brown v. Peck (2) appears to have been compromised after an expression of opinion by the court. Wren v. Bradley (3) is a peculiar case. There were two gifts, the first of which was clearly a gift on condition; the second gift is more difficult. I think that KNIGHT BRUCE, V.-C., considered the context of the will to throw light on the second gift, and to lead to the conclusion that it was a gift to a woman who was at the time living separate from her husband, with a condition defeating F it if she returned to cohabitation.

The cases, therefore, do not support the view that the doctrine of the civil law is to be extended to limitations, and, in my opinion, the judge below came to a right conclusion. One regrets taking away a dead man's bounty from the object of it under the very circumstances in which he intended her to have it, but we must not depart from the law.

Appeal by the plaintiff, Palmer, from a decision of STEPHEN, J., at the trial of an action without a jury, to recover £142 10s., the price of thirty shares in the National Conservative Industrial Dwellings Association, Ltd., in which the Founders Association was non suited and judgment was given for the defendant against the plaintiff.

In September, 1885, the defendant, Clarke, through his brokers upon the London Stock Exchange, sold to the London Founders Association thirty shares in the National Conservative Industrial Dwellings Association, according to the rules and regulations of the Stock Exchange. In accordance with those regulations, the Founders Association nominated the plaintiff, Palmer, as the transferee of the shares, and the transfer was accordingly executed by the defendant in the name of the plaintiff. The transfer and share certificates were then handed over by the defendant to the plaintiff, who at the same time paid the defendant the purchase money. The directors of the National Conservative Industrial Dwellings Association subsequently declined to accept the plaintiff's name as the transferee of the shares, and to register him as a member of the company. By the articles of association the directors had power either to register, or decline to register, as a member any person claiming by transfer of a share or shares.

H. F. Dickens and W. E. Gordon for the plaintiff.

Horne-Payne, Q.C., and A. G. McIntyre for the defendant, were not called on to argue.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case a contract was made on the Stock Exchange with regard to shares in a limited company. By its articles of association the company had the option of declining to register any person as a shareholder of the company. The contract in question was made through brokers on the Stock Exchange, but I shall treat the case as if the dispute was one between the parties who instructed the brokers. The plaintiff was the purchaser of the shares, the defendant was the seller of them. The contract having been made, a transfer of the shares was executed and handed over to the purchaser, and thereupon, according to the usage of the Stock Exchange, the price was paid by him. Afterwards the transfer was taken to the company, who, in the exercise of the power given in the articles of association, declined to accept the name of the transferee, whether rightly or wrongly is immaterial. Then the plaintiff brings an action to recover the price of the shares, and endeavours to maintain the proposition that, although it must be admitted that the contract was for payment of the price of the shares when the transfer was handed over to the purchaser, and that that handing over is an act which was to be done, and was done before the transfer was taken to the company to register, it is nevertheless an implied term of the contract that, if the company for any reason refuse to register the transfer, the contract must be considered at an end and the price is recoverable, upon the ground that the condition subsequent not having happened the whole consideration has failed.

That proposition raises two questions: First, whether there was such a condition subsequent; secondly, whether the consideration has failed. I shall not express any opinion upon the second question, whether the consideration would have failed, if there had been such a condition subsequent, because I think it would be now absolutely wrong to throw any doubt whatever as to what the answer to the first question is, viz., that in a contract such as this made on the Stock Exchange, there is no such implied condition subsequent as is suggested. The contention is that the vendor of shares on the Stock Exchange does contract absolutely that the purchaser or his nominee shall be accepted by the company. In 1859, that very point came before the Court of Queen's Bench in Stray v. Russell (1), and the judgment of the court was given upon it, and that judgment, until reversed, is binding upon everyone. Wilkinson v. Lloyd (2) was cited and relied upon by counsel for the plaintiff in that case, and thereupon LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., said (1 E. & E. at p. 897) :

"You have to show that the vendor here was equally bound as was the vendor in that case to obtain the directors' consent."

The very point, therefore, had to be decided by the Court of Queen's Bench in that case. The court pointed out the distinction between the circumstances of the case before them and the circumstances in Wilkinson v. Lloyd (2), and held that the plaintiff had failed to show that the vendor was bound to obtain the directors' consent as he was in Wilkinson v. Lloyd (2).

What do they say in their judgments? LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., says (1 E. & E. at p. 900) :

"Here the purchase of shares in a joint-stock banking company was made at the request of the plaintiff by a broker on the Stock Exchange in London, and must be considered as made with reference to all the established usages of the Stock Exchange. According to these usages the price of the shares is payable on the one broker handing over to the other the transfers and certificates. What does the vendor contract to sell and deliver? Genuine transfers and certificates, with the interest and rights which they convey. There might be a condition subsequent imposing on the vendor the onus of procuring the consent of the directors to the transfer, but I find no evidence of such a condition."

That gives a direct negative to what counsel for the plaintiffs has been arguing in this case. CROMPTON, J., says (ibid. at p. 912) :

"I am not satisfied that the contract was such as the plaintiff must make it out to be in order to treat the supposed breach of it by the defendant as amounting to a case of total failure of consideration, or that the plaintiff lost the whole consideration and got nothing for his money by reason of the defendant's breach of the contract, or that the money was paid in ignorance of the facts. In the first place, I am not satisfied that, according to the contract, the defendant engaged that the banking company should accept the plaintiff as a member of the copartnership. By the contract, as explained by the usage of the Stock Exchange, the name was to be given on a certain day, so that the vendor might get the transfer made out to the vendee or to his nominee, and he was then to hand over the transfers and certificates of shares, and to receive his money, and there is nothing that satisfies me that anything more was to be done by the vendor. . . . The fact of the payment being to be made on the handing over of the certificates and transfers, and the practice stated as to no prior consent being ever asked for, and as to no assent being ever refused, make it very probable that the vendee in such case bargains only for the delivery of the shares and transfers, and takes the chance of getting himself or his nominee or sub-vendee accepted and registered."

Then he states Wilkinson v. Lloyd (2). In that case, he says (1 E. & E. at p. 914) :

"the court assumed that the consent to the assignment was a part of the vendor's title, as in the case of the sale of a lease; but whatever may have been the case of the purchase of the partnership shares in the mines (real property to some extent) in that case, on a sale between the parties, not according to any course of business on the Stock Exchange, I can make no such assumption in the present case, where the sale was according to the regulations of the Stock Exchange, which made the price payable on handing over the shares and transfers, and according to which it is at least probable that the vendee was to take upon himself the duty of getting the transfers completed and the shares registered, and where from the nature of the transaction it seems to be very unlikely that the vendor should undertake for the acceptance of any particular name or person, when he may have been entirely ignorant at the time of the contract of the name and responsibility of the intended transferee."

There the court was asked to say that something was to be implied in the contract which was not in it; and they acted on the rule that you cannot bring anything into a contract by implication unless it is absolutely certain that both parties contracted on that basis. It was for that reason that they put their judgment in the form in which they did. They said that it was not likely that the vendor would undertake for the acceptance of any particular name or person of whom he might be entirely ignorant. Unless you can say that it is certain that both parties intended it, you cannot imply such an undertaking. That case is a decision as to the construction of a contract of daily mercantile habit, so that, even if we could say that we did not agree with it, we would not, forty years afterwards, set it aside, when all subsequent contracts must have been made with reference to it. It is idle to say that the decision was not known on the Stock Exchange. Therefore, even if we thought it wrong we should not overrule it.

But I myself think that the view taken by the Court of Queen's Bench was confirmed by the Exchequer Chamber. WILLIAMS, J., in delivering the judgment, said (1 E. & E. at p. 917):

"We all think that, construing the contract in this case by the usage of the Stock Exchange, subject to which it was made, there was no undertaking by the vendor of the shares to obtain absolutely the consent of the directors to the transfer."

That seems to me to be accepting the very ground of the doctrine upon which the judgment in the Queen's Bench proceeded, and to negative what was argued in that case, and has been argued before us in this, on behalf of the plaintiff. I have no doubt that the seller must do nothing to prevent the buyer being accepted by the company. I do not say whether in such a case an action like this would be the right form of proceeding. There is not a trace here of anything of the kind. I do not think anything turns on the provision in the articles of association of the company as to the power of the directors to refuse to register. If there was no such provision, an action by the purchaser might lie against the company for refusing to register, but as between vendor and purchaser it would be immaterial. The purchaser takes the risk, not the vendor. The vendor has fulfilled his responsibility when he has handed to the purchaser the transfer and certificates in proper form, and has done nothing to prevent the registration of the purchaser.

I may say this, that if we had differed from the reasons of the decision in Stray v. Russell (1), considering this question merely as a matter of business, I should still have come to the same conclusion. I think that it would be a most unbusiness-like proceeding for a man to receive money with a condition subsequent that he would hand it back on something happening over which he had no control. I do not think that that is an agreement which would be entered into by business men. And, therefore, this is the strongest case possible against making the implication that there was such a term in the contract. But I say again that we should not now overrule Stray v. Russell (1), even if we disagreed with it. For these reasons I think the appeal must be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—I agree that this appeal should be dismissed. The question is : What A was the real nature of the contract entered into in this case? The contract was for the sale and purchase of certain shares, subject to the rules of the Stock Exchange.
The shares in question were delivered to the purchaser prior to the transfer being registered. By the articles of association the directors of the company had power to refuse to register the transfer, and they did so refuse. Counsel for the plaintiff contended that the true nature of such a contract is that the purchaser agreeing B to pay the purchase money, the vendor agrees that the purchaser shall become the registered owner of the shares. On the other hand, it may be said that the true nature of the contract is that the vendor agrees that, on payment of the purchase money, he will deliver to the purchaser a genuine transfer and certificates, “with the interest and rights which they convey,” as was said by LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., in Stray v. Russell (1) (1 E. & E. at p. 900), and without any condition subsequent, C on the happening of which the purchase money is to be returned. There appears to be every reason for supposing, from the practice of the Stock Exchange, that the latter, not the former, is the true construction of the contract. The practice is, that on a certain day the name of the proposed transferee shall be given, and that upon delivery of the executed transfer payment shall be made of the price.
The execution of the transfer and the payment of the price are both prior to the D refusal of registration. That is strong to show that all which the vendor undertook to do was to be done prior to the exercise of the power of the directors as to accepting or refusing the name of the purchaser. In other words, the fact that the purchase money passes prior to the event happening, is very strong to show that the purchaser does not contract with reference to that event. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that the argument of counsel for the plaintiff fails. E

But we have in addition a decision of the Court of Queen’s Bench, thirty-nine years ago, upon the same question, which we should be very unwilling to disturb.
Counsel for the plaintiff has pressed upon us certain analogies, which show, as he contends, that Stray v. Russell (1) was wrongly decided. He has suggested the case of a landlord who has refused his consent to the assignment of a lease. But in that F case the consent of the landlord must be obtained before the assignment can be made. The landlord’s consent is signified before any money is paid by the assignee to the assignor. The condition in that case is a condition precedent to the assignment, and happens before payment of the price. In the present case the condition is not a condition precedent, and does not happen till after the payment of the price. So, in Wilkinson v. Lloyd (2), there were clauses in the deed of settlement G of the company whose shares were in question, providing that the board of directors should certify their approbation of any person to whom it might be proposed to assign any share, and that then, and not till then, the person desirous of assigning such share should be at liberty to assign the same; and the Court of Queen’s Bench held that the approval of the directors was a condition precedent to the assignor’s power to assign.

It appears to me, on these grounds, that the contention of the plaintiff with regard H to the nature of the contract fails, and, therefore, it is immaterial to consider the question whether, if there had been such a breach of contract as alleged, the consideration could be considered to have totally failed.

LOPES, L.J.—This case raises the question as to the liability of a vendor in I respect of shares in a company bought and sold on the Stock Exchange, where the directors of the company, having the right to refuse or accept the purchaser’s name, refuse it. It is the undoubted duty of the transferor of shares on the Stock Exchange to execute the transfer, and he can be compelled to pay all calls that are outstanding at the time of the transfer; but it is said that there is a further duty on his part. It is said that there is an obligation on his part to obtain the consent of the directors to the registration of the transfer, and that if he cannot obtain the insertion of the transferee’s name on the register of the company, the

A whole transaction is defeated. I can see no trace of such a condition subsequent. Stray v. Russell (1) is a clear authority that the vendor of the shares is not under any liability to procure the consent of the directors to the transfer or the registration of the transferee. For these reasons I think that the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

E Insurance—Accident insurance—Accident “within the United Kingdom”—Death by accident in Jersey—Condition—Condition precedent—Notice of accident—Notice to be given within stipulated time.

A policy of insurance provided that, if the assured sustained bodily injury caused by any external accident happening within the United Kingdom or on the continent of Europe and if the assured should die from the effects of such accident, the insurers would pay his legal representatives the sum stipulated. The policy was subject to certain conditions endorsed on and incorporated in it, one such condition being that “in case of fatal accident, notice thereof must be given to the [insurers] . . . within seven days.” The assured died in Jersey from an accident sustained there, and it was impossible to give notice within seven days.

G Held: (i) Jersey was within the United Kingdom within the meaning of the policy; (ii) the giving of notice within seven days was not a condition precedent to the right of recovery; and, therefore, the insurers were liable on the policy.

Gamble v. Accident Assurance Co., Ltd. (1869), I.R. 4 C.L. 204; 29 Digest (Repl.) 443, *1284.

Action upon an accident insurance policy by the personal representative of the assured, whose death had taken place in Jersey and had been caused by an external accident sustained there.

The policy stated that if the assured should, during the period in which the policy was in force, sustain any bodily injury caused by any external accident happening to the assured within the United Kingdom, or on the continent of Europe, or while proceeding from one European port to another in a decked vessel, and if the assured should die solely from the effects of such accident within ninety days after the happening thereof, the company would pay to the legal representatives or the assigns of the assured the sum of £1,000 at the expiration of three calendar months after satisfactory proof of the death of the assured had been given to the company. The policy was subject to certain conditions endorsed upon it, which were to be considered as incorporated. Among such conditions were the following :

Notice of the death of the assured was not given to the company within seven days, and it would have been impossible to have given such notice within such time, by reason of the suddenness of the death of the assured, and by reason of the accident not having come to the knowledge of any person who could identify him until after the expiration of seven days. The defendants refused to pay, and pleaded (inter alia) that notice had not been given to the company of the death of the assured within seven days of the occurrence thereof, and that it was not alleged that the death or injury sustained by the assured had happened within the United Kingdom or on the continent of Europe, or while proceeding from one European port to another in a decked vessel. The case came before the court upon an order to set down for hearing before the trial of the action the points of law raised by the pleadings, namely, that Jersey was not within the United Kingdom within the meaning of the policy, and that notice to the company within seven days after a fatal accident was a condition precedent to the right of recovery upon the policy.

Arthur Cohen, Q.C., and Wood-Hill for the defendant company.

MATHEW, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment must be for the plaintiff in this case. The pleadings appear to be old-fashioned and irregular, but I think the parties knew well what sort of questions they wished to submit to the court. One of the questions intended to be submitted to us is whether Jersey, in popular language, can be said to be within the United Kingdom. If it is, it is within the policy, and one of the places to which it is intended to apply. I have no hesitation in saying that it is within the United Kingdom, and therefore within the policy. I am unable to give any other answer. No reasons were given in argument on either side, but in my opinion it cannot reasonably be suggested that the policy is not intended to cover an accident occurring in Jersey.

The other point raised is one of greater importance, and it is whether the condition endorsed upon the policy, to the effect that in case of fatal accident notice thereof must be given to the defendant company at the head office in London within seven days, is a condition precedent to the right of recovering the sum in respect of which the insurance was effected. Was the condition inserted with that intention, and was it so understood? That is a question of pure construction, and necessitates the language of the policy being examined. No cases exactly identical with the present one have been cited by the counsel on either side. In some of the cases it was agreed between the parties that such a term was to be considered a condition precedent. If that was agreed, of course it was treated as such, but if no such agreement was made, the court must see if it was intended, looking at all the terms of the policy. In this

A case the obligation contained in the policy is that, if the assured shall die solely from the effects of an external accident within ninety days after the happening thereof, the company shall pay to the legal representatives or assigns of the assured the sum of £1,000 at the expiration of three calendar months after satisfactory proof of the death of the assured shall have been given to the company. Then follows a clause to the effect that the policy shall be 3 subject to the conditions endorsed upon the back, which are to be considered as incorporated. It does not say that they are to be considered conditions precedent, but as "incorporated herein." The duty upon us is to say what the whole of these conditions mean.

Some of them are referred to as terms of the policy, but not as conditions precedent. For instance, there is a clause which says that :

"For the purpose of identifying the assured, in all cases of change of residence or occupation, or change of name, whether by marriage or otherwise, due notice thereof shall be given by the assured at the company's offices in London."

D Is that a condition precedent? I do not think it is intended to be, and it is not so stated to be. The next clause says that :

"If the assured shall, during the period covered by this policy, engage in any other occupation or employment involving a greater risk than is contemplated in the class of risks under which this policy is effected, he shall E forthwith give notice thereof to the company, and pay such extra premiums as may be required in respect of such increased risk, and in default of his so doing, this policy shall become absolutely void, and the premium paid for the same shall be forfeited to the company."

The language there shows plainly that the company knew how to describe a term which was to be a condition precedent. Another term of the policy says that :

"Any question arising under, or in relation to, this policy, shall, if required by the company or the assured, or his representatives or assigns, be referred to the decision of two referees or an umpire to be appointed by the referees."

G If the assured refused so to refer, would the policy be void, or, if the company refused, could they get rid of their liability? That, in my opinion, is a stipulation which must be regarded as a mere term, and not as a condition precedent.

Then we come to the clause which says, that :

"In case of fatal accident, notice thereof must be given to the company at the head office in London within the time of seven days."

H That is intended to apply, counsel for the defendant company argues, either to an accident which is fatal instantaneously, or to an accident which is followed at an interval by death. Counsel had to admit that such a construction, in many cases, would render it an honour policy, that is, one which the company could pay or not as it thought fit. Notice within seven days is not stated to be a condition of liability, nor is it stated that in default of such notice the policy shall become void. We must then consider whether the assured so understood it. If it was the intention of the company that it should be a condition precedent, it ought to have been couched in clearer language. The absence of such notice might cause the company to incur extra expense, and in such a case the assured would have to make that good. I am satisfied that such a construction as is contended for by the defendant company would be absurd. The term is not a condition precedent to the enforcement of the policy, and, therefore, our judgment must be for the plaintiff.

CAYE, J.—I am of the same opinion. On the first point I am clearly of A opinion that Jersey is in the United Kingdom within the meaning of the policy. Light is thrown upon this point by the terms of the policy. One of the conditions says that:

that is, it shall be in force in Europe. It is quite obvious that the policy is to be void only if the assured goes beyond Europe. Jersey is in Europe, and, in my judgment, it is in the United Kingdom as far as this policy is concerned.

Then, as to the other question. There are a number of conditions of C assurance endorsed upon the policy, and one says that:

“in case of fatal accident, notice thereof must be given to the company within seven days from the occurrence thereof.”

That is said to be a condition precedent, rendering the policy with which we are now dealing void. These conditions are of different kinds. Some contain provisions which, if not complied with, render the policy void or not payable; others contain no such condition at all. The obvious and only rational conclusion is that they mean what they say. Where the provision is said to be a condition precedent, it is so; where it is not said to be so, it is not. An honour policy, in my judgment, is next door to a fraud, and I should recommend the public to have nothing to do with them. Nothing is more monstrous, in my judgment, than such a policy. I am of opinion that there is nothing in this case to lead to the conclusion that these conditions are conditions precedent, except where they are expressed so to be. There is no such expression in the condition which we are now considering. Judgment must, therefore, be for the plaintiff on these preliminary questions.

Judgment for plaintiff.

Re LORD SUDELEY'S SETTLED ESTATES

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Kay, J.), December 12, 1887]

Settled Land—Improvement—Application of capital money—Drainage—Loan—Repayment—Instalments representing capital and interest—Application of capital for payment of such portion of the instalments as represented capital.

On the application of the tenant for life in possession of settled estates under a will the Inclosure Commissioners, by an order dated May 15, 1879, charged the estates with payment to the improvement company of an annual rentcharge of £176 13s. payable half-yearly for a term of twenty-five years, being a proportionate repayment of a capital sum of £2,704, borrowed for

A drainage improvements on the estates, with interest at $4\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. On a summons by the tenant for life asking that it might be declared that money in the hands of the trustees (being capital money or money applicable as capital money arising under the Settled Land Act, 1882) might properly be applied in payment of the instalments, and that the trustees be directed to pay the instalments,

B Held: as no injury would result to the remainderman and as the improvements came within the Settled Land Act, 1882, the trustees were justified in applying capital money in their hands in paying such portion of the instalments as represented capital, but it was the duty of the tenant for life to keep down the interest.

C Notes. Section 25 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, has been replaced with amendments by s. 83 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, and s. 21 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and the Settled Land Acts (Amendment) Act, 1887, have been replaced with amendments by s. 73 of the Settled Land Act, 1925: see 23 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 161, 186.

Adjourned Summons by Lord Sudeley, tenant for life of settled estates, including the Toddington Estate in the county of Gloucester, under the will of the late Lord Sudeley, the testator, asking for a declaration that money in the hands of the trustees (being capital money or money applicable as capital money arising under the Settled Land Act, 1882) might properly be applied in payment of instalments payable under the head of proportionate repayments of the loan in the table annexed to the improvement loan charge, No. 2374, dated May 15, 1879, and that the trustees might be directed to pay the instalments, commencing with the instalment of £44 2s. 10d. payable on Mar. 25, 1888.

G By an order, No. 2374, dated May 15, 1879, made on the application of the tenant for life concerning a loan of £2,704 for land drainage improvement of the Toddington Estate, the Inclosure Commissioners, in pursuance of the Lands Improvements Company's Acts, charged the estates with an annual rentcharge of £176 13s. payable half-yearly on Mar. 25 and Sept. 25, for a term of twenty-five years computed from Mar. 25, 1879, and being a proportionate repayment, according to the table annexed, of the capital sum of £2,704 with interest at $4\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. per annum, the first half-yearly payment to be made on Sept. 25, 1879. The table gave the proportionate repayment in each of the twenty-five years, the total payment in each year being £176 13s., or £88 6s. 6d. half yearly, the proportionate repayments of the capital increasing each year, while the proportionate repayments of the interest decreased as the capital was paid off. Thus: September 25, 1879, repayment as to the loan £30 17s. 8d., interest £57 9s. 2d.; I March 25, 1904, repayment as to the loan £86 9s. 9d.; interest £1 16s. 9d.

The remainderman was an infant and was not served with the summons but the trustees were served.

Haldane for the tenant for life.

KAY, J.—I think it may be done, assuming that the improvements which have been made come within the improvements authorised by the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 21 and s. 25. That being so, the words of the Settled Land Acts (Amendment) Act, 1887, justify the trustees in applying capital money in their hands, or which may come into their hands in paying such portion of the yearly instalments as represent in each case the capital, but I do not think it right that they should from time to time pay the interest of the unpaid portion. It is the duty of the tenant for life to keep down the interest, and I do not think that the Act of 1887 relieved him of it. It is going rather far to relieve the tenant for life from paying capital money for drainage improvements. Everyone who has any knowledge of agricultural affairs in England knows that drainage improvement is one which wears out, and every now and then has to be done over again. But drainage is included in the improvements authorised by the terms of the Settled Land Act, 1882, it is one of the special improvements allowed by the Act of 1887 to be paid out of capital. I think, therefore, that the remainderman will not be injured by payment of the instalments of capital any more than the Acts intended him to be injured, if any injury does result.

Order accordingly.

WALKER AND OTHERS v. MIDLAND RAIL. CO.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (The Earl of Selborne, Lord Bramwell, Lord Watson, Lord FitzGerald and Lord Ashbourne), March 4, 5, 26, 1886]

Inn—Safety of guests—Innkeeper's duty of care—Limitation to places in the inn to which guests may be reasonably supposed to be likely to go.

Per the EARL OF SELBORNE: The general duty of an innkeeper to take proper care for the safety of his guests does not extend to every room in his house, at all hours of night or day, and irrespective of whether a guest has a right, or some reasonable cause for being there. The duty must be limited to those places into which guests may be reasonably supposed to be likely to go, in a reasonable belief that they are entitled or invited to do so.

A guest at an inn left his bedroom in the middle of the night to go to a water-closet. There were properly lighted and easily accessible closets in the same corridor, but he went into a dark "service room," the door of which was shut, but not locked, fell down the unguarded well of a lift at the end of the room and was killed. The "service room" was not lighted or used at night, and the visitors had no business there at any time. An action was brought by the personal representatives of the deceased, under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846.

Held (LORD FITZGERALD and LORD ASHBOURNE dissenting): there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the innkeeper to go to a jury.

C Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (FRY, L.J., dissenting), affirming a decision of the Queen's Bench Division, in an action brought under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846 (Lord Campbell's Act), by the appellants, as the personal representatives of a Mr. Smith, who was killed by a fall at the Midland Hotel, St. Pancras, in May, 1883, under circumstances which appear fully in the opinion of the EARL OF SELBORNE.

D The action was tried before GROVE, J., and a special jury, when a verdict was found for the appellants for £3500 damages; but this verdict was set aside by the Queen's Bench Division, and judgment was entered for the respondents, on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence on their part, and this judgment was affirmed in the Court of Appeal, as above mentioned.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Mar. 26, 1886. The following opinions were read.

E THE EARL OF SELBORNE.—The husband of the appellant lost his life by falling down the well of a lift at the respondents' hotel at their St. Pancras station. The well in question was for a luggage lift, at the further end of a "service" room, used for the temporary deposit of luggage and other purposes incidental to the general service of the hotel, of which the door opened into a corridor on the third floor, containing sleeping apartments for guests; one of which apartments, nearly opposite to the service room, was occupied by the appellant and her husband, who had been for more than a day staying at that hotel. The door of the service room was shut but not locked, I think it appears by the evidence that it had no key; the well, which was seventeen feet from the door, had been left unfenced. There were iron doors at the entrance to it, by closing which F it might have been fenced; these were left open. I infer that this service room was not used by the servants of the hotel at night. I find no evidence that it was ever so used after the gas was turned down, and I cannot, in this inquiry, attribute any importance to the statement of the witness Naef, G that he has "known the servants of visitors sometimes, but very seldom, go to the service room to get water at night." He does not say that he ever H knew this done after midnight, when the light in that room was extinguished; and the place for water there was close to, and just within the door. He says he never knew any visitor go to that room at all.

I This accident happened three hours or more after midnight. The deceased had been out late with a friend, and had only just returned to the hotel. According to the evidence of his friend, the refreshments which he had taken had produced an effect, not enough to make him incapable of taking reasonable care of himself, but enough, as I cannot but infer, to make the absence of such care on his part less improbable than it might have been under other circumstances. He went to his own room; and having occasion to go to a water-closet, asked his wife, twice over, where the place was. Without waiting for her answer, he went out into the corridor, where the gas lights were turned down, as was usual at that hour, so that there was some but not a clear or distinct light. No candles were used in the hotel; all the artificial light was from gas. There were proper water-closets, properly lighted within, with doors partly glazed, and having the letters "W.C." legible upon them, in an open recess of the same corridor, which the appellant's husband might have seen if he had gone only a few paces beyond the service room upon the same side. Those closets might have been seen by him as often as he ascended to or descended from the corridor, while staying at the hotel, as on every such occasion he passed to or from his room, in front of the recess where they were. It must be taken, however, that he had not actually observed them.

What he did was to open the door of the service room, the first door he came to on crossing the corridor towards the left. It was distinguished from the doors of the sleeping apartments by having glass in the upper part, on which the word "Service" was written, but not so as to be clearly legible by the light then in the corridor. There was no light within. Just within the door, to the left, there was a sink, in which there was some drip of water, the sound of which was perceptible outside. On opening the door it was apparent that the room was absolutely dark, and it must have been at once perceived that the drip of water came from the place where the sink was, which the deceased left behind him as he advanced into the room. He nevertheless, instead of continuing his search along the corridor for a water-closet properly lighted, which he would have found within a very short distance if he had done so, went into this dark room. It contained one or more tables, on the same side as the sink, and some luggage was lying on the floor; but with those things he does not seem to have come in contact. He made his way through the darkness to the further end, and there met the danger which cost him his life. The door of the room seems to have been found closed when search was afterwards made for him; this, at least, is the effect of the appellant's evidence, though the night watchman, Naef, says that the door was then open.

This is a summary of the whole evidence, omitting nothing which can be regarded as favourable to the appellant's case. The Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, under which the action was brought, made it necessary for the appellant to prove that her husband's death was caused by such a "wrongful act, neglect, or default" of the respondents as would have entitled him to maintain an action and recover damages for any injury, not mortal, which he might have sustained. This is not a question of any "act" done by the respondents; it is one of alleged neglect or default. Wrongful neglect or default there could not be, unless a duty, which was not performed, was previously owing by the respondents towards the appellant's husband, or towards persons in the same situation, in respect of the place where the accident happened. Prima facie, there was no such duty, for the service room was a place in which no guest of the hotel had any right or legitimate occasion to be, and into which no such guest was expressly or impliedly invited to go. I think it impossible to hold that the general duty of an innkeeper to take proper care for the safety of his guests extends to every room in his house, at all hours of night or day, irrespective of the question whether a guest may have a right, or some reasonable cause, to be there. The duty must, I think, be limited to those places into which guests may reasonably be supposed to be likely to go, in the belief, reasonably entertained, that they are entitled or invited to do so. Unless there was evidence fit for the consideration of a jury that any guest in the position of the deceased would, in the darkness of night, have reasonable ground for believing this service room to be a water-closet, and for acting as he did, there is nothing else in the case which, as it seems to me, could make the respondents' omission to provide against dangers within that service room wrongful towards the appellant's husband or generally towards their guests; for there was no other ground on which the presence of any guest there could reasonably be explained or excused.

Were, then, those circumstances connected with this room, which alone can be supposed to have suggested to the mind of the deceased that it might be

A a water-closet, enough to furnish reasonable ground for a belief, on which a guest in the situation of the deceased might reasonably act in the way he did, that this service room was a water-closet? This seems to me to be the question, putting it most favourably for the appellant. Those circumstances were the glass in the door and the audible drip of water within. I do not add the absence of light; for to me it would not seem reasonable to expect that water-closets
B intended for use at night in such an hotel would be left unlighted. But the glass in the door no more denoted a water-closet, there being no light within, than it did any other kind of room, passage, or place, which might receive borrowed light from the corridor, such, for instance, as a service room, a housemaid's closet, or the entrance to a passage or back staircase. And the drip of water would be left behind by anyone advancing, as the appellant's
C husband did, into the room, and could not be supposed by any such person to denote the situation of the object of his search. At the most, these circumstances might explain his first act, in opening the door to see what, if anything, might be discernible within; but when he had done this, and found the room quite dark, I cannot regard either of them alone, or both together, as furnishing reasonable
D ground for his going forward in the dark to the place where he fell, instead of proceeding a little further along the corridor, where proper water-closets, with proper lights, might have been found.

Would the respondents have been wrongdoers towards him, all other circumstances being the same, if he had come to a steep staircase instead of the unguarded well of a lift, and had fallen down it? I think not; and, if not, I
E do not think they can be liable because it was the well of a lift with iron doors, which had been, purposely or inadvertently, left unclosed. The magnitude of a particular danger, to anyone who may happen to come in the way of it unawares, may doubtless enhance the responsibility of the person to whom it is imputable, for the neglect of any duty which he owes to persons whom he leaves exposed to it; but I do not see how it can create such a
F duty, when the person who suffers would not, in the proper and ordinary course of things, or without his own unauthorised and unreasonable act, have been within the reach of the danger at all.

I will not detain your Lordships by considering some other things which might have happened, as, e.g., if the appellant's husband had sustained serious hurt by stumbling over the luggage which was on the floor of the service room, or G if there had been in the room brittle or perishable articles of value belonging to the respondents, which he might have broken or injured while groping about in the darkness. I doubt whether a judgment in the appellant's favour in the actual case could be justified, unless upon principles which would equally have entitled the appellant's husband to damages in the first of those cases, and have exonerated him from liability in the other. In considering whether there was any
H evidence of neglect of duty by the respondents, it would not, in my opinion, be right to leave out of sight the fact that they did not so conduct their hotel as to drive their guests to grope about in dark places, or to explore unknown rooms in order to find water-closets. These conveniences were provided on that corridor, in positions easily accessible, and easily discoverable by any guests in the circumstances of the appellant's husband, who might endeavour, with
I reasonable care and patience, to observe or to find them; and they were kept properly lighted at night.

Much as I regret the terrible result to the appellant's husband, I cannot hold the respondents responsible for it. The majority of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal, and all the judges of the Queen's Bench Division, before whom the case came, thought that there was no evidence of any wrongful neglect or default towards the appellant's husband on the respondents' part. I am unable to differ from them. If the evidence, illustrated by the plans which were before us, would not have been enough to go to a jury without the view, I am unable to see how a view of the corridor lighted so as to reproduce as far as A possible, its condition at the time of the accident could make any material difference. I, therefore, move your Lordships to dismiss this appeal.

[His LORDSHIP concluded by considering the question of costs.]

LORD WATSON and LORD BRAMWELL concurred.

LORD FITZGERALD and LORD ASHBOURNE dissented from the opinion of the EARL OF SELBORNE, holding that, on the facts of the case, there was evidence to go to the jury that the respondents had been guilty of a culpable breach of duty, and that the verdict ought not to be disturbed.

Appeal dismissed.

SOCIÉTÉ GÉNÉRALE DE PARIS v. DREYFUS BROTHERS

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cotton, Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.), December 16, 17, 1887]

Practice—Service out of jurisdiction—Discretion of court—Ascertainment whether plaintiff has possible cause of action—Outcome of action depending on foreign law—Decision of foreign court adverse to plaintiff—R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1.

On an application under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1, for leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction the court cannot go into the merits of the action in the sense of deciding it, but the court, in exercising the discretion conferred by the rule, must look at the plaintiff's case and see if he has a probable cause of action. If (as in the present case) the plaintiff has no probable cause of action, if the outcome of the action depends entirely on foreign law, and if the proper foreign tribunal has decided that he has no cause of action, there will be no ground for exercising the discretion of the court in the plaintiff's favour, and the application, therefore, should be dismissed.

(1) Call v. Oppenheim (1885), 1 T.L.R. 622, C.A.; 11 Digest (Repl.) 524, 1368.

Appeal from a decision of PEARSON, J., reported 29 Ch.D. 239, giving the plaintiffs leave to serve the defendants with a writ out of the jurisdiction under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (1).

The plaintiffs were a French company domiciled in Paris, and the defendants were Dreyfus (a domiciled Frenchman resident in Paris, sued as Dreyfus Brothers), the Peruvian Guano Co., Ltd. (an English company), and B. Premsel (a domiciled Frenchman resident in Paris, the owner of the business of Leiden, Premsel & Co., a French firm). On July 5, 1869, Dreyfus Brothers entered into

A an agreement with the Peruvian government for the purchase of guano; and on July 6, Dreyfus Brothers, Leiden, Premsel & Co., and the plaintiffs entered into a contract, executed at Paris, for the purpose of carrying out the above agreement "en participation" between them. Disputes afterwards arose, an action of Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co. was commenced, and the proceeds of certain cargoes of guano received by Dreyfus Brothers, amounting to about £200,000, B was paid into court to the credit of that action. The plaintiffs in the present action claimed (i) a declaration that the £200,000, belonged to them and to the other parties interested under the contract of July 6, 1869; (ii) a receiver; (iii) an injunction restraining Dreyfus Brothers from receiving or dealing with the money. They obtained leave, under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1. (f), to serve Dreyfus Brothers with the writ out of the jurisdiction, and Dreyfus Brothers then C moved to discharge the order giving leave. On the evidence before him PEARSON, J., came to the conclusion that the French courts had not decided an important question, viz., whether, having regard to the terms of the contract between the parties of July 6, 1869, the plaintiffs and B. Premsel had a right to any part of the proceeds of the guano, or only a personal right to an account against Dreyfus Brothers, and to stand as creditors against them for what should be D found due on taking the account, and therefore it was a case in which leave to serve the writ out of the jurisdiction ought to be given. From this decision the defendants appealed, but the hearing of the appeal stood over to await the result of proceedings in France. After the date of this order by PEARSON, J., further proceedings were taken in France. The Société Générale and Premsel brought an action before the Tribunal of Commerce of the Department of the E Seine claiming a right to receive as against Dreyfus Brothers all sums arising out of the guano contract of July 5, 1869, and, in particular, the sum of 5,300,000 francs, being the sum deposited in court in England, and asked for a receiver to receive that money. Judgment in that action, which was referred to as the receiver action, was given by the Tribunal of Commerce on Nov. 21, 1885, F in favour of the defendants, Dreyfus Brothers, and declared that the demands of the Société Générale were unfounded; that Dreyfus Brothers alone had the right, as well with respect to third persons as to the participants, of receiving all sums arising from the execution of the guano contract, and expressly the 5,300,000 francs arising from the cargoes realised in England, the prices of which were deposited in the court of London; that by the terms of the contract of participation the Société Générale had no right to require the payment into its G hands of the sums arising from the guano contract, or to object to their being paid to Dreyfus Brothers; and that in its relation with Dreyfus Brothers the Société Générale had no right of property in these sums, but only a contingent right of debt against their co-participants. On April 22, 1886, this judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal of Paris, and on July 12, 1887, by the H Cour de Cassation.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce for Dreyfus Brothers.

Rigby, Q.C., and Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.

I COTTON, L.J.—This is a motion by way of appeal from a decision of PEARSON, J., to discharge an order made by him for the service of a writ out of the jurisdiction, namely, in France. It is a somewhat singular case, because both plaintiffs and defendants are French people domiciled in France, and there are courts in that country, but the plaintiffs come here saying that it is a case within Ord. 11, r. 1, for it is an action in which it is sought to get an injunction with reference to a large sum of money which is in court in this country. That is so, and it is really, therefore, within para. f of Ord. 11, r. 1.

But was it right of the court, in the discretion given to it, to authorise the issue of the writ and notice of it to be served in France? When the case was before PEARSON, J., on the evidence by affidavit, he declined to discharge the order, as I understand, on a view of what were the rights of the parties A under a particular clause in the contract of participation which had been entered into between the plaintiffs and defendants. He thought that the evidence was doubtful on what must be a question of fact, namely, the rights of the parties under this contract, which was a French contract, made between domiciled Frenchmen. The plaintiff société is a French society. But now we have a great deal more. At the time the order was made by PEARSON J., there B was an action brought by Dreyfus in France in order to have his rights established under the contract as against the other contracting parties, but since the order was made by PEARSON, J., refusing to discharge the order for the issue of the writ and the order for service there have been other proceedings taken by the société against Dreyfus, in order to have it established in the French courts that the société had a right to receive this sum, either under the general law C applicable to such cases, or under the particular terms of the contract on which PEARSON, J., rested his decision. That has been through all the courts there, and the Court of Appeal in Paris and the Cour de Cassation have decided against the claims which were raised by the société. That shows that the société were wrong in trying to establish their claim to this fund in England on the grounds which were relied on by them. In the writ which was authorised to be served D they put their claim in this way: These funds are assets of a partnership, we have a right to receive them as against Dreyfus, or, at any rate, the court ought to grant a receiver and injunction. That was expressly decided against the société in the proceedings taken by them, and so it was ultimately conceded by their counsel. That being so, we must take it that, on that point as to the right to a receiver and the right to receive the fund personally, the société E were wrong in their contention as plaintiffs here.

Then it was said that there was another point, which, although not raised before the tribunals in France, would, on the evidence before us, entitle the société to a receiver, or make it probable that the société was entitled to that relief. That was the evidence of M. Barboux, who is their witness. It is pointed out, and it has not been displaced, that the very fact on which M. Barboux says that F the further right to get a receiver would depend, namely, that the participation or partnership was in liquidation, was actually before the Court of Appeal when the proceedings were before it, and when it made the order of April 22, 1886, affirming the decision of the court of first instance which decided that the société had no right personally to receive and no right to get a receiver of this fund. That being so, the whole case of the defendants has been proved. G That is to say, it has been established by the best evidence possible that the matter of fact on which the right of the plaintiffs in England depends does not exist.

In those circumstances what ought we to do? If we were satisfied that the tribunals in Paris had no power to protect this fund if they thought right to do H so, I should hesitate about discharging the order for the issue of this writ and for service abroad. But M. Barboux's affidavit, on which reliance was placed by the plaintiffs, shows, in my opinion, quite the contrary. He explains why a receiver would not be granted when the société was not in liquidation, because it would interfere with the rights and powers and duties of the manager, who in this case was Mr. Dreyfus, the manager of Dreyfus Brothers. But if the société I were in liquidation, which to my mind, can have no other meaning than when it is only carrying on its business so far as necessary for the purpose of winding-up its affairs, paying its debts, and distributing its proceeds, that would not apply. If that is so and they will, in consequence of that liquidation existing, be entitled in France to get a receiver, they can do it; but in my opinion, if it comes before us as a question of fact, I should say that the highest tribunal has decided what the French law is, and, therefore, gives us positive evidence that they are not entitled there, or consequently here, to get any receiver of this fund.

A That being so, what ought we to do? In my opinion, although we determine this matter on evidence now brought before us which was not before the court below showing conclusively what the French law as a matter of fact for us to decide is, we ought not to allow this action to go on. The defendants have not appeared, that is to say, they have only appeared conditionally in order to obtain the discharge of the order which has been made by PEARSON, J., for liberty to issue the writ and for service of notice abroad. I think, therefore, the proper thing to be done is to discharge PEARSON, J.'s, order and the writ. That will put an end to this action.

It is said that we are wrong in considering the questions into which I have entered. That argument was principally based on Call v. Oppenheim (1) in the Court of Appeal, but there are enormous differences between that case and this.

C There there was an English contract, because there was a bill of exchange accepted in France, but accepted payable in England, and there were grave questions as to what was the effect and validity of the judgment which had been given in France with reference to the matter. That is very different from that which appears before us now, where we have this judgment of the highest tribunal in France which really decides the matter. As a rule, in such a case as the present

D one ought not to enter into the questions which are to be decided at the trial of the action. But r. 4 of Ord. 11 requires that every application for leave to serve such writ shall be supported by affidavit or other evidence, stating that in the belief of the deponent the plaintiff has a good cause of action. The fact that such an affidavit is to be made shows that the court ought to consider whether there is a probable cause of action in respect of which the writ is sought

E to be served abroad. Here that depends not on a question of English law, but on a question of fact. That fact has been established by the best possible evidence by the courts which can decide what is French law deciding what the fact is, and the fact is shown to be that there is no cause of action.

Therefore, in my opinion, having regard to that rule, not only are we justified, but we ought in a case like this to inquire into any matter which is brought before us by the parties served, showing that the supposition upon which the judge made the order for the issue of the writ was erroneous and does not exist. In my opinion, therefore, the appellants are entitled to the order for which they ask. Then as to costs. I had some doubt about that, as we were hearing the matter here on evidence not before PEARSON, J. But it is shown now that the affidavits which were before PEARSON, J., on behalf of Dreyfus

G correctly stated the fact that was disputed by the other side. They ought never to have stated to the court that a fact existed which the tribunals in Paris, the Court of Appeal, and the Cour de Cassation have shown to us never did exist. This also is to be considered, that the matter stood over, after the appeal was presented and before it came before us, in order that the plaintiffs, the société, might bring the matter before the French tribunals to decide this matter between the parties in order to get their decision to show what was right and what was wrong in the allegations of fact which they raised before PEARSON, J. I think, therefore, we cannot do otherwise than, in discharging the order made by PEARSON, J., give to Messrs. Dreyfus the costs here and below.

I LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I cannot help thinking, if the facts now before us had been before PEARSON, J., leave to serve this writ abroad would never have been granted.

The controversy is of this nature. The Société Générale de Paris and Messrs. Dreyfus and some other gentlemen entered into a French contract, all being French subjects, for the participation of profits in a certain adventure, and their rights upon that contract depend upon French law, and French law only. There is no English law in the matter. It so happens that there is standing to the credit of a cause in the High Court a very considerable sum which has been ordered to be paid out to Messrs. Dreyfus; and the Société Générale, by their writ in this action, ask for a declaration that they are entitled to have that fund. They ask for a receiver, and for an injunction to restrain Dreyfus from receiving it. Under these circumstances they apply for leave to serve the writ in that action against Dreyfus. We have now the matter established clearly enough to enable us to see our way with perfect precision. It is established beyond all possibility of controversy that by French law the Société Générale are not entitled to receive that money; that they are not entitled to prevent Messrs. Dreyfus from receiving the money; and that Messrs. Dreyfus are the proper people to get it. It is also not in controversy at all that when Messrs. Dreyfus have got it, it must be brought into account and accounted for by them as part of the moneys which are subject to the contract to which I have referred. But they are the people to get it, even according to the affidavit which we have last had before us, relied upon by the plaintiffs. It seems to me to be quite plain that the proper mode of proceeding, even in France, is to let Messrs. Dreyfus get in that outstanding asset. Whether when they have got it matters are sufficiently in liquidation to enable the Société Générale to have it deposited is a question for the French courts, not for us; but it is impossible for Messrs. Dreyfus even to comply with any order of that kind unless they get the fund from us. It is an outstanding asset which the French courts say Messrs. Dreyfus are to get in, and no one has a right to say they shall not get it in. That appears to be the simple answer to the case.

We are referred to R.S.C., Ord. 11, and it is contended that, inasmuch as an injunction is asked, and as an affidavit has been made in the terms required by that order, we have no right to refuse leave to serve this writ, and it has been contended, upon the authority of Call v. Oppenheim (1), that if we do we shall be running counter to a decision of this court. I differ entirely from everyone of these allegations. In the first place, Ord. 11 enumerates certain circumstances under which, and under which alone, the court can give leave to serve writs out of the jurisdiction. It does not say that when these circumstances occur the court is bound to give leave. On the contrary, the language is that service out of the jurisdiction "may be allowed by the court or a judge" in certain specified events. This shows that the court has a discretion, and is bound to exercise its discretion. This becomes still plainer by turning to r. 2, which states certain matters which the court is bound to have regard to when it is asked for leave to serve a writ in Ireland or Scotland. It is not that you are entitled to have leave simply because you bring your case within one or the other of the rules of Ord. 11. You cannot get the leave unless you do, but it does not follow that if you do you are to have the leave. The court has a discretion, and that discretion must be exercised judicially and upon proper grounds.

It is said that in such a matter as this you cannot go into the merits. That is quite true. You cannot properly upon an application to serve a writ try the action. The object in giving leave to serve the writ is to put the parties in a position to try the action by-and-by, but at the same time a judge cannot perform the duty imposed upon him by this order unless he so far looks into the matter as to see whether the plaintiff has a probable cause of action or not. I do not think the court ought to look into the defence as distinguished from the plaintiff's case. The court must look at the plaintiff's case and see whether he has a probable cause of action. If he has no probable cause of action, if the outcome of the action depends entirely upon foreign law, and if the proper foreign tribunal has decided against him that he has no cause of action, there is no ground for exercising the discretion of the court, and the court ought to refuse the leave to serve the writ. That is not contrary to Call v. Oppenheim (1) as I understand it, but quite the reverse. Call v. Oppenheim (1) does not contain a word which goes to show that, if the court sees the plaintiff has

A no case, and if it has already been decided by a competent court that he has no such right as he alleges, this court should go through the farce of giving leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction when there is nothing to be gained by it.

Therefore, it appears to me, now we have the materials before us in the shape in which we have them, that this is a case in which leave to serve the writ abroad ought not to be given, and the appeal must be allowed. As regards the costs, no doubt there is a little difficulty in consequence of fresh facts having come forward, but the broad result is that Messrs. Dreyfus were right throughout. This was a very speculative action. When one foreigner sues another in the courts of this country on a foreign contract he is making a very hazardous experiment in asking for leave to serve the defendant, a foreigner, out of the jurisdiction. If he is wrong, if his opponent is right from the first, I cannot see on what principle the defendant ought not to be indemnified, and should not have costs. It appears to me, therefore, that the appeal ought to be allowed, with costs here and below.

D LOPES, L.J.—Allowing or disallowing service out of the jurisdiction is a matter of discretion. If a prima facie case is made on the affidavits that there is a cause of action within the rules of Ord. 11, the court in its discretion permits the service. If, on the other hand, no such case is made out, or if it is shown by the party on whom service is sought to be effected that there is a clear and complete defence, the court, in its discretion, does not grant, but refuses such service. Applying that to the present case, it appears to me that, if E this action proceeded and the judgments in the French courts were pleaded, they would furnish a complete answer to the case which the plaintiffs now set up on the ground of res judicata. Therefore, to permit the service to continue would be vexatious and oppressive towards the defendants. I think, therefore, the service should not be allowed. But it is said that this decision is not in accordance with the decision of Call v. Oppenheim (1). In my opinion, F 'the decision is in no way inconsistent with that case. It is said that on an application like the present the court is not entitled to go into the merits of the case. That is perfectly true. The court does not go into the merits in the sense of deciding the case but it is clear that the court must to a certain extent go into the facts in order to determine whether or not there is a cause of action, or whether or not there is a complete answer to that cause of action G which can be furnished by the defendants. The appeal, in my opinion, therefore, succeeds.

Appeal allowed.

A bill of lading relating to the carriage of cargo from Cronstadt to Hull contained an exceptions clause relieving the shipowners from liability for loss of or damage to the goods due to “the act of God, Queen’s enemies, fire, machinery, boilers, steam, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the sea, rivers, and steam navigation of whatever nature and kind soever.” The ship was lost through a collision with another vessel. In an action by consignees, to whom the property in the goods had passed, against the shipowners for damages for the loss of the cargo,

Held: the proximate cause of the loss fell within the words “dangers and accidents of the sea” in the exceptions clause, and, therefore, in the absence of any negligence on the part of the shipowners the action failed.

Woodley v. Michell (1) (1883), 11 Q.B.D. 47, overruled.

Per LORD HERSCHELL: The term “perils of the sea” (and certainly the words “dangers and accidents of the sea”) cannot have a narrower interpretation) does not cover every accident or casualty which may happen to the subject-matter of a policy of marine insurance on the sea. It must be a peril “of” the sea. It is not every loss or damage of which the sea is the immediate cause that is covered by these words. They do not protect, for example, against that natural and inevitable action of the winds and waves which results in what may be described as wear and tear. There must be some casualty, something which could not be foreseen as one of the necessary incidents of the adventure. The purpose of the policy is to secure an indemnity against accidents which may happen, not against events which must happen.

G

Per LORD BRAMWELL: Are the words “perils of the sea” to have different meanings in a policy of marine insurance and in a contract for the carriage of goods by sea? Why should they? Different consequences may follow. The insurer may be unable to defend himself on the ground that the loss was brought about by the negligence of the crew of the carrying vessel, while the freighter may maintain an action on the ground that it was. But how is the loss a loss by perils of the sea in one case and not in the other?

H

Per LORD MACNAGHTEN: Whatever the expression “perils of the sea” means in a policy of insurance, it means neither more nor less in a contract of carriage.

Appeal by the defendants in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ.), reported 11 P.D. 170, affirming a decision of the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division (SIR JAMES HANNEN) in favour of the plaintiffs.

The action was brought by the respondents, holders of a bill of lading for cargo shipped on board the steamship Xantho, against the appellants, the owners of that vessel, for non-delivery of the cargo. At the trial it was admitted by the ship-owners that a collision occurred between the Xantho and another vessel, by which the former was sunk, and that the cargo had been received, and had not been delivered. The bill of lading contained a clause excepting the shipowner from liability for loss of or damage to the cargo caused by, inter alia, "dangers and accidents of the sea." The shipowners contended that the burden of proof which was on them to show that the loss was due to a cause within the meaning of the exception had been discharged. SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., gave judgment for the cargo owners on the authority of Woodley v. Michell (1), and his judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The shipowners appealed.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., Sir Walter Phillimore and Aspinall for the appellants. Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., and Hollams for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

July 14, 1887. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL.—In order to render clear the exact point which has to be determined in this case it will be necessary to state with some minuteness the pleadings and the course which the case took at the trial. The owners of cargo by the steamship Xantho, who were the plaintiffs in the action, by their statement of claim alleged that they had suffered damage by breach of the contract contained in the bills of lading of goods shipped at Cronstadt on board the defendants' vessel Xantho for carriage to Hull, that the bills of lading were endorsed to the plaintiffs, to whom the property in the goods passed by such endorsement, and that the goods were not delivered. The statement of claim further alleged, alternatively, that the plaintiffs had suffered damage from the loss of their goods while on board the defendants' vessel by a collision with the steamship Valuta, caused by the negligent navigation of the defendants' servants. The statement of defence denied the contract and the breach, and also that the bills of lading were endorsed to the plaintiffs, and that the property in the goods thereby passed to them. In answer to the alternative claim, it admitted that the Xantho came into collision with the Valuta, but denied that the collision was caused by the negligent navigation of the Xantho, alleging that it was solely caused by the negligent navigation of the Valuta. The defence further alleged that the loss of the cargo was occasioned by perils which were excepted by the bill of lading.

The action came on for trial before the President of the Probate and Admiralty Division. The learned counsel for the plaintiffs put in as his only evidence the bills of lading and admissions that the property in the goods and the right to sue on the bills of lading had passed to the plaintiffs, and that the goods had not been delivered. The bills of lading, which were in the usual form, contained an exception in these terms :

"The act of God, Queen's enemies, fire, machinery, boilers, steam, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the sea, rivers, and steam navigation of whatever nature and kind soever excepted."

In opening his case the plaintiffs' counsel stated that the Xantho was lost by reason of a collision which took place between that vessel and the Valuta

A in a fog, and submitted that, whether the collision arose from the negligence of those navigating the Xantho or of those navigating the Valuta, or from the negligence of both combined, the loss of the goods did not fall within the exception contained in the bill of lading, and that the plaintiffs were in either case entitled to recover. He relied in support of this contention upon Woodley v. Michell (1). The learned counsel for the defendants admitted that if Woodley v. Michell (1) were good law he could not resist this view; that even if he proved that no negligence was to be imputed to the Xantho, and that the disaster was solely due to the negligence of the Valuta, as he could not prove that it arose from an inevitable accident, the result must be a decision for the plaintiffs. He considered, therefore, that the only course open to the defendants was to test the law laid down in Woodley v. Michell (1) by appeal to your Lordships' House. The learned President thereupon gave judgment for the plaintiffs. I think the defendants' counsel was perfectly correct in the course which he took. If he had proved to demonstration that his vessel was free from blame and that the other vessel's negligence alone caused the disaster, he would have established no defence so long as Woodley v. Michell (1) stood. He, accordingly, wisely abstained from the idle task of attempting to prove facts which the Court of Appeal had held to be wholly immaterial.

It appears to me that the only question which arises for your Lordships' determination in this case is whether the decision in Woodley v. Michell (1) can be sustained. In that case an action was brought on a bill of lading. The goods were lost owing to a collision between the defendants' and another vessel. The jury found that there was no negligence on the part of the master or crew of the carrying vessel. The Court of Appeal held that the defendants were not protected by the exception of "perils of the sea" contained in the bill of lading, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs. BRETT, L.J., said (11 Q.B.D. at p. 52):

"What I think it necessary in this case to say (and I repeat it without any doubt), is that although a collision when brought about without any negligence of either vessel is or may be a peril of the sea, a collision brought about by the negligence of either of the vessels, so that without negligence it could not have happened, is not a peril of the sea within the terms of that exception in a bill of lading."

COTTON, L.J., thus expresses himself (ibid. at p. 53):

"There is no decision that is binding upon us that a collision occasioned by the negligence of one of the ships is a peril of the sea. Looking, then, upon it with reference to decided cases, and according to the ordinary interpretation of words, I cannot see how, if there was no peril from sea or wind, and an accident is caused by the negligent act of one of the two ships which comes into collision, that can be said to be a peril of the sea."

The question what comes within the term "perils of the sea" (and certainly the words "dangers and accidents of the sea" cannot have a narrower interpretation) has been more frequently the subject of decision in the case of marine policies than bills of lading. I will first notice the decisions pronounced with regard to the former instrument, and then inquire how far a different interpretation is to be applied in the case of the latter. I think it clear that the term "perils of the sea" does not cover every accident or casualty which may happen to the subject-matter of the insurance on the sea. It must be a peril "of" the sea. Again, it is well settled that it is not every loss or damage of which the sea is the immediate cause that is covered by these words. They do not protect, for example, against that natural and inevitable action of the winds and waves which results in what may be described as wear and tear. There must be some casualty, something which could not be foreseen as one of the necessary incidents of the adventure. The purpose of the policy is to secure an indemnity against accidents which may happen, not against events which must happen. It was contended that those losses only were losses by perils of the sea which were occasioned by extraordinary violence of the winds or waves. I think this is too narrow a construction of the words, and it is certainly not supported by the authorities or by common understanding. It is beyond question that if a vessel strikes upon a sunken rock in fair weather and sinks, this is a loss by perils of the sea. And a loss by foundering, owing to a vessel coming into collision with another vessel, even when the collision results from the negligence of that other vessel, falls within the same category. Indeed, I am aware of only one case which throws a doubt upon the proposition that every loss by incursion of the sea, due to a vessel coming accidentally (using that word in its popular sense) into contact with a foreign body which penetrates it and causes a leak, is a loss by a peril of the sea. I refer to Cullen v. Butler (2), where, a ship having been sunk by another ship firing upon her in mistake for an enemy, the court inclined to the opinion that this was not a loss by perils of the sea. I think, however, this expression of opinion stands alone, and has not been sanctioned by subsequent cases.

But it is said that the words "perils of the sea" occurring in a bill of lading or other contract of carriage must receive a different interpretation from that which is given to them in a policy of marine insurance; that in the latter case the causa proxima alone is regarded, while in the former you may go behind the causa proxima and look at what was the real or efficient cause. It is on this view that the Court of Appeal acted in Woodley v. Michell (1). I quite agree that in the case of a marine policy the causa proxima alone is considered. If that which immediately caused the loss was a peril of the sea, it matters not how it was induced, even if it were by the negligence of those navigating the vessel. It is equally clear that in the case of a bill of lading you may sometimes look behind the immediate cause, and the shipowner is not protected by the exception of perils of the sea in every case in which he would be entitled to recover on his policy on the ground that there had been a loss by such perils. I think, however, that this difference arises, not from the words "perils of the sea" having a different meaning in the two instruments, but from the context or general scope and purpose of the contract of carriage excluding in certain cases the operation of the exception. It would, in my opinion, be very objectionable, unless well-settled authority compelled it, to give a different meaning to the same words occurring in two maritime instruments.

The true view appears to me to be presented by WILLES, J., in his judgment in Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. (3). The question there arose whether, when a vessel was lost by a collision caused by the negligence of those navigating the carrying ship, the case fell within the exception of "perils of the sea." It was held that it did not. Reference having been made to cases on policies of insurance, and the interpretation there put upon these words, WILLES, J., said (L.R. 1 C.P. at pp. 611, 612) :

"I may say that a policy of insurance is an absolute contract to indemnify for loss by perils of the sea, and it is only necessary to see whether the loss comes within the terms of the contract, and is caused by perils of the sea; the fact that the loss is partly caused by things not distinctly perils of the sea does not prevent its coming within the contract. In the case of a bill of lading it is different, because there the contract is to carry with reasonable care, unless prevented by the excepted perils. If the goods are not carried with reasonable care, and are consequently lost by perils of the sea, it becomes necessary to reconcile the two parts of the instrument, and this is done by holding that if the loss through perils of the sea is caused by the previous default of the shipowner, he is liable for this breach of his covenant."

A So far as I am aware, until Woodley v. Michell (1) was decided, there was no authority for saying that a loss the proximate cause of which was a peril of the sea, and which did not result from the act or default of the carrier, was not within the exception. In Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands Indian Steam Navigation Co. (4) BRETT, L.J., suggested the view that a loss by a collision due to the negligence, not of the carrying, but of the other
B vessel, was not a loss by perils of the sea. He said (10 Q.B.D. at p. 530):

C "If the collision is caused without any fault on the part of the carrying ship, but is caused by reason of the negligence of those who are conducting the other ship, it cannot be called an accident of the sea. An accident is that which happens without the fault of anybody, and consequently a collision which is the fault of somebody is not an accident of the sea."

This was a dictum certainly not necessary for the decision of that case. But in Woodley v. Michell (1) it was repeated and adopted as the ground of judgment. With the greatest respect for that learned judge, the weight of whose opinion on any question of maritime law I fully recognise, I am unable to perceive why a loss occasioned by an inroad of the sea owing to a casualty over which the D shipowner and his servants had no control should not be held to be within the exception. If the distinction pointed out by WILLES, J., between the rules governing the construction of policies of marine insurance and bills of lading be the true one, it is certainly not applicable to such a case. I am unable to concur in the view that a disaster which happens from the fault of somebody
E can never be an accident or a peril of the sea; and I think it would give rise to distinctions resting on no sound basis if it were to be held that the exception of perils of the seas in a bill of lading were always excluded when the inroad of the sea which occasioned the loss was induced by some intervention of human agency. Take the case which I put in the course of the argument, of a ship which strikes upon a rock and is lost because the light which should have
F warned the mariner against it has become extinguished owing to the negligence of the person in charge. Why should this not be within the exception, while a similar loss arising from a vessel coming into contact with a rock not marked upon the chart admittedly would be? And what substantial distinction is there between this latter case and that of a vessel foundering through collision with a ship at anchor left at night without lights?

G For these reasons I have arrived at the conclusion that Woodley v. Michell (1) cannot be supported. It was contended by the learned counsel for the appellants that if your Lordships should take this view, the judgment ought to be entered for them. I cannot concur in this. With the authority of Woodley v. Michell (1) in their favour, when once it was admitted that the accident was not inevitable, it was as fruitless for the respondents to give evidence of the negligence of the H appellants as it was for the appellants to seek to cast the blame on the other vessel. Much argument was addressed to your Lordships on the question whether, when the plaintiffs had proved that the goods had not been delivered, thus throwing the onus on the defendants of excusing their non-delivery, proof by them that the vessel had been sunk in a collision would be sufficient to shift the onus, and render it incumbent on the plaintiffs to establish that the collision was due
I to the defendants' negligence, or whether the defendants, to bring themselves within the exception, must show that the loss was not due to a cause induced by their own negligence. I do not think this point is now before your Lordships for decision. Arguments of weight have been adduced in support of either view. I certainly must not be understood as deciding that the mere proof of loss by collision under circumstances as consistent with its resulting from the negligence of the carrying ship as from any other cause would exonerate the defendants. I move your Lordships that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and that there be a new trial of the action. I think the respondents must pay the costs in the Court of Appeal and in this House, and that the costs of the two trials already had should abide the event. I move your Lordships accordingly. A

LORD BRAMWELL.—My noble and learned friend has been kind enough to read his opinion first, in consequence of its containing a fuller statement of the facts than what I am about to read to your Lordships. The plaintiffs' statement of claim is for the non-delivery of goods according to a bill of lading, with an alternative claim for loss of the goods therein mentioned owing to the negligence of the defendants. It was admitted at the trial by the defendants that the goods had not been delivered according to the bill of lading. It was admitted by the plaintiffs that the vessel sank owing to damage received in a collision. It was admitted by the defendants that that collision was not the result of inevitable accident—i.e., of winds, waves, or other natural causes. The plaintiffs contended, on the authority of Woodley v. Michell (1), that, that being so, they were entitled to judgment, whether the collision was attributable to the negligence of the defendants, with or without negligence on the part of the other ship, or wholly to the negligence of that other. The President so ruled, considering himself bound by Woodley v. Michell (1). B

That case decided that a damage, including foundering occasioned by collision, was not a loss by perils of the sea within those words of exception in a bill of lading, unless occasioned by action of sea or wind, or inevitable accident, and, therefore, that a collision occasioned, whether by the negligence of the one ship or the other, or both, was not a loss by such perils. The defendants appealed, but the ruling was upheld, the court giving reasons for their opinion, and also relying on Woodley v. Michell (1). With great respect, I cannot agree. I think that case wrongly decided, and differ from the reasons given in support of the judgment in that and in this case. Was it by a peril of the sea that the defendants' ship foundered? The facts are that the sea-water flowed into her through a hole, and flowed in such quantities that she sank. It seems to me that the bare statement shows she went to the bottom through a peril of the sea. If the hole had been small, there being a piece of bad wood, a plank starting, or a similar cause, it would be called a leak, and no one would doubt that she foundered from a peril of the sea. Does it make any difference that the hole was large, and occasioned by collision? I cannot think it does. It is admitted that if the question had arisen on an insurance against loss by perils of the sea this would have been within the policy a loss by perils of the sea. Are the words to have different meanings in the two instruments? Why should they? Different consequences may follow. The insurer may be unable to defend himself on the ground that the loss was brought about by the negligence of the crew, while the freighter may maintain an action on the ground that it was. But how is the loss a loss by perils of the sea in one case and not in the other? The argument is that wind and waves did not cause the loss, but negligence in someone. But surely, if that were so, a loss by striking in calm weather on a sunken rock not marked on the chart would not be a loss by perils of the seas within the bill of lading; or striking on a rock from which the light had been removed, or an iceberg, or a vessel without lights. C

I cannot bring myself to see that such cases are not losses by perils of the sea. Is not the chance of being run against by a clumsy rider one of the perils of hunting? It would be strange if an underwriter on cargo, suing in the name of the cargo owners on the bill of lading, should say: "I have paid for a loss by perils of the sea, and claim on you because the loss was not by perils of the sea." The Court of Appeal, with great respect, argued as though the collision caused the loss. So it did in a sense. It was a causa sine qua non, but it was not the causa causans. It was causa remota, but not causa proxima. The causa proxima of the loss was foundering. It would be strange if a plank started and the vessel went to the bottom in consequence that it should be held: "The loss is not by perils of the seas, but by bad carpentering." Let there be no doubt. I do not say that in D

A such case the freighter might not complain that his goods were carried in an unseaworthy ship: all I say is, that the loss would be by perils of the seas. It is only necessary for this House to say that if the foundering was occasioned by a collision, with no blame on the defendants, they ought to have succeeded. For this is what they offered to prove, and were told that it was useless to do so. Counsel for the respondents argued that they ought to have insisted on their right to
 B prove their case. I am clearly of a different opinion. I think when the judge says: "I shall decide against you, though you prove what you say," the party must acquiesce for the time, and seek his remedy by appeal. I think that the judge might properly refuse to hear the evidence, for he might truly say that, in his opinion, this evidence is irrelevant to any issue on the record; no one giving it would be liable to the penalty of perjury. The practice in my experience has
 C always been in conformity with what I am now saying.

The judgment, then, must be set aside. Counsel contended that it should be entered for the defendants. That also is impossible. It could not have been done before the Judicature Act, and that Act does not authorise it. It would be most unjust to the plaintiffs. They, relying on the law as it had been laid down, proved what was a sufficient case, and did not give what would have
 D been irrelevant evidence if the law had been rightly laid down. I say nothing about burthen of proof. All I say is, that if the collision was in no way the fault of the defendants' crew, they are entitled to judgment.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—In this case the bill of lading on which the question arises is in common form. In the usual terms it states the engagement on the
 E part of the shipowner to deliver the goods entrusted to his care. At the same time it specifies, by way of exception, certain cases in which failure to deliver those goods may be excused. So much for the express terms of the bill of lading. But the shipowner's obligations are not limited and exhausted by what appears on the face of the instrument underlying the contract; implied and involved in it
 F there is a warranty by the shipowner that his vessel is seaworthy, and there is also an engagement on his part to use due care and skill in navigating the vessel and carrying the goods. Having regard to the duties thus cast upon the shipowner, it seems to follow as a necessary consequence, that, even in cases within the very terms of the exception in the bill of lading, the shipowner is not protected if any default or negligence on his part has caused or contributed to the loss.

Turning now to the facts of the case, we find that it was admitted at the trial
 G that the vessel with the goods on board foundered at sea in consequence of a collision. The exception in the bill of lading includes "dangers and accidents of the sea." Is shipwreck by collision a danger or accident of the sea? I should say undoubtedly it is. Then comes the question: How was the collision brought about? Of that we know nothing, except that it was not due to inevitable
 H accident. So much was admitted. It follows from that admission that one or both of the vessels that came into collision must have been to blame. In that state of things, I should have thought that the issue between the parties was reduced to this question: Was the carrying vessel in fault? If it was not, the shipowner is protected. If it was, though the loss occurred through one of the excepted perils, the shipowner cannot rely on the exception. Unfortunately that I simple issue was obscured, and the trial of the action was rendered abortive by reason of the decision in Woodley v. Michell (1). In the face of that decision it would have been idle for the parties to have gone into the facts at the trial. It would have been a work of supererogation on the part of the plaintiffs to have proved that the carrying vessel was in fault. The defendants would have been no nearer winning if they had established by the clearest evidence that up to the moment of collision they had performed every duty cast upon them.

Under these circumstances the parties have been compelled to come to your Lordships' House, appealing in form against the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the present case, but in reality against the decision in Woodley v. Michell (1). Your Lordships are, therefore, called upon to determine whether the rule laid down in Woodley v. Michell (1) can be supported on principle or authority. Authority in its favour there is none. The industry of counsel could not produce any passage from any recognised treatise or from any reported judgment countenancing the doctrine, except one observation in Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Co. (4), which was not necessary for the decision. It seems to me to be equally difficult to support the rule in Woodley v. Michell (1) on principle. If the accident is brought about by the negligence of the owner of the carrying vessel or his servants, it would be contrary to common sense and against all sound principle to allow one who was the author of the mischief to avail himself of his own wrong. But, if the carrying shipowner is free from all blame, why should he suffer for the errors or misconduct of those over whom he has no control? As far as he and his vessel are concerned, what difference can it make in that case whether the collision is caused by a sunken rock, or by an iceberg, or by another vessel, or whether that other vessel is or is not in fault? It seems to me, if I may say so with all deference, that the error of the Court of Appeal in the present case is to be found in this: They start with the assumption that the same words have different meanings when used in policies of insurance, and when used in bills of lading. For that assumption there is not, I venture to think, any foundation. Different considerations, no doubt, apply to the two contracts, one a contract of indemnity and the other a contract of carriage, and the same event may have a different result in the one case from what it would have in the other; but in mercantile contracts so closely connected the same words must have the same meaning. Whatever the expression "perils of the sea" means in a policy of insurance, it means neither more nor less in a bill of lading. The result, in my opinion, is that the appeal must be allowed, and the litigant parties must begin over again.

Appeal allowed.

HAMILTON, FRASER & CO. v. PANDORF & CO.

[House of Lords (Lord Halsbury, L.C., Lord Watson, Lord Brainwell, Lord FitzGerald, Lord Herschell and Lord Macnaghten), May 12, 13, July 14, 1887]

[Reported 12 App. Cas. 518; 57 L.J.Q.B. 24; 57 L.T. 726; 52 J.P. 196; 36 W.R. 369; 3 T.L.R. 768; 6 Asp. M.L.C. 212]

Shipping—Carriage of goods—Exception relieving shipowner from liability—"Dangers and accidents of the seas"—Damage to cargo by sea water—Water in hold owing to hole in pipe gnawed by rats.

A cargo of rice was shipped under bills of lading which excepted "all dangers and accidents of the seas . . . of whatever nature and kind." During the voyage the cargo was damaged by sea water entering through a pipe which had been gnawed by rats. It was admitted that the ship was seaworthy, and that there was no negligence.

Held: the damage was within the exception, and the shipowner was not liable for the damage to the rice.

A Per LORD HALSBURY, L.C.: What the parties, I think, contemplated was that if any accident should do damage by letting the sea into the vessel, that should be one of the things contemplated by the contract. . . . I cannot think that what happened was less a peril or accident because the hole through which the sea came was made by vermin from within the vessel and not by a sword-fish from without—the sea water did get in.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ.), reported 17 Q.B.D. 670, reversing a decision of LOPES, L.J., upon further consideration of an action tried before him at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, 1885. F

The appellants were the owners of the steamship Inchrhona, and the respondents were merchants in London and the rice ports. In the action the respondents sought to recover from the appellants the sum of £1000 by way of damages for breach of contract contained in bills of lading dated Mar. 26, 1884, relating to a cargo of rice shipped by the respondents at Akyab, on board the Inchrhona, and delivered in a damaged condition, the damage having been occasioned by sea-water which had got into the hold through a hole made by rats in a leaden discharge pipe connected with a bathroom in the ship. No negligence on the part of the shipowners was proved. The appellants relied on the exceptions in the bills of lading as freeing them from liability for the damage so occasioned. The perils excepted in the bills of lading were G H

“the act of God, the Queen’s enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation of whatever nature and kind soever.” I

LOPES, L.J., gave judgment for the shipowners, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal and the shipowners appealed to the House of Lords.

Bigham, Q.C., and Gorell Barnes for the appellants.

Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., and Walton for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

July 14, 1887. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case the admissions made at the trial reduce the question to this—whether in a seaworthy ship the gnawing by rats of some part of the ship so as to cause sea-water to come in and cause damage is a danger and accident of the sea. That this happened without any negligence of the shipowner is material in determining the rights of the parties in this particular case, but, in my judgment, has no relevancy to the question whether the facts, as I have stated them, constituted a danger or accident of the seas. With all respect to BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ., they have not accepted the hypothesis of fact which the admissions at the trial render essential. It is admitted that the ship was seaworthy, and that there was no negligence, and these admissions are absolutely inconsistent with the reasoning of the lords justices, which suggests important difficulties in deciding those questions of fact to which I have referred, but seems beside the question if these facts are proved or admitted, as I think it is clear they were. The other question with which LORD ESHER, M.R., dealt is one which must be determined upon the ordinary rules of construction, whatever is the document the meaning of which is under debate; and it must be admitted that words may receive a limited meaning by reason of the other words with which they are associated, or by reason of the subject-matter with which they deal, or by reason of the mode in which they are commonly used.

It is clear that the parties do not mean by such an instrument as we are construing to except all accidents of any kind or description whatsoever which may happen during the voyage to which both parties are looking forward. Some effect must be given to the words “perils of the sea.” A rat eating a cheese in the hold of a vessel is not a peril of the sea; the sea, or the vessel being on the sea, has nothing to do with the destruction of the cheese. This was the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Laveroni v. Drury (1). In the report of that case in 22 L.J. Ex. 2, POLLOCK, C.B., and ALDERSON, B., distinctly point out, after the judgment of the court had been given, that the decision at which the court had arrived did not touch the question whether the sea being let in by a hole made by a rat was an accident or danger of the sea.

One of the dangers which both parties to the contract would have in their mind would, I think, be the possibility of the water getting into the vessel from the sea upon which the vessel was to sail in accomplishing her voyage—it would not necessarily be by a storm; the parties have not so limited the language of their conduct—it might be by striking on a rock, or by excessive heat, so as to open some of the upper timbers. These and many more contingencies that might be suggested would let the sea in; but what the parties, I think, contemplated was that if any accident (not wear and tear, or natural decay) should do damage by letting the sea into the vessel, that should be one of the things contemplated by the contract. A subtle analysis of all the events which lead up to and in that sense cause a thing may doubtless remove the first link in the chain so far that neither the law nor the ordinary business of mankind can permit it to be treated as a cause affecting the legal right of the parties to a suit. In this case the existence of the rats on board, their thirst, the hardness of their teeth, the law of gravitation, which caused the water to descend upon the rice, the ship being afloat, the pipe being lead, and its capacity of being gnawed—each of these may be represented as the cause of the water entering; but I do not assent to the view that this contract can have a different meaning attached to it according as you regard each step in the chain of events as the origin out of which the damage ultimately arises. In the class of contract where the shipowner's negligence or misconduct prevents perils of the sea being relied upon, it is not that perils of the sea are different, or that the words ought to have a different meaning attached to them, but because in those cases an additional term exists in the contract, which makes the negligence of the shipowner, or of those for whom he is responsible, a material element.

It is necessary to give effect to the words “dangers and accidents of the seas.”

Cases have been brought to your Lordships' attention in which the decision has turned, not, I think, upon the question whether it was a sea peril or accident, but whether it was an accident at all. I think the idea of something fortuitous and unexpected is involved in both words, "peril" or "accident"; you could not speak of the danger of a ship's decay; you would know that it must decay; and the destruction of the ship's bottom by vermin is assumed to be one of the natural and certain effects of an unprotected wooden vessel sailing through certain seas. One ought, if it is possible, to give effect to all the words that the parties have used to express what this bargain is, and I think in this case it was a danger, accident, or peril, in the contemplation of both parties, that the sea might get in and spoil the rice. I cannot think it was less such a peril or accident because the hole through which the sea came was made by vermin from within the vessel, and not by a sword-fish from without—the sea-water did get in. I am, therefore, of opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD WATSON.—The respondents sue for damages in respect of damage sustained, during transit, by a cargo of rice, which was carried in the appellants' steamship Inchrhona from Akyab to Bremen. The appellants plead, in defence, that the injury was occasioned by a danger or accident of the sea, within the meaning of the exception in the charterparty and bills of lading, which are in the usual terms. In point of fact, the rice was damaged by sea-water, which found its way into the hold of the Inchrhona through a hole gnawed by a rat in a leaden pipe connected with the bathroom of the vessel.

If the respondents were preferring a claim under a contract of marine insurance, expressed in ordinary terms, I should be clearly of opinion that they were entitled to recover, on the ground that their loss was occasioned by a peril of the sea within the meaning of the contract. When a cargo of rice is directly injured by rats or by the crew of the vessel, the sea has no share in producing the damage, which in that case is wholly due to a risk not peculiar to the sea, but incidental to the keeping of that class of goods, whether on shore or on board of a voyaging ship. But in the case where rats make a hole, or where one of the crew leaves a porthole open, through which the sea enters and injures the cargo, the sea is the immediate cause of mischief, and it would afford no answer to the claim of the insured to say that, had ordinary precaution been taken to keep down vermin, or had careful hands been employed, the sea would not have been admitted, and there would have been no consequent damage. Your Lordships have disapproved [in Wilson, Sons & Co. v. Xantho (Cargo Owners), The Xantho (2)] of the novel doctrine that in a contract of sea carriage a meaning must be attached to the expression "dangers and accidents of the seas," different from that which it bears in a contract insuring cargo against sea risks, and that, in the case of a charterparty or bill of lading, the court ought to look to what has been termed the remote, as distinguished from the proximate, cause of damage, whereas, in the case of a policy, the proximate cause can alone be regarded. The expression has precisely the same significance in both cases; but there is this difference between them: when a shipowner, who is bound, by the implied terms of his contract to carry with ordinary care, claims the benefit of the exception, the court will, if necessary, go behind the proximate cause of damage, for the purpose of ascertaining whether that cause was brought into operation by the negligent act or default of the shipowner or of those for whom he is responsible. As LORD BLACKBURN said in Steel v. State Line Steamship Co. (3) (3 App. Cas. at p. 88):

"Although the things perished by a peril of the sea, still, inasmuch as it was the negligence of the shipowner and his servants that led to it, they cannot avail themselves of the exception."

I am of opinion that in the present case the appellants must prevail, because it has not been shown that the peril which was the immediate and efficient cause of damage owed its existence to their negligence. In the course of the trial before LOPES, L.J., it does appear to have been, at one time, suggested that the appellants' servants failed to exercise due diligence in extirpating the rats, and also that the bathroom pipe ought not to have been of lead, but of some other material which a rat could not or would not gnaw. Neither of these points was submitted to the jury, who negatived the only charge of negligence which was ultimately insisted on by the respondents. I, accordingly, concur in the judgment which has been moved.

LORD BRAMWELL.—I am of opinion that this decision must be reversed. This is another case in which this House has had to consider whether a peril of the sea or other peril within the general words was shown. I think the definition given by LOPES, L.J., very good: "It is a sea damage occurring at sea, and nobody's fault." What is the "peril?" It is that the ship or goods will be lost or damaged; but it must be "of the sea." "Fire" would not be a peril of the sea; so loss or damage from it would not be insured against by the general words. So of lightning. In the present case the sea has damaged the goods. That it might do so was a peril that the ship encountered. It is true that the rats made the hole through which the water got in; and if the question were whether rats making a hole was a peril of the sea, I should say certainly not. If we could suppose that no water got in, but that the assured sued the underwriter for the damage done to the pipe, I should say clearly that he could not recover. But I should equally say that the underwriters on goods would be liable for the damage shown in this case.

Then I am of opinion that "perils of the seas" is a phrase having the same meaning in bills of lading and charterparties as in policies of insurance. I repeat my illustration; if underwriters paid this loss as through a peril of the sea, how would they, in the name of the assured, claim from the shipowner, because it was not a peril of the sea. I do not go through the cases; I say there is none opposed to this opinion. The doubt or hesitation expressed in Cullen v. Butler (4) where the ship was sunk by being fired into is certainly a doubt the other way, but only a doubt. An attempt was made to show that a peril of the sea meant a peril of what I feel inclined to call the sea's behaviour or ill-condition. But that is met by the argument that, if so, striking on a sunken rock on a calm day, or against an iceberg, and consequent foundering, is not a peril of the sea or its consequence. No question of negligence exists in this case. The damage was caused by the sea in the course of navigation with no default in anyone. I am, therefore, of opinion that the damage was caused by peril of the sea within the meaning of the bill of lading, that LOPES, L.J., was right, and that the judgment must be reversed.

LORD FITZGERALD.—The damage to a portion of the cargo of rice carried by the defendants' ship was not occasioned either remotely or immediately by any negligence of the defendants, as alleged in the statement of claim, but they may nevertheless be liable, and the real question is whether the defendants have established that it arose from a peril of the sea coming within the exception contained in the charterparty and in the bill of lading. I agree with LORD WATSON that the exception, "peril of the sea," has the same meaning whether it occurs in a marine policy or in a charterparty, or bill of lading, and is to be so interpreted, but that when the action is on the contract of carriage you may look behind the proximate or immediate cause for the purpose of ascertaining whether the remote cause may not have been the negligence of the carrier, and indeed the carrier is usually under the necessity of establishing that no negligence of his had led to the calamity. Thus, for instance, if a ship is cast on the rocks by force of the winds or sea, that is a loss by a peril of the sea within the exception; but in an action against the carrier it would be open to consider whether the ship, being placed in that position, did not originate in negligent navigation. A

At the close of the argument I was slightly inclined to the opinion that the loss in question might be more accurately described as arising from a peril of the ship than caused by a peril of the sea; but on consideration of the very careful and elaborate judgments in the Court of Appeal, and the authorities referred to, and looking at the reason of the thing, I have come to a conclusion in accord with that announced by my noble and learned friends, adopting the reasons and the decision of LOPES, L.J. The accident was fortuitous, unforeseen, and actually unknown until the ship had reached her destination and commenced unloading. I do not, however, mean to suggest that to constitute a peril of the sea the accident or calamity should have been of an unforeseen character. The remote cause was in a certain sense the action of the rats on the lead pipe, but the immediate cause of the damage was the irruption of sea-water from time to time through the injured pipe, caused by the rolling of the ship as she proceeded on her voyage. There having been no negligence on the part of the appellants, I am of opinion that they have brought the case within the exception, and are protected. B C D

LORD HERSCHELL.—I have so recently expressed, in Wilson, Sons & Co. v. Xantho (Cargo Owners), The Xantho (2), my views upon the interpretation to be put upon the words “dangers and accidents of the seas” occurring in a bill of lading, that I need trouble your Lordships with but few observations in this case. I take the facts to be that the damage occurred by the sea entering through a leak caused by rats, without any neglect or default on the part of the shipowner or those for whom he was responsible, and that this was not an ordinary incident of the voyage which he was bound to anticipate. In saying so, I am differing from the ground upon which two of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal (BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ.) based their judgment. But when those learned judges say that E F

“it was consistent with the findings that the mischief done to the pipe and the incursion of sea-water which followed would never have happened but for either a defect in the condition of the ship or some want of prudence in the shipowner,” G

I think they overlook the course which the case took at the trial. It was suggested during the trial, by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs, that due care had not been taken to exclude or exterminate the rats, and that, if the pipe had been made of some other material, the accident would not have happened. But I think these points were distinctly and unequivocally abandoned by him. H If intended to be insisted upon, they raised questions upon which the opinion of the jury ought to have been taken, and, with the assent of the plaintiffs’ counsel, the only questions put were upon a totally different point.

The Master of the Rolls rested his judgment altogether upon another ground. He considered that the rats were the real cause of the damage, and that it was, therefore, not due to a danger or accident of the seas. I quite concur I with the view expressed in Laveroni v. Drury (1), that injury done to a vessel or its cargo by rats, is not damage by perils of the sea. But in that very case POLLOCK, C.B., said (22 L.J. Ex. at p. 4):

“If indeed the rats had made a hole in the ship through which water came and damaged the cargo, that might very likely be a case of sea damage.”

The Master of the Rolls says that the distinction is a very fine one between damage done by rats, which, it may be, so eat into the timbers of the ship as to render it unfit to proceed to sea, and the loss of the vessel owing to the incursion of water when its sides have been completely penetrated by the same cause. I own I think the distinction a substantial one, and it seems to me obvious that POLLOCK, C.B., shared this view. It has been held in the United States in Garrigues v. Coxe (5) that a leak occasioned by the eating of rats, without negligence on the part of the shipowner, was a risk covered in a marine policy by the words "perils of the seas."

Taking the facts of this case to be as I have stated them, I entertain no doubt that the loss was one which would in this country be recoverable under a marine policy, as due to a peril of the sea. It arose directly from the action of the sea. It was not due to wear and tear, nor to the operation of any cause ordinarily incidental to the voyage, and, therefore, to be anticipated. And, inasmuch as it was not the result of any act or default on the part of the shipowner or his crew, I think, for the reasons I have given in my opinion in The Xantho (2), that it is within the exception in the bill of lading. I, accordingly, concur in the motion which has been made.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The goods which were carried under the bill of lading were damaged during the voyage by the incursion of sea-water. The water came in through a hole gnawed by rats in a pipe connecting the bathroom with the sea. At the trial various charges and suggestions were made of negligence on the part of the shipowner; but they were all either withdrawn or negatived by the jury. Under these circumstances it seems to me, that the accident which caused the damage was one of the excepted perils or accidents, and there was no reason why the shipowner should not avail himself of the exception. It was an accidental and unforeseen incursion of the sea that could not have been guarded against by the exercise of reasonable care. I agree, therefore, with the judgment of LOPES, L.J. I do not think the case could be summed-up better than it was by him in the words which have already been quoted: "Sea damage occurring at sea and nobody's fault." I concur in the motion which has been made.

Appeal allowed.

Re DOUGLAS. OBERT AND OTHERS v. BARROW

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cotton, Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ.), May 2, 3, 1887]

35 W.R. 740; 3 T.L.R. 589]

Charity—Benefit to community—Protection and benefit of animals—Home for lost dogs—Uncertainty—Gift of ultimate residue as appointed by named person—Previous specific gifts to charities—Inclusion in specific gifts of objects not legally charitable.

By her will, made in 1882, the testatrix bequeathed to trustees the residue of her personal estate upon trust out of such part of her personal estate as the law permitted to be appropriated by will to charitable purposes to pay pecuniary legacies to the treasurers "of the respective charities, institutions, or societies hereinafter mentioned," to be applicable for the general purposes of "such respective charities, institutions, and societies." There followed a list of societies and institutions including "the Society for the Protection of Animals Liable to Vivisection," and "the Home for Lost Dogs." The will continued, "and upon further trust to pay and distribute all the residue of that portion of my said personal estate which may by law be appropriated by will for such purpose among such charities, societies, and institutions (including or excluding those hereinbefore mentioned), and in such shares and proportions as S. shall by writing nominate." After the death of the testatrix, S. in writing nominated 153 charities, societies, and institutions (not including the Society for the Protection of Animals Liable to Vivisection, or the Home for Lost Dogs) to receive the residue in unequal shares.

Held: on construction of the will the words "charities, institutions and societies" meant "charities, charitable institutions, and charitable societies," and the mere inclusion in the bodies specified of one or two institutions which might not be charitable did not introduce such an element of uncertainty as to make the latter part of the will void.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of KAY, J., in an action for the determination of questions arising on the construction of a will.

G By her will, dated Nov. 22, 1882, the testatrix appointed the plaintiffs executors and trustees. She devised her real estate to the defendant Francis Barrow, made specific and pecuniary bequests, and bequeathed the residue of her personal estate, including leasehold property, to the plaintiffs, upon trust to convert the same and out of the proceeds to pay her debts, the funeral and testamentary expenses, and the pecuniary legacies, duty, and other payments thereinbefore H mentioned, certain other legacies, and an annuity. The will provided :

I "And upon further trust, out of such part of my said personal estate as the law permits to be appropriated by will to charitable purposes, to pay the following legacies to the treasurers or other proper officers respectively of the respective charities, institutions, or societies hereinafter mentioned (whose respective receipts shall be effectual discharges for the same), and to be applicable for the general purposes of such respective charities, institutions, and societies, viz.: To the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, the sum of £200; to the Society for the Protection of Animals liable to Vivisection, £100; to the Metropolitan and City Police Orphanage, Twickenham, £100; to the Police Fund for Officers of Police who have lost their health, and have been obliged to retire from the service, and known as the Metropolitan Police Superannuation Fund, £200; to the Royal Orthopædic Hospital, Oxford Street, Middlesex, £100; to the Central London

Ophthalmic Hospital, Gray's Inn Road, £200; to the London Orphan Asylum, Watford, formerly at Clapton, £100; to the Protestant Blind Pension Society of Southwark Bridge Road, £200; to the School for the Indigent Blind, situate in St. George's Fields, Southwark, £100; to the Ragged School Union, Exeter Hall, London, £100; to the Refuge for Homeless Boys, Great Queen Street, London, £300, to be applied as to £100 part thereof to the purposes of the Arethusa Training Ship, and as to £100 other part thereof to the purposes of the Chichester Training Ship in connection with the said Refuge, or to or for the purposes of such other training ship or ships, if any, as may at the time of the payment of the said legacy have taken the place of the said ships Arethusa and Chichester respectively; to the Royal Sea Bathing Infirmary at Margate, Kent, £200; to the West London Hospital, Hammer-smith Road, £200; to the Hospital for Consumption at Brompton, £200; to the Home for Lost Dogs, £100. And upon further trust to pay and distribute all the residue of that portion of my said personal estate which may by law be appropriated by will for such purpose among such charities, societies, and institutions (including or excluding those hereinbefore mentioned as may be preferred), and in such shares and proportions as the said Earl of Shaftesbury shall by writing nominate. . . ."

It appeared that a society was formed in 1875, under the title of "The Society for Protection of Animals liable to Vivisection," but that in August, 1878, the society changed its name to "The Victoria Street Society for Protection of Animals from Vivisection," and an affidavit stated that since the last-named date the object of the society had been the total abolition of the practice of vivisection.

The testatrix died on April 28, 1885, and her will was proved on June 16, 1885. She had considerable personal estate consisting of both pure and impure personalty. On July 23, 1885, Anthony, Earl of Shaftesbury, the person designated by the will, made his nomination in writing. He named 153 charities, societies, and institutions, to receive the residue of the testatrix's pure personalty, and divided such residue into 50,000 shares, and set opposite the name of each of the charities, societies, and institutions nominated the number of shares which in his opinion it ought to receive, giving some more than others. The trustees and executors brought this action against the defendant, the testatrix's sole next of kin, for the purpose of having the question determined whether the gift in favour of such charities, societies, and institutions as Lord Shaftesbury should nominate was valid, or void for uncertainty. On Aug. 4, 1886, on the further consideration of the action, KAY, J., decided that the words "charities, societies, and institutions," whatever they might mean if they stood alone, must, in the context of the will, mean charities, charitable societies, and charitable institutions. He made a declaration accordingly, and directed the pure personalty to be distributed on the footing of Lord Shaftesbury's appointment. His Lordship also held that the Home for Lost Dogs was a charity, inasmuch as it was an institution for the benefit of animals useful to man. The defendant appealed.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Maidlow for the defendant.

The Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.), Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, in support of the decision appealed from.

E. Ford and Chubb for other parties.

COTTON, L.J.—This appeal raises the question whether the residue of that portion of the testatrix's estate which may be properly applied for charitable purposes goes to the defendant as the next of kin of the testatrix, or is to be applied according to the discretion given by the testatrix to Lord Shaftesbury, who survived her and exercised that discretion. It is contended on behalf of the defendant that, in accordance with a well-established doctrine, there is no trust relating to this residue which can be executed by the court. As I understand,

A it is contended that, as Lord Shaftesbury is not restricted to the application of this money to charitable purposes—that is to say, what this court considers charity—and as the purposes are so indefinite, the whole thing fails.

B The defendant relies on the principle laid down in Morice v. Bishop of Durham (1), that where a gift is made without any definite object being pointed out, and there is merely a description of the character of the object to which the gift is to be applied, if that character is not charitable, then the court will not effectuate the gift in favour of the indefinite purposes pointed out, but will consider that the legatee, who clearly does not take for his own benefit, but as trustee, stands in the same position as if the gift had been made to him as a trustee and no trust had been declared—that is to say, as if he held it as a trustee for the next of kin. That is what is laid down in Morice v. Bishop of Durham (1), in C which case purposes not charitable were included among the objects in favour of which the legatee was to apply the legacies in question.

D Looking at the will in the present case I am of opinion that KAY, J., was right in holding that the indefinite objects pointed out by the testatrix as those to which the fund was to be applied at the discretion of Lord Shaftesbury, were charitable. The words used, which occur in the introduction of the gift on which Lord Shaftesbury was to exercise his discretion, are :

E “for such purpose among such charities, societies, and institutions (including or excluding those hereinbefore mentioned as may be preferred) and in such shares and proportions as the said Earl of Shaftesbury shall by writing nominate.”

This follows a gift to a number of definite objects—“definite” in the sense that the particular institutions are pointed out which are to be the objects of the testatrix’s bounty as respects the particular legacies which she has given.

F Was KAY, J., right in holding that the power to apply to the “charities, societies, and institutions,” taking those words alone, was an appropriation to charity? I think he was. One must look closely at the will throughout in order to determine what the words I have referred to mean. The testatrix divided her personal estate into two portions, and directed that that portion which by law could not be applied to charitable bequests should be applied in payment of certain legacies as in the will mentioned. She goes on :

G “And upon further trust, out of such part of my said personal estate as the law permits to be appropriated by will to charitable purposes, to pay the following legacies to the treasurers or other proper officers respectively of the respective charities, institutions, or societies hereinafter mentioned.”

H She then enumerates a number of societies and institutions. There is a question whether one, at least, of those societies or institutions [the Society for the Protection of Animals liable to Vivisection] is a charitable society, and for the purpose of determining this case, I assume that it was not a charitable society or institution at the time of the testatrix’s death. But, in my opinion, having regard to the institutions which the testatrix points out, and the objects indicated by their titles, and the object of this particular one at the time when it properly I held the title in question (“the Society for the Protection of Animals liable to Vivisection”), the testatrix referred to these societies as being in her mind charitable societies and as in her mind performing those duties and functions which would be considered as charitable by the Chancery Division.

When we come to the end of those particular gifts we find the words :

“And upon further trust to pay and distribute all the residue of that portion of my said personal estate which may by law be appropriated by will for such purpose among such charities, societies, and institutions and in such shares and proportions as the said Earl of Shaftesbury shall by writing A nominate."

The purpose mentioned must mean the charitable purposes which she had indicated. In my opinion, if one deals with the matter in that way, leaving out the words "including or excluding those [institutions &c.] hereinbefore mentioned as may be preferred," it is clear that, although the testatrix used those B three words, "charities, societies, and institutions," she had in her mind that which is expressed, and probably would be sufficiently expressed, by the first word used, "charities." Having contemplated the gifts to the particular institutions which she named, all of which, to my mind, she considered—and as regards the objects indicated by that description properly considered—as charities, what she means is not to allow Lord Shaftesbury to give to charities or, as an alternative, to a society or institution not charitable, but to point out new charities of such a nature as are administered or dealt with by societies or institutions, that is, something that is not a mere transitory charity, but has the nature of permanence in it—in other words, something in the nature of those objects which she has already pointed out. To my mind, those supporting KAY, J.'s, D decision have succeeded on the first point, which was a necessary point to be established by them on this will, having regard, not only to the particular words used in this portion of the will, but to the context, and general purport and object as indicated by the other portions of the will. There are, it is true, the words, "including or excluding those hereinbefore mentioned as may be preferred." The will gives to Lord Shaftesbury the duty and power of distributing the remainder of what I call, to use a common phrase, "pure personalty," among E charities, including or excluding those before mentioned as may be preferred. I have assumed that the institution which has been so much discussed [the Vivisection Society] is not one which this court would support as a charity, but, in my opinion, that will not make this gift bad. It is said that Lord Shaftesbury is enabled to include in the division of the estate purposes not charitable. I am of opinion that he is not authorised so to do by the words "charities, societies, F and institutions." That means charity administered by a society or institution, or administered by a body which could not strictly be called a society or institution. Then here are certain specified things which he may include in the distribution if he thinks fit.

Does that bring this case within the principle of Morice v. Bishop of Durham (1)? In my opinion, it does not. All that that case decided was that where G no definite object is pointed out as the object of the trust, the court says that that trust cannot be executed unless the court can itself determine how the money is to be applied, and that the court can only so determine where charity is the object. But if definite objects are pointed out, and a discretion is given to trustees to distribute property among those definite objects, then, in my H opinion, Morice v. Bishop of Durham (1) in no way decides that such a gift fails. Take a gift to A., B., and C., or any number of individuals, or institutions, in such proportions as a trustee or some other person shall name and appoint. If the person so designated does not exercise the discretion and power given, then the court will define the trust. It will do so, where the objects are definite, by deciding, unless there is something to show that the I contrary was the intention, that the fund to be administered, the subject of the trust, shall be divided equally among all the objects of the testatrix's bounty. The trustee, to whom a discretion is given, might have given it unequally—he might have excluded some if he had thought fit; but where the court, not having the discretion which is given to the trustee, has to administer the trust, in the absence of anything special in the instrument, it administers the trust by dividing the fund equally among the named and definite objects. In my opinion, the mere fact that there is, in addition to those named and definite objects,

A a general indefinite object which is charitable, will not make the gift bad. It would be good if it was limited to a charitable gift, although for purposes utterly indefinite, and the addition to that of definite purposes, though they are not all charities, will not, in my opinion, make the ultimate gift bad.

I do not think it necessary to decide, and it is better not to decide, whether, if this institution [the Vivisection Society], which I assume not to be a charity, B had come to ask for a division or a share of the fund, and none had been given to it, it could have been said that that was right, or whether it could be said it was wrong to give a share to it because it was not a charity. It may be that the meaning of the will is to give the money to be applied for charitable purposes, including such of the before-mentioned specified objects as are charities, and that any which was not a charity would not be properly treated by Lord C Shaftesbury as coming within those objects. But it is not necessary to decide that point. All I decide is that the mere addition to the general charitable purposes of certain definite objects does not make the gift bad because one of those objects is itself not a charity. In my opinion, the decision was right, and the appeal fails.

D LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. KAY, J., has declared that having regard to the context of the will, the words “charities, societies, and institutions” mean charities and charitable societies and charitable institutions. The defendant, who is the sole next of kin of the testatrix, asks the court to reverse that decision and to declare that, according to the true construction of the will of the testatrix, the words “charities, societies, and institutions,” in the power given to the Earl of Shaftesbury, are not restricted to charities, charitable societies, and charitable institutions, and that consequently the disposition of the pure personal estate is void. E

The questions which arise have been stated by COTTON, L.J., and when we come to look at the frame of the will, and to observe the care taken by this testatrix to divide the personal estate into that which can be given to charitable purposes and that which cannot, and when we look to the expression “charitable legacies” and “charitable purposes,” and to the marshalling clause, it appears to me that the court is almost forced to the conclusion that what she means by “charities, societies, and institutions” is charitable societies and charitable institutions as well as what she calls charities. I do not see how there can be any real doubt about that. Then she has specified a great number of institutions, and among them she has specified or referred to “the Society for the Protection of Animals liable to Vivisection” and “the Home for Lost Dogs.” We have had some discussion whether these can be regarded as charitable institutions. As described by her, I take it that there is no reasonable doubt that the bequest to the society which she mentions by the name “Society for the Protection of Animals liable to Vivisection” was a good charitable legacy. Whether there is now any such society, or whether the society with altered objects can be regarded as an object of a charitable bequest, is another matter altogether; but that she described this society, left her money to it, and contemplated it as a charitable society is, I think, manifest from the language which she has used. As regards “the Home for Lost Dogs,” on the authority of University of London v. Yarrow (2), I think it cannot be contended that that is not a charitable legacy or that in its nature the institution is not what is called a charitable institution. F G H I

Assuming that one or more of the institutions named are not charities, we have to consider what the effect of that is upon the gift of the ultimate residue. It has been contended, on the one side, that there is such uncertainty in that as to bring the case within Morice v. Bishop of Durham (1), and, on the other hand, it has been contended that if the testatrix in the earlier part of the will meant charitable societies and institutions, the mere addition of one or two institutions which are named but may not be charitable, does not introduce such an element of uncertainty as to make the latter part of her will void. It appears to me that that contention is right, and that the passage to which we were referred in JARMAN ON WILLS (4th Edn.), vol. 1, p. 217 and A.-G. v. Doyley (3), which is there referred to, enable those supporting KAY, J.'s, decision to succeed. When one looks at it closely, one sees that there is no such uncertainty in this case, construed as we construe it, as there was in Morice v. Bishop of Durham (1); nor do I think that any of the other objections which have been urged prove fatal to the title of these societies. I do not say—it is unnecessary to say—whether the Anti-Vivisection Society in its present shape is as good an object for a charitable bequest as it was. I say nothing at all about it one way or the other, but, assuming it was not, that will not vitiate this bequest. It appears to me, therefore, that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I entirely agree, resting my judgment on the grounds which have been mentioned, and reserving, if necessary, for further consideration in a future case, the question whether the Society for the Protection of Animals liable to Vivisection in its present form is a charitable society within the meaning which this court puts on the term. I express no opinion one way or the other. I think we are right in not deciding that point finally, because the materials put before us as to the purposes of that society and its history are in a scattered and imperfect form.

Appeal dismissed.

[Reported 11 App. Cas. 469; 56 L.J.P. 1; 55 L.T. 790; 51 J.P. 307; 35 W.R. 337]

Will—Evidence—Lost will—Proof of contents by parol evidence—Need for evidence to be of extreme cogency—Court to be satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt—Post-testamentary declarations by testator—Proof of fact of legacies—Proof of disposition of residue—Jurisdiction to grant probate of residue.

The establishing of the contents of a lost will merely by parol evidence of the contents is extremely dangerous, and, therefore, to support a will which has been propounded, when its contents is sought to be proved by parol evidence only, that evidence ought to be of extreme cogency and such as to satisfy the court beyond all reasonable doubt that there really is before the court substantially the testamentary intention of the testator.

Semble: When it is sought to establish by parol evidence the contents of a lost will and there is proved the bare fact that the will contained legacies, but there is no evidence with regard to their amount, and there is, however, some evidence as to the disposition of the residue, the court will hesitate to grant probate of the residue and give the whole to the residuary legatee.

Quaere whether post-testamentary declarations of the testator are admissible to prove the contents of a lost will.

Appeal by the defendants in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal (COTTON, LINDLEY, and FRY, L.JJ.), reported 1 T.L.R. 590, reversing an order of BUTT, J.

The action was brought by the respondents in the Probate Division as next of kin of one John Hill Morgan, deceased, claiming administration of his estate, with a will, dated in 1868, annexed. The appellants set up a lost will, said to be dated in 1877 or 1878, under which they alleged that they were interested as legatees. It appeared that the testator was possessed of both real and personal property of considerable value, and the evidence adduced by the appellants was that, in the year 1877, he went to a Mr. Peters, a solicitor in Bristol, with whom he was on terms of intimate friendship, and asked him to make his will. He produced a list of names of persons to whom he wished to leave money, with various sums set against some of the names, and then said that he intended to make Peters his executor and residuary legatee, upon which Peters declined to draw his will for him. Afterwards he was said to have gone to a Mr. Perrin, also at that time a solicitor in Bristol, and to have instructed him to prepare a will, which he afterwards executed. He afterwards told Peters that he had made his will as he had intended, and mentioned in conversation with other persons that he had left them money by his will. He was also said to have had a conversation with Peters shortly before his death, in which he referred to the fact that Peters was his residuary legatee. The testator died suddenly, in consequence of an accident, in June, 1883. Some time before his death, namely, in November, 1881, Perrin, the solicitor who was said to have made his will, absconded from Bristol under discreditable circumstances, and was made bankrupt. The trustee under the bankruptcy took possession of his papers, but no will of the testator was found among them. The only will found among the testator's papers was the will of 1868. In answer to advertisements put forward by Peters, three persons who had formerly been clerks in the employment of Perrin came forward and stated that a will had been made for the testator by Perrin, and had been duly executed by the testator, and had remained in Perrin's possession, but neither of them professed to have any remembrance of the contents of the will. BUTT, J., pronounced in favour of the lost will, but his decision was reversed in the Court of Appeal, and the defendants appealed to the House of Lords.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

July 16, 1886. LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., read the following opinion:—The plaintiffs in this action claim letters of administration as the next of kin of John Hill Morgan. In answer to this claim the defendants, who are the appellants before your Lordships' House, propounded an alleged will of the testator, executed towards the latter end of 1877 or the beginning of 1878, and BUTT, J., granted probate of this will. The Court of Appeal reversed his decision on the ground that the defendants had not established the contents of the will which they propounded, and I think they were right in the conclusion at which they arrived. A B

Both courts were satisfied that a will was in fact duly executed by Morgan. [HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence, including that of persons who stated that the testator had told them that he had made certain provision for other persons, and continued:] Nothing can be more dangerous, I think, than to accept as evidence, to carry with it weight, of the contents of a will, the evidence of persons of statements made to them of bounties which they are to receive after the death of the person who made those statements. Of course I do not say that in no case can a will be established by parol evidence. I do not dissent from the view expressed in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (1), where a will which had been propounded was supported by parol evidence; but I cannot help thinking that, as regards the will which was propounded in the present case, some of the legacies contained in it, and the most important legacies, are practically supported by no evidence at all. I cannot but be alive to the extreme danger of establishing a will merely by parol evidence of its contents. The legislature has endeavoured to protect the interests and rights of testators by requiring that the expression of their testamentary intentions shall be authenticated in such a manner as to leave no doubt, if possible, that the court has before it that which really expresses the will and intention of the testator. It is not enough that it is in his own handwriting; it must, even if in his own handwriting, be authenticated by witnesses who must be present and see the testator sign, and must sign in each other's presence. But if upon mere loose statements of the recollection of witnesses as to what has been said to them at some time or other, you were to grant probate of, and to establish as the will of the testator, something which no one had ever seen or purported to be able to depose to from recollection, it seems to me that you would be doing that which would be in the highest degree dangerous, and the more so when these statements are statements of witnesses (and one knows how fallible human memory is even when there is no interest to bias it) who have the strongest possible interest in remembering what they remember, and in forgetting what they forget. C D E F G

I think, therefore, that, in order to support a will propounded, when it is proved by parol evidence only, that evidence ought to be of extreme cogency, and such as to satisfy one beyond all reasonable doubt that there really is before one substantially the testamentary intention of the testator. It is said that, at all events, the residuary clause of the present will is well established, and that upon the authority of Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (1) probate of it should be granted, even if the court be not satisfied that it has before it the rest of the testamentary intentions of the testator. In Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (1) the facts were very different from the facts here. The evidence, it is true, was the evidence of a person much interested in establishing the will, but it was the evidence, to begin with, of a person who had seen the will and was giving a recollection of its contents. In the next place, that evidence was corroborated in the strongest possible way, and in the most material particulars, by written documents about which there could be no question. Moreover, the court were satisfied that, although there might be some few legacies which were omitted in the recital of the legacies by Miss Sugden, yet there could not be many, but must be few, and they could not be of any material consequence. The court were satisfied that they had the substantial testamentary dispositions brought to their minds. H I

It is quite true that SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., used certain language upon which much reliance has been placed by the appellants. It is said that he laid

A down the proposition that, though you have no evidence, except as to the residuary clause, beyond the fact that there are legacies of which you know nothing, you are bound to grant probate of that residuary clause, even though you grant probate of nothing else. The language relied on is this (1 P.D. at pp. 232, 233) :

B “The argument as to the personal estate was this: It was said, if it is proved to your satisfaction that legacies are omitted, then, by granting probate of the will which disposes of the residue, you are giving a larger proportion of the personal estate to the residuary legatees than was intended for them by the testator, and in so granting probate you are not only not performing the intention, but you are acting contrary to the intention of the testator.”

C That was the argument, then, of those who were opposing the probate. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said (ibid. at p. 233) :

D “This argument appears to me to be fallacious; it turns on the use made of the word ‘intention.’ It seems to me that the testator may be said to have in this respect two intentions—he has a primary intention that the legatee, whether general or specific, shall take the legacy—he has a secondary intention that, if by any reason whatever that legacy cannot take effect, then it is to go, not to his next of kin, but to his residuary legatees. It may well be that we are not able to give effect to the primary intention, but we are certainly able to give effect to the secondary intention; and I see no reason why we should not give effect to the secondary intention because the circumstances which have happened have made it impossible to carry out the primary one to the extent of the legacies, the amount of which, and the names of the legatees of which, we do not know.”

E If that is intended to lay down a universal proposition that, whenever you have evidence as to the gift of a residue, whatever you may know about the rest of the will and the legacies given by it, and however clear it may be that there were large legacies given by it, if you are not able to prove the amount of those legacies, you are still bound to grant probate of the residue, and give the whole to the residuary legatee, I do not say that I dissent from the view, but I certainly hesitate before giving my assent to it. It may be that, according to the law as administered in the Probate Court, that ought to be done; but certainly, with all deference, I cannot give my assent to the reasons expressed by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R. It does not seem to me that the testator always has this secondary intention, that, if the primary intention of giving the legacies should fail, the residuary legatee should get the benefit. No doubt the law gives the residuary legatee the benefit, though I doubt very much whether the testator ever thinks of it, supposing a legacy to fail. But accepting that view in a case where the will is forthcoming, and a bequest has failed because it is impossible that the object of the testator’s bounty can take it, I certainly cannot come to the conclusion that a testator ever contemplates or ever dreams that the residuary legatee is to get the benefit of the whole bequest, supposing that by the loss of the will you are unable to ascertain who the objects of the testator’s bounty were, though there undoubtedly were such objects of his bounty whom he intended to benefit in preference to the residuary legatee.

H I It may be a rule of law that under such circumstances you must grant probate, and the residuary legatee must have the benefit, but I certainly cannot accept it as being necessarily a carrying out of the intentions of the testator. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., says that he intends it to go not to the next of kin, but to the residuary legatee. Supposing that a witness comes and says: “I was left residuary legatee under a will. I know that there were a great many legacies, amounting to a large sum of money, say £100,000, and that there was very little left to go to the residuary legatee. I know that those large legacies were left to the testator’s next of kin, but I cannot remember all their names, nor how much was left to any one of them." In such a case undoubtedly it was not the intention of the testator that the residuary legatee should be benefited to the exclusion of the next of kin, and you would be defeating his manifest and certain intentions if you were to give the money to the residuary legatee. Would you in such a case be bound to grant probate of the residue upon such evidence as that? I certainly for my part cannot help expressing a doubt whether you would, and whether you would ever be justified in granting probate of a will which was proved merely by parol evidence of its contents, unless you were satisfied that you had before you evidence substantially of the intentions of the testator, so that the grant of probate of the residue would substantially carry those intentions into effect. In this case, which is certainly a very different one from Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (1), upon which I do not mean to cast the slightest doubt, it is not necessary to decide that point; but inasmuch as it was urged strongly before us, having regard to the language to which I have just called attention, that we were bound to grant probate of this residuary clause unless we were prepared to impute perjury to Peters, I must say for my part that I cannot assent to that reasoning at all.

There was one other point upon which the court below was bound by the authority of Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (1), but it would be open to review in this House, and I wish to reserve my opinion upon it. It will be observed that the only evidence of the contents of the will in this case are the post-testamentary declarations of the testator. If these declarations be inadmissible, then there is absolutely no evidence to support the case of those who are propounding the will. As the court below came to the conclusion that, even admitting them, the will was not established, and as we concur—for I believe all your Lordships concur—in that view, the question does not arise here for determination; but, as far as I am concerned, I desire to guard against its being supposed that I hold that these post-testamentary declarations are admissible. It is a matter which has given rise to considerable difference of judicial opinion. LORD PENZANCE distinctly decided that they were not admissible in Quick v. Quick and Quick (2), and I think that a dictum of LORD CAMPBELL in Doe d. Shallcross v. Palmer (3) indicates that he took the same view. The majority of the Court of Appeal in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (1), consisting of SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J., SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., JAMES and BAGGALLAY, L.JJ., were of opinion that the evidence was admissible, but MELLISH, L.J., took the contrary view. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in giving his reasons for holding this evidence to be admissible, lays down first of all the general rule of law, which he admits would exclude statements of this description, but then he says there are certain exceptions, certain principal exceptions, and certain subordinate exceptions. The principal exceptions which he names are declarations accompanying an act, declarations against interest, and declarations made by a person in the course of business which it was his duty to make. The subordinate exceptions which he names are in matters of public and general interest, and in matters of pedigree. Undoubtedly these are all well-recognised and long-established exceptions to the general rule. But SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., proceeds to say that there is a principle underlying all these exceptions, and that principle he states thus (1 P.D. at p. 241):

"In the first place, the case must be one in which it is difficult to obtain other evidence, for no doubt the ground of admitting the exceptions was that very difficulty. In the next place, the declarant must be disinterested; that is, disinterested in the sense that the declaration was not made in favour of his interest. And, thirdly, the declaration must be made before dispute or litigation, so that it was made without bias on account of the existence of a dispute or litigation which the declarant might be supposed to favour. Lastly, and this appears to me to be one of the strongest reasons for admitting it, the declarant must have had peculiar means of knowledge not possessed in ordinary cases."

Finding that principle underlying the exceptions to which he has alluded, he then seems to come to the conclusion that, whenever you find those conditions satisfied, you are justified in making a new exception, although it has never hitherto been recognised in the law.

It appears to me that, if that view be adopted, the extension of those principles to a case like the present would equally afford authority for many additional exceptions hitherto unknown to the law. It is much broader than would merely support the particular extension of the exceptions which SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., was then upholding; and I cannot help feeling that, for the courts to add at will from time to time any new exceptions which appear to be capable of being supported on principles similar to those which have been long established, would be introducing a dangerous uncertainty into the law of evidence. It appears to me that there is much to be said in support of the view which is forcibly expressed by MELLISH, L.J. He says (1 P.D. at pp. 251, 252) :

“It does not come within any of the rules which have been hitherto established, and I doubt whether it is an advisable thing to establish new exceptions in a case which has never happened before and may never happen again, for you then establish an exception which more or less throws a doubt on the law. It appears to me that it would be better to leave it to the legislature to make the improvement, which, in my opinion, ought to be made, in our present rules with regard to the admissibility of evidence of that description.”

No doubt there are many countries, and, indeed, Scotland is one of them, where the law permits declarations of persons who are dead to be given in evidence in all cases in which they were made under circumstances in which such evidence ought properly to have been admitted if the person had been living, and there is much to be said for that law as compared with our own; but certainly I have always understood that law to differ from our law, and I cannot help feeling that, if we were to adopt in full the reasoning of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., it would practically wipe away all such distinction, which is, in my opinion, the function of the legislature and not of the courts. I do not desire to be understood as dissenting from the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (1) upon this point. I have expressed the doubts which I entertain; all I desire is to leave the question open should it hereafter come before your Lordships' House for decision. That disposes of all the matters arising upon the appeal, and I move your Lordships that the judgment be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I agree completely in saying that the judgment of the Court of Appeal appealed against, in which they held that upon the evidence before them the contents of the will were not sufficiently established, therein reversing the decision of BUTT, J., was right. I think that on that evidence there was no evidence of the contents of the will. All it tends to show, and it is evidence to show, that such a will was executed; but there is not one morsel of evidence of its contents. The really important question is: Is there evidence enough of its contents? I am not going further into it than to say that I think the evidence which I have mentioned, the declarations of the deceased, such as: “I have remembered you in my will,” or “treated you handsomely,” or anything of that sort, if admissible, are evidence that, in my mind, should have very little weight indeed given to it. I wish to guard myself, as the Lord Chancellor did, against being supposed, except so far as it is necessary for the present case, to be either affirming or disaffirming the decision which was come to in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (1), or the propositions of law there laid down. I wish to leave them just in the same way as before, as far as I am concerned. Very considerable reasons have been given for doubting some of the propositions and doctrines laid down there, and they may be shaken to some extent, but the decision of this House will not make that case better or worse A as an authority than it was before. It is quite sufficient to say that, if these declarations are admissible as evidence, and are treated as such, they certainly are not sufficient to show what the contents of the will were, and, therefore, the judgment appealed against is right.

LORD FITZGERALD.—I concur in thinking that the decision of the Court B of Appeal ought to be affirmed. I am quite willing to follow the great judges who decided Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (1) in the conclusions at which they finally arrived, but I am not disposed to go one hair's breadth beyond. That case might be truly said to have reached the very verge of the law, and it ought not to be extended. The short view which I take of the present case is that there is no satisfactory evidence of the contents of this will. Assuming that C the factum of a will has been established to the satisfaction of the court, I can find no evidence whatever as to the contents of the will which would justify the court in acting upon it. The declarations of the testator have been offered and received in evidence. Still, even the testator, after the supposed execution of this testamentary instrument, never tells us what its contents were. There are some obscure statements, no doubt, such as that he made a will according D to his expressed intention, but beyond that there is no evidence whatever of any statement by him of the contents of the will, and if I were acting as a judge in the Probate Court, I should hold that there was no evidence sufficient to warrant me in granting probate of the supposed will.

There is another question whether, even supposing that there was some satisfactory evidence of the residuary bequest, the court ought to grant probate of the E residuary bequest alone, for the reasons stated in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (1). I do not intend to express any very strong opinion upon that, for I do not think that that question is before us. I do not think that there is any satisfactory evidence that there was in this will a residuary bequest in favour of Peters. He never saw it; the testator never tells us of it; and the witnesses in favour of the factum of the will, who are produced under circumstances not free F from suspicion, do not tell us one word of the contents of the will or of this residuary bequest. A testator, when dealing with the residue of his property, must be taken to contemplate that the bequests previously given, or some of them, may fail, or that a legatee may die, and, therefore, he may be deemed to have had the intention that the lapsed legacy should fall into the residue; but it is a very different proposition that he intended that, if his will were stolen or lost G and there were no evidence of the other bequests contained in it, the residuary legatee should take the whole of his property. Here the personalty is estimated at £25,000, and the realty is said to be worth £10,000. If we accepted that proposition we should infer that the testator intended, under such circumstances as are supposed to exist in the present case, that the residuary legatee was to take the whole of his estate. Whenever that question arises, to be fairly H raised and discussed, it will be for the House to decide it; but it is in no way before us. A good deal has been said as to the admissibility in evidence of parol statements of testators alleged to have been made after the factum of the will. Upon that I wish to reserve my opinion. My impression is that, however such statements of the testator were dealt with in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards (1), I the true ground upon which such evidence ought to be received, if received at all, was not fully discussed, and it is not necessary to decide it now. Therefore I reserve my opinion upon it.

Appeal dismissed.

Insurance—Marine insurance—Risks insured against—General words following specified risks—Construction ejusdem generis—Damage to donkey engine.

By a policy of marine insurance a ship including “machinery, shafting, propellers, boilers and connections, including donkey engines,” was insured against “adventures and perils . . . of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of mart and countermart, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes, and people . . . barratry of the master and mariners, and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the afore-said subject-matter of this insurance, or any part thereof.” While the ship was at anchor awaiting orders, for the purposes of the voyage it was necessary to pump up the main boilers by means of a donkey-pump and engine. In consequence of a screw-valve, which should have been open, being left closed, water was forced into the air-chamber of the donkey-engine and split it open.

Held: the general words in the policy must be interpreted with reference to the specific words which immediately preceded them, and, when they were so construed, the damage to the pump did not fall within them; furthermore, the damage was not due to the pump being in a ship or at sea and so it had no marine character; and, therefore, the damage, whether it occurred through negligence or by accident, was not covered by the policy.

West India Telegraph Co. v. Home & Colonial Insurance Co. (1) (1880), 6 Q.B.D. 51, disapproved.

Document—Construction—Common form of words—Construction by courts over many years—Mercantile instrument.

Per LORD HERSCHELL: Nothing would be more dangerous than to depart from a construction which the authorities have put on words in common use in a mercantile instrument, even if the propriety of the decision might originally have been open to question.

Appeal by the defendants in the action, an insurance company, from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ., LORD ESHER, M.R., dissenting), in an action brought by the owners of S.S. Inchmaree on a policy of marine insurance, reported 17 Q.B.D. 195, affirming a decision of the Queen's Bench Divisional Court (MATHEW and A. L. SMITH, JJ.), in favour of the plaintiffs.

The following statement of the facts, which were set out in a Special Case agreed between the parties, is taken from the opinion of LORD HERSCHELL. The policy sued on was a time policy for twelve months, from Aug. 20, 1883, to Aug. 20, 1884; and the subject-matter of insurance, "the hull, masts, spars, sails, boats, materials, and all stores, valued at £20,000; and machinery, shafting, propellers, boilers and connections, including donkey-engines and boilers, pumps and all connections, valued at £11,000." The risks against which the insurance was effected are thus described :

"And touching the adventures and perils which the capital, stock, and funds of the said company are made liable unto by this insurance, they are, of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of mart and countermart, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, or quality soever, barratry of the master and mariners, and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance, or any part thereof."

A On Mar. 2, 1884, the Inchmaree was at anchor off Diamond Island, awaiting orders, and for the purposes of the voyage it was necessary to pump up the main boilers, by means of a donkey-pump and engine, in the usual way. A pipe led from the donkey-pump to the boilers, and at its junction with one of the boilers there was a check-valve, capable of being opened or closed by a screw, which ought to have been kept open and clear when the boilers were being

B pumped up. This valve had either been left closed or had become salted up when the donkey-pump was set to work off Diamond Island, so that the water could not pass into the boiler. The consequence was that, when the donkey-pump was set to work, the pipes and water chamber in the donkey-pump, and the air chamber therein, became overcharged, and the water was forced up into

C the air chamber, which, in consequence, split, and the pump was thereby damaged. It was admitted for the purposes of the case that the check-valve was either allowed to remain closed or to become salted up by the negligence of one of the engineers, or was accidentally salted up without being noticed, though reasonable care was taken by the engineers. It was also admitted that the closing or salting up and accident were not due to ordinary wear and tear.

D The cost of replacing the pump was about £72 10s. The ship and freight were warranted free from average under 3 per cent. unless the ship were stranded; but, as she did become stranded during the voyage, the loss was not excluded from the warranty. The parties were unable to agree whether there was negligence in allowing the check-valve to remain closed or to become salted up; but as the plaintiffs contended that the defendants were liable, whether there

E was negligence or not, it was agreed to leave that question for trial (if material) after the decision of the case. The questions stated for the opinion of the court were, whether the defendants were liable under the policy in respect of the loss, (i) if it could have been avoided by proper care, and occurred through negligence; (ii) if it occurred accidentally without negligence. The Queen's Bench Division gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and this decision was affirmed by the

F majority of the Court of Appeal (LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ., the Master of the Rolls, dissenting).

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

July 14, 1887. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case a policy of marine insurance for twelve months was effected upon, among other things, a pump on board the

H Inchmaree steamer. The adventures and perils to which the capital stock and funds of the defendant company were made liable by the policy of insurance were of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of mart and countermart, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, or quality soever, barratry of the master and mariners, and of

I “all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance or any part thereof.”

It is certain that a loss or misfortune happened to the pump while the pump was being used for the purpose of filling the boilers of the Inchmaree, and the sole question is whether the loss or misfortune which did happen was one of the losses or misfortunes against which the insuring company agree to indemnify the owners of the Inchmaree. If understood in their widest sense, the words are wide enough to include it; but two rules of construction now firmly established as part of our law may be considered as limiting those words. One is, that words, however general, may be limited with respect to a subject-matter in relation to which they are used. The other is, that general words may be restricted to the same genus as the specific words that precede them. There is, perhaps, a third consideration which cannot be overlooked, and that is that where the same words have for many years received a judicial construction, it is not unreasonable to suppose that parties have contracted upon the belief that their words will be understood in what I will call the accepted sense. And it is to be remembered that what courts have to do in construing all written documents is to reach the meaning of the parties through the words they have used.

The facts here are very simple. A part of the pump burst because a valve which should have let the water into the boiler was stopped up while the pump was being worked by a donkey-engine. On the one side it is said that filling the boiler was necessary to enable the ship to prosecute her voyage; on the other it is said that the accident, peril, or misfortune had nothing to do with the sea, and was in no sense of the like kind with any of the perils or misfortunes specifically enumerated. In the long line of cases quoted at the Bar there was only one (with which I will attempt to deal presently) which enunciated any different principles of construction from those I have endeavoured to set forth above, although I think there is some difficulty in reconciling the facts with respect to which some of them are decided with the principle upon which they profess to be decided, conspicuously, I think, Deraux v. J'Anson (2), where TINDAL, C.J., rests upon authorities which, as applicable to the particular facts of the cases to which he refers, hardly support the decision then arrived at.

The great difficulty I have had in this case is the decision of LORD SELBORNE, L.C., and COCKBURN, C.J., in West India Telegraph Co. v. Home and Colonial Insurance Co. (1). I cannot agree with the Master of the Rolls that that case does not, as matter of reasoning, cover the present case. With the utmost respect, I can draw no real distinction between the explosion of the boiler in that case and the bursting of the air chamber of the pump in the present case, nor can any real distinction depend upon whether it was steam generated by fire which caused the explosion or air and water forced into the chamber by ordinary mechanical action. But before your Lordships that case is open to review, and I cannot think that it is reconcilable with the principles upon which policies of marine insurance have hitherto been construed. It introduces analogy as the guide by which you are to ascertain the genus to which the different species are to be attributed; so that in the future one must introduce as the true exposition of general words not the genus you find as applicable to the species enumerated, but any analogous genus. Sea perils or the like become enlarged into perils whose only connection with the sea is that they arise from machinery which gives motive power to ships. I cannot think that even were the analogy perfect, which I do not think it is, this is a satisfactory mode of ascertaining what the parties meant by the words they have used; and, as I have said, this is the real function of a court in construing an instrument. It might be reasonable for the parties to provide for such peril, and one knows that "dangers of and incident to steam navigation" are words which have been used to provide for such casualties; but I cannot think that such casualties were in the contemplation of the parties when using the old familiar words of this policy. I think the subject-matter, marine risks, limits the meaning of the general words. I think the genus "perils of the sea" limits the meaning. I think the meaning attributed to these words for more than half a century by decision makes it probable that the parties used them in that accepted sense. I, therefore, think the judgment of the Court of Appeal wrong, and I move your Lordships that it be reversed.

A LORD BRAMWELL.—I cannot agree with the judgment in this case. The donkey-engine was insured. The adventures and perils which the defendants were to make good specified a great many perils, and

“all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance or any part thereof.”

B Words could hardly be more extensive, and if the question, I ought to say a question on them, arose for the first time, I might perhaps give them their natural meaning, and say they included this case. But the question does not arise for the first time. It has arisen from time to time for centuries, and a limitation has always been put on the words in question.

C Definitions are most difficult, but LORD ELLENBOROUGH's in Cullen v. Butler (4) (5 M. & S. at p. 465), seems right :

“All cases of marine damage of the like kind with those specially enumerated, and occasioned by similar causes.”

D I have had given to me the following definition or description of what would be included in the general words :

“Every accidental circumstance not the result of ordinary wear and tear, delay, or of the act of the assured, happening in the course of the navigation of the ship, and incidental to the navigation, and causing loss to the subject-matter of insurance.”

E Probably a severe criticism might detect some faults in this. There are few definitions in which that could not be done. I think the definition of LOPES, L.J., in Pandorf & Co. v. Hamilton, Fraser & Co. (3) (16 Q.B.D. at p. 633) very good :

“In a seaworthy ship damage to goods caused by the action of the sea during transit not attributable to the fault of anybody”

F is a damage from a peril of the sea. I have thought that the following might suffice : “All perils, losses, and misfortunes of a marine character, or of a character incident to a ship as such.” I put it forward with distrust, but it would comprehend all the cases cited where the assured has recovered, save perhaps West India Telegraph Co. v. Home and Colonial Insurance Co. (1). For

G example, it would include the case of the ship blown over while in dock, of the ship damaged by its moorings giving way, of the ship fired into by another ship. It would not include the cases put by LORD ESHER, M.R., nor the case I put during the argument of the captain seized with giddiness dropping the chronometer into the hold, nor would it include the present case. The damage to the donkey-engine was not through its being in a ship or at sea. The same thing

H would have happened had the boilers and engines been on land, if the same mismanagement had taken place. The sea, waves, and winds had nothing to do with it.

As a matter of principle and reasoning, I think the decision wrong. I think the judgment in West India Telegraph Co. v. Home and Colonial Insurance Co. (1) wrong on the reasoning I have used. With most sincere respect, though it is true

I that what the winds are to a sailing vessel, steam is to a steamer, that does not decide the question, for it is not every damage to sails that would be covered by the policy. Suppose damage by rats or mildew to spare sails. As to LORD ESHER's judgment in that case, I concur in his criticism on it in the present case, and I agree with LOPES, L.J., that the word “fire” in the policy will not sustain that judgment. The lord justice puts the case of a spar falling on the deck, while getting under sail, and being broken, and says it would be within the policy. Perhaps; but if it would, it would be because it was a loss in navigation, a loss which could not have happened except on a ship. But suppose the spar was being used to erect an awning on deck to give shelter to dancers or the like, and was broken, the case would not be covered by the policy. It would not be a marine loss, not a loss with which the sea, or navigation, or the ship as a ship had anything to do. I do not like cutting down the natural meaning of words: there is always a great difficulty in saying what should be substituted. But it is admitted that some limit must be put on those in question here. I think a proper limit would exclude this loss; so that the judgment of LORD ESHER, M.R., is, I think, right, and that of the other judges wrong, and their decision should be reversed.

LORD HERSCHELL.—This action undoubtedly raises an important question. It turns on the construction to be put upon the general words which follow the specific enumeration of the risks against which the insurance is effected in an ordinary marine policy. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts, and continued]: It was not contended at the Bar on behalf of the respondents that the loss was within any of the specific risks enumerated. Reliance was placed exclusively upon the general words:

It cannot be denied that, if these words are to be taken without any limitation, a loss or misfortune did come to the damage of a part of the subject-matter of the insurance. But it is contended on behalf of the appellants that these general words, following a specific enumeration, must be limited to perils ejusdem generis with those specified, or, to put it in another way, that they must be construed with reference to the scope and purpose of the instrument in which they occur, viz., a policy of marine insurance. If the matter now presented itself for consideration for the first time, untouched by authority, I should not myself be inclined to construe these general words without some limitation. Indeed, the learned counsel for the respondents themselves did not contend for so wide an interpretation. The view which they put before the House was that they should be confined to accidents happening to the subject-matter of the insurance in the course of, and incidental to, the navigation. I think it will be found, upon examination of the authorities, that the general words in a marine policy have received from the courts, for a long series of years, a construction to which your Lordships would do well to adhere. The instrument is one in daily use, and if your Lordships were to put a new construction upon it you would be likely to defeat, and not to give effect to, the intention of the parties. Nothing would be more dangerous, in my opinion, than to depart from a construction which the authorities have put upon words in common use in a mercantile instrument, even if the propriety of the decision might originally have been open to question.

In a case which came before the Court of King's Bench, as long ago as 1816, LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, in clear and unambiguous terms expressed their view as to the meaning of the words in question. I refer to Cullen v. Butler (4). It was an action on a policy of insurance where the ship and goods had been sunk at sea by another ship firing upon her in mistake for an enemy. The court inclined to the opinion that the loss was not one by “perils of the sea,” but held that it was covered by the general words. LORD ELLENBOROUGH said (5 M. & S. at p. 465):

“The extent and meaning of the general words have not yet been the immediate subject of any judicial construction in our courts of law. As they must, however, be considered as introduced into the policy in furtherance of the objects of marine insurance, and may have the effect of extending a reasonable indemnity to many cases not distinctly covered by the special

A words, they are entitled to be considered as material and operative words, and to have the due effect assigned to them in the construction of the instrument, and this will be done by allowing them to comprehend and cover other cases of marine damage of the like kind with those which are specially enumerated and occasioned by similar causes."

B No case was cited at the Bar from the date when this opinion was expressed (unless it be the recent case of West India Telegraph Co. v. Home and Colonial Insurance Co. (1), to which I will presently advert), which has proceeded upon a construction of the policy different from that enunciated by LORD ELLENBOROUGH.

C I will briefly review the subsequent authorities. The first is Butler v. Wildman (5). There the captain of a ship had thrown a large quantity of dollars overboard, to prevent their falling into the hands of an enemy, by whom he was pursued. It was held that, if not a loss by jettison, it was covered by the general words. ABBOTT, C.J., says (3 B. & Ald. at p. 402):

"If not, strictly speaking by jettison, it is something ejusdem generis, and, therefore, falls within the general words."

D The other judges concurred in this view, HOLROYD, J., saying that the general words include

"all losses of the same nature with those described in the enumerated risks."

E Next in order of time comes Phillips v. Barber (6). A vessel placed in a graving dock for repair was, by the violence of wind and weather, thrown over on her side, whereby she struck the ground with great violence and was bilged. ABBOTT, C.J., in a judgment holding that the underwriters were liable, after quoting the general words contained in the policy, said (5 B. & Ald. at p. 164):

F "These general words are, indeed, restrained in construction to perils ejusdem generis with those more particularly enumerated in the policy. In this case, however, the loss was occasioned by the violence of the wind and weather in port, and it seems to me, therefore, to have been produced by a peril ejusdem generis with those specified, and to fall within the general words of the policy."

G The next case, Devaux v. J'Anson (2), was much relied on by the counsel for the respondents. But, though I feel some difficulty in explaining the grounds of that decision, it certainly purported to be based upon the antecedent authorities, and not upon any different view of the law. The ship had, in that case, been put into a dry dock for repairs. These being completed, preparations were made for getting her afloat. She was for this purpose made fast by four cables, while the workmen removed the sand which was under the vessel, and consolidated the shores upon which the ship was resting. The cables strained the vessel, forcing in the ribs. The stanchions of the kelsons having all fallen from the force of the lower masts upon the keel, the garboard strake gave way, and when at last the ship was no longer upon the shores she sank into a muddy sand. At the time of her sustaining the injury the depth of water in the dock was about four feet. She was abandoned as a constructive total loss, and the question arose whether she was lost by perils insured against. TINDAL, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, held that she was. He said (5 Bing.N.C. at p. 540):

I "It is to be observed the words in the policy are very large; the policy not only enumerates 'perils of the sea,' but 'all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that had or should come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the subject-matter of the insurance.' And the cases cited and relied on by the plaintiff—Carruthers v. Sydebotham (7), Fletcher v. Inglis (8), and Phillips v. Barber (6)—are sufficient authority to show that a loss occasioned by the endeavour to get the vessel afloat from the dock in which she had just been repaired, was a loss within the policy."

It is not easy, I confess, to see how the authorities referred to were sufficient A to establish the propositions they are supposed to support. In Carruthers v.
Sydebotham (7) the pilot navigating a vessel had fastened her to the pier of a dock basin in the Mersey by a rope to the shore. She took the ground, and when the tide left her fell over on her side and bilged, in consequence of which, B when the tide rose, she filled with water and her cargo was wetted. It was held that this was a stranding entitling the assured to recover for an average loss upon the goods. After a careful perusal of the judgments in this case, I am unable to see its bearing upon the point which had to be determined in Devaux v. J'Anson (2). Nor do I see the application of Fletcher v. Inglis (8). A vessel insured for twelve months was in a harbour with a hard, uneven bottom; the tide having left the vessel, on its return there was a considerable swell in the harbour and the C ship struck the ground hard several times and was found to be considerably damaged. It was held that this was a loss by peril of the sea. Still less am I able to perceive the applicability of Phillips v. Barber (6), to which I have referred above. There was nothing in Devaux v. J'Anson (2) that I can see corresponding with the wind and weather in port which was held in Phillips v.
Barber (6) to be ejusdem generis with a storm at sea. It is unnecessary to inquire D whether the decision in Devaux v. J'Anson (2) was correct. It cannot be regarded as throwing any doubt upon the canon of construction laid down by LORD ELLENBOROUGH, and more than once recognised and acted upon by LORD TENTERDEN.
Nor is it possible to evolve any principle from it applicable to other cases. No reasons are given for the judgment, which is based solely on prior authorities, and when these authorities are examined they only determine the one that a ship E damaged by a storm when in dry dock is damaged by causes similar to perils of the seas, and the others that vessels damaged by ceasing to be waterborne, and being driven against the ground by the action of the tide, are injured by "perils of the sea."

The last case to which I need refer on this point is Davidson v. Burnand (9) where WILLES, J., expressly recognised the rule of construction laid down in F Cullen v. Butler (4). He said (L.R. 4 C.P. at p. 120):

"The question, therefore, is, not whether the loss here was strictly one occasioned by perils of the sea, but whether it was such other loss within the policy, which of course must be a loss of the same or a similar kind to one happening from the perils of the sea."

I think, therefore, that the case now before your Lordships must be determined by a consideration of the question whether the loss falls within the general words as construed by LORD ELLENBOROUGH—that is, whether it is a case "of marine damage of the like kind with those which are specially enumerated and occasioned by similar causes." When the facts are borne in mind it seems H necessary only to state the question in this way to see that the answer must be in the negative. To which of the specially enumerated perils is it similar?
The only one that could be suggested is "perils of the seas." The damage here arose from the air chamber of the donkey-pump giving way under an excessive pressure of water owing to the proper outlet being closed. It is, I think, impossible to say that this is damage occasioned by a cause similar to "perils of I the sea" on any interpretation which has ever been applied to that term. It will be observed that LORD ELLENBOROUGH limits the operation of the clause to "marine damage." By this I do not understand him to mean only damage which has been caused by the sea, but damage of a character to which a marine adventure is subject. Such an adventure has its own perils, to which either it is exclusively subject or which possess in relation to it a special or peculiar character. To secure an indemnity against these is the purpose and object of a policy of marine insurance.

1 The respondents placed their main reliance upon West India Telegraph Co. v. Home and Colonial Insurance Co. (1), and naturally so, because the majority of the Court of Appeal thought the present case undistinguishable from it. LORD SELBORNE, L.C., and COCKBURN, C.J., in that case held that the damage done by the explosion of the boiler of a steamer was covered by the general words of a marine policy. LORD SELBORNE, after referring to the effect given to these words in 3 Devaux v. J'Anson (2), said (6 Q.B.D. at p. 57):

"I think it is at least as proper to hold that in the case of a steamship they cover damage occasioned by the explosion of the boiler in which the motive power necessary to her navigation is generated. What the winds are to a sailing vessel, steam is to a steamer; and it is as reasonable that marine insurers should bear the risks incident to a navigation by that kind of power, whether from excess of pressure in the boilers, or from defects of safety valves, or from neglect or mismanagement, making that dangerous which otherwise would not be so, as that they should bear losses occasioned by excessive pressure of wind, and defects or mismanagement of a ship's sails or tackle."

I have already given my reasons for doubting whether Devaux v. J'Anson (2)
 2 involved any principle which could possibly be extended by analogy to a case not precisely similar in its facts. Moreover, it is to be observed that in Devaux v. J'Anson (2) the damage done was done to the ship as such. It arose from her being constructed for the purpose of being waterborne, and thus needing some substituted support, if the support of the water was withdrawn; and the damage to the ship was due to her grounding, and the failure to keep her safely supported.
 E It is on this view alone, I think, that the case can be sustained. But the explosion of the boiler on board the Panama had no marine character at all. It might have happened in precisely the same way and done the same kind of damage, if the steam engine had been in use for the purpose of moving manufacturing machinery on shore. The real ground of LORD SELBORNE's judgment appears to have been the analogy between damage done by the excessive pressure of the winds in the case of a sailing vessel, and the excessive pressure of steam in the boiler when the motive power used to propel the vessel is steam. I am not satisfied that this analogy is a sound one; but, even if it be so, I am unable to see how it can be treated as an authority in the present case, still less as concluding it. The water in the donkey-engine, the over-pressure of which caused the damage, F was certainly not to the steamer "what the winds are to a sailing vessel," and
 G the damage was not, as it seems to me, in any way similar to the injury done to a sailing vessel by a storm of wind.

The present Master of the Rolls [LORD ESHER], although he concurred in the judgment of the majority of the court in the West India Telegraph Co. v. Home and Colonial Insurance Co. (1), differed in his reasons. He based his judgment
 H solely on the ground that the explosion was ejusdem generis with fire, and, therefore, the loss was within the general words. In the case now under appeal he intimated that this reasoning was somewhat fanciful, and that he should not be sorry to see it dissented from. I am certainly disposed to prefer the latter view of the learned judge; but it is not necessary to discuss the point, as it is obvious that such a ground of decision can have no bearing upon the case we have to deal
 I with. I may add, however, that since the term "fire" has been added to the specially enumerated risks (which has taken place in comparatively recent times), I think the general words may properly be extended to similar risks which would not have been included before. Upon the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in the court below was correct. I believe it not only to have been in accordance with the authorities, but in harmony with the common understanding of those who enter into contracts of marine insurance. Several instances were put in the course of the argument of disasters which are of common occurrence, and would seem to be just as much within the general words as that which is now in question, but in respect of which it has never been suggested that the underwriters were liable. I, accordingly, concur in the judgment which has been moved. A

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—In March, 1884, the Inchmaree was off Diamond Island lying at anchor, and about to prosecute her voyage. It was necessary to fill up her boilers. There was a donkey-engine and a donkey-pump on board, and the donkey-engine was set to pump up water from the sea into the boilers. Those in charge of the operation did not take the precaution of making sure that the valve of the aperture leading into one of the boilers was open. This valve happened to be closed. The result was that the water, being unable to make its way into the boiler, was forced back and split the air chamber and so disabled the pump. That was the beginning and the end of the misfortune. At this time the Inchmaree with her machinery, including the donkey-engine, was insured by a time policy. The question is: Was the loss which resulted from this mishap covered by the policy or not? B C

The policy contained the common clause describing the risks which the underwriters were content to bear. The clause begins in the usual way by specifying certain particular cases, perils of the seas and other well-known risks, to which the indemnity was to extend. Then follow general words apparently providing for every conceivable loss or misfortune that could happen to the subject-matter of the insurance. It was not contended that the mishap in question fell within any of the particular cases enumerated. The argument turned on the effect of the general words. According to the ordinary rules of construction these words must be interpreted with reference to the words which immediately precede them. They were no doubt inserted to prevent disputes founded on nice distinctions. Their office is to cover in terms whatever may be within the spirit of the cases previously enumerated, and so they have a greater or less effect as a narrower or broader view is taken of those cases. For example, if the expression “perils of the seas” is given its widest sense, the general words have little or no effect as applied to that case. If, on the other hand, that expression is to receive a limited construction, as apparently it did in Cullen v. Butler (4), and loss by perils of the seas is to be confined to loss ex marinæ tempestatis discrimine, the general words become most important. But still, ever since Cullen v. Butler (4), when they first became the subject of judicial construction, they have always been held or assumed to be restricted to cases “akin to” or “resembling” or “of the same kind” as those specially mentioned. I see no reason for departing from this settled rule. In marine insurance it is above all things necessary to abide by settled rules, and to avoid anything like novel refinements or a new departure. It was objected by counsel for the respondents that the rule of ejusdem generis does not apply unless you can find a common characteristic running through or underlying the previous words. I do not know that this is so—at any rate, where several cases are enumerated leading to a common result, or intended to be met by a common remedy. D E F G H

A familiar instance occurs in the Companies Act, 1862 and the earlier Act of 1848, in the sections which provide for winding-up. There are several sub-sections specifying various cases in which a winding-up order may be made, and then there is a sub-section providing that the court may make an order whenever it thinks it just and equitable. Under both Acts those general words have always been held to be restricted to cases ejusdem generis with those previously mentioned, and not to give the court a general power to make an order whenever it thinks right to do so. Your Lordships were asked to draw the line, and to give an exact and authoritative definition of the meaning of the expression “perils of the seas” explained or enlarged by or in connection with the general words. For my part, I decline to attempt any such task. I do not think it is possible to frame a definition which would include every case proper to be included and I

A no other. I think that each case must be considered with reference to its own circumstances, and that the circumstances of each case must be looked at in a broad, common-sense view, and not by the light of strained analogies and fanciful resemblances. In the present case, although the Court of Appeal has properly treated the general words as restricted to cases ejusdem generis with those specially enumerated, the majority of the court has held the accident within the policy. I am unable to adopt their conclusion. The accident, in my opinion, was not due to the "perils of the seas," using that expression in the widest sense that I can give to it, nor did it result in sea damage of any kind. I am, therefore, of opinion that the view of the Master of the Rolls is correct, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal must be reversed.

E MATTHEWS AND ANOTHER v. MUNSTER

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.), November 28, 1887]

Counsel—Authority—Conduct of action—Settlement—Absence of client—Binding effect of settlement.

G As against the client, the authority of an advocate is unlimited in the conduct of a cause in court, but the authority is not unlimited in the sense that it cannot be overruled, because it is part of the conduct of the cause, and is, therefore, under the supervision of the court who will not allow injustice to be done. The authority can, however, be withdrawn by the client at any minute. In that case the client must take care to let the other side know that the authority has been withdrawn.

H An action for malicious prosecution was settled by counsel in the course of the trial upon the terms that there should be a verdict for the plaintiffs for £350, and that all imputations should be withdrawn. The defendant was not present when the settlement was arrived at, and upon coming to the court later he repudiated it.

I Held: as the defendant was not present when the settlement was made, he could not have put an end to the relationship of advocate and client which existed between himself and his counsel; his counsel, therefore, still had complete authority in the cause; and the defendant was bound by the settlement.

Appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court refusing to set aside a compromise and order a new trial in an action brought for malicious prosecution.

On the morning of the second day of the trial, when the plaintiffs' case had closed and the defendant, who was coming up from Brighton, had not arrived, counsel upon both sides agreed upon a settlement of the action. The terms of the settlement were, that there should be a verdict for the plaintiffs for £350 and costs, and that there should be a withdrawal of imputations. The case thereupon terminated; but the defendant, upon coming into court an hour afterwards, at once repudiated the compromise. The defendant subsequently moved to set aside the compromise and for a new trial of the action. Upon the hearing of the motion, an affidavit by the defendant was read, in which he said that he had given no instructions for a compromise, and entirely repudiated the terms of it. The Divisional Court refused to set aside the compromise. The defendant appealed.

E. Wilberforce (H. R. Wilson with him) for the defendant.

Kemp, Q.C., and J. Arthur for the plaintiffs, were not called on to argue.

LORD ESHER, M.R. In this case an action was brought for malicious prosecution. At the trial counsel appeared for the defendant, but the defendant himself was not present. In the course of the case the defendant's counsel, actuated only by the desire of doing what was best for his client, submitted to a verdict against him for £350 upon the terms that all imputations should be withdrawn. The defendant now wishes for a new trial on the ground that his counsel did that which he was not authorised to do.

That raises the question what is the relation between counsel and his client. This is sometimes put as being that of principal and agent. I do not myself adopt that phraseology. To my mind, there is a distinct relationship between advocate and client, and that relationship is best so described, namely, as that of advocate and client. The advocate acts not of his own motion, but because he is requested by the client to act for him. I have no doubt that the client may at any moment withdraw that request. As he cannot become the advocate in the case without the request of the client, so he cannot continue to be the advocate when that request is withdrawn. But when once the client has asked a particular counsel to act for him as advocate, he must know that he has thereby intimated to the other side that that is the person who is to act for him. I doubt whether a secret withdrawal of the client's request to the advocate, not made known to the other side (if one could conceive it possible that a counsel would continue to carry on a case after the client's request to him to do so had been withdrawn), would be sufficient. We need not, however, consider that question now.

A request to a counsel to act as advocate does not mean, of course, that he is to act for the client except as advocate. It is a request to him to do those things which an advocate does for his client. The profession of an advocate is merely to advise his client with reference to a case before it comes into court, but, as soon as it comes into court, to act for him altogether in the conduct of it. In court the advocate is acting as the superior in the matter, and has unlimited power as to the conduct of the case. That power is not unlimited in the sense that it cannot be overruled, because it is part of the conduct of the cause, and is therefore under the supervision of the court, who will not allow injustice to be done. If, therefore, the advocate does something which gives a clear advantage to the other side, and does clear injury to his own client, or makes a slip which results in injury to his client, the court can set aside the proceedings and order a new trial. But, as against his client, the authority of the advocate is unlimited in the conduct of a cause in court. That authority can be withdrawn by the client at any minute; but the client must take care to let the other side know that the authority has been withdrawn. If, when the client is present, the advocate is going to do something in court to which the client objects, the client cannot direct the advocate not to do it. If the client tells his counsel to do something other than that which the counsel thinks advisable, it is the duty of the counsel to say to the client, "Withdraw the authority you have given me to act for you and I will at once make that known to the other side, and will return my brief." That is the only way in which the client can get rid of the authority of the counsel. That authority, however, is strictly limited to the conduct of the cause. If a counsel were to do something beyond what was fairly necessary for the conduct of the cause, that would not be binding upon his client. He has no request to do more than that which his duty as an advocate requires.

It, therefore, becomes necessary to consider what acts may fairly be regarded as necessary in the conduct of a cause. I think that the principle has been as well expressed as it can be by POLLOCK, C.B., in Swinfen v. Lord Chelmsford (1). He says (5 H. & N. at p. 922) :

"We are of opinion that, although a counsel has complete authority over the suit, the mode of conducting it, and all that is incident to it, . . . we think he has not, by virtue of his retainer in the suit, any power over matters that are collateral to it."

That is the limitation—I will not say of the authority—but of the power of the counsel. Then he gives instances, which I purposely omitted in reading the passage, but which I will read now, of what is incidental to the conduct of the suit—

"such as withdrawing the record, withdrawing a juror, calling no witnesses, or selecting such as, in his discretion, he thinks ought to be called, and other matters which properly belong to the suit and the management and conduct of the trial."

It follows from that that he thinks that there are many things which properly belong to the management and conduct of the trial besides those which he specifies.

One of the things that must properly belong to the management and conduct of the trial must be the assenting to a verdict for a particular amount and upon particular terms. In the present case the amount was £350, and the terms were that all imputations should be withdrawn. It is impossible to say that such an arrangement must be an unreasonable one. Counsel may see that if the case goes to the jury a verdict for a very large amount will be given. If the client is in court and says, "I will not agree to those terms," his counsel ought to say, "Then I will not act for you any longer," and ought to leave him to conduct his own case. If the client allows the negotiation to go on, and makes no audible objection, the settlements will be binding upon him, because he has not withdrawn the authority of his counsel and made that withdrawal known to the other side. But I wish to repeat that, although the authority of counsel is unlimited until it is withdrawn, the court retains control over his proceedings. In the present case the client was not present in court at the time the settlement was come to.

and, therefore, could not have put, and did not put, an end to the relationship of A advocate and client which existed between himself and his counsel; but he comes now and says, "I do not like what my counsel has done for me, and I ask the court to set it aside." There is no symptom of any injustice having been done.
The counsel exercised his judgment to the best of his ability in the matter, and I have no doubt did what was really best for his client. The judgment of the Divisional Court must be affirmed. B

BOWEN, L.J.—This was an action for malicious prosecution, in which the defendant employed counsel. The defendant was not himself present at the opening of the court on the second day of the trial. During the time of his absence he left to his counsel the necessary duty of doing his best in any emergency that arose.
The plaintiffs' case closed, the defendant being still absent, and the defendant's C counsel agreed to a verdict for the plaintiff for £350, and to withdraw all imputations. After that had been done the defendant arrived, and wished the settlement to be set aside. He has applied to the Divisional Court to set it aside, and that court has refused to do so; and from that refusal this appeal is brought.

The authority of a counsel is regulated by professional etiquette and honour, D and empowers him to bind the ultimate client within certain limits that are perfectly well understood, and that were stated by POLLOCK, C.B., in Swinfen v.
Lord Chelmsford (1) (5 H. & N. at p. 922):

"We are of opinion that, although a counsel has complete authority over the suit, the mode of conducting it, and all that is incident to it, such as withdrawing the record, withdrawing a juror, calling no witnesses, or selecting E such as in his discretion he thinks ought to be called, and other matters which properly belong to the suit, and the management and conduct of the trial, we think he has not, by virtue of his retainer in the suit, any power whatever over matters that are collateral to it. He has complete authority over the suit; he is clothed with that authority by virtue of his retainer."

The Master of the Rolls has discussed the question which has been discussed F by many other distinguished judges, whether a counsel is to be called the agent of his client; and he, like many other judges, has protested against that description of the relationship. I am inclined to agree in that protest. At all events, if a counsel is called an agent, it must be remembered that he is only an agent in a very peculiar and special sense. Can a counsel then compromise a suit G if his client is in court, and objects to the compromise? I think that a counsel under those circumstances ought not to do so. It does not follow that he is to submit to the suit going on, if he thinks that that is the wrong course to take.
It is always in his power under those circumstances to return his brief. But in the present case the client was not in court at the time of the settlement.
Not being there, it must be taken that he left it to his counsel to exercise H his discretion in any emergency that arose. Whether the authority of counsel is to be regarded as being derived from the client or from the nature of his profession, it is clear that it includes the acting for the client in his absence when an emergency arises. But I think that it can never include the acting unreasonably. The duty of the counsel and his authority are commensurate. In this particular case it is clear that what was done was not unreasonable, and I was within the authority of counsel as defined by POLLOCK, C.B., in the judgment I which I have referred to.

FRY, L.J.—In my opinion this is a clear and simple case. An action was brought for malicious prosecution, and at the trial, in the absence of the defendant, the defendant's counsel agreed to a compromise. In the compromise itself there is nothing that is outside the case, nothing which is unjust, or which shocks the conscience of the court, and nothing in the nature of a slip. I do not desire

A to do more than to say this, that I think that we should come to a most disastrous conclusion, not as regards the interests of the Bar, but for the interests of the public, if we were to set this compromise aside. A counsel would not be able to accept terms of arrangement, however advantageous to his client, because the client was out of court. In my opinion, the power of counsel to agree to a compromise is a most valuable power, which we should do nothing B to lessen.

Appeal dismissed.

Conflict of Laws—Marriage—Validity—Solemnisation abroad—Monogamous marriage—Marriage celebrated in Japan in accordance with Japanese law.

Marriage, to be recognised by the law of England, must be the union between one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others. Where, therefore, a British subject, temporarily resident in Japan, married a Japanese girl in accordance with the law of that country which recognised monogamy as the basis of the matrimonial contract, the marriage was held to be valid in England also.

Petition presented under the Legitimacy Declaration Act, 1858, for a declaration that a marriage in Japan, valid by the lex loci contractus, should also be recognised as a good marriage in this country.

The petitioner, Francis Brinkley, a retired officer of the Royal Artillery, while temporarily resident at Naka Rokee, Tokio, in the empire of Japan, was married, on Mar. 25, 1886, at Tokio, to Yasu Tanaka, a native of that country. The petitioner was at that time a British subject, with an Irish domicil. After the marriage he lived and cohabited with his wife in Japan, and continued to do so at the date of the hearing of this petition. There was one son issue of the marriage. In accordance with the statute the Attorney-General had been cited and had filed an answer traversing the petition. In the course of the preliminary proceedings, a summons was taken out on behalf of the petitioner, and it was thereupon ordered, with the consent of the Attorney-General, that the petitioner might be permitted, at the hearing, to prove the facts of his case by affidavits and certificates. The affidavit of the petitioner, filed and read at the hearing in accordance with the above-mentioned order, was as follows :

"I was born on or about Nov. 9, 1841, at Parsonstown, County Meath, in Ireland, of parents then and there domiciled, and I have since served Her Majesty as a captain in the Royal Artillery. I am now temporarily resident at Naka Tokubendio, Tokio, in Japan, but I have no intention of permanently residing there. On Mar. 25, 1886, I was married in Japan to Yasu Tanaka, a subject of the Mikado of Japan. The certificates of my said marriage are now produced and shown to me, marked A. and B., and the translations thereof, which I believe to be correct, are now produced and shown to me, marked C. and D. I say that I am the petitioner in this suit, and I and the said Yasu Tanaka are respectively the same persons as 'Francis Brinkley, a British subject,' and 'Yasu Tanaka, of No. 20 of the 6th Ward of Jidamachi Kogimachi District, city of Tokio,' named in the said certificate marked A., and the translation thereof marked C., now produced and shown to me. I am advised and believe that my said marriage is valid according to the laws in force in Japan, and that I am thereby precluded from intermarrying with any other woman during the subsistence of the said marriage. I have since the said marriage cohabited with my said wife, and there is issue of my said marriage one son, born on Mar. 25, 1887. There is no collusion or connivance between myself and any person other than my said wife."

The certificates referred to in the above affidavit were put in and read. They were in the following terms :

"I certify that Yasu Tanaka, of No. 20 of the 6th Ward Jidamachi, Kogimachi District, city of Tokio, was duly married according to the laws of this empire, to Francis Brinkley, a British subject, on the 25th day in the 3rd of Mauh, of the 19th year of Meiji (Mar. 25, 1886). (Signed) GINBAYASHI TSUNAO, Chief Secretary, Tokio City Local Government; for Takasaki Garoku, Governor of Tokio City."

I certify that the above certificate by Ginbayashi Tsunao, Chief Secretary of the Tokio City Government, representing Takasaki Garoku, Governor of Tokio City, is correct and legal. (Signed) AOKI SHINYO, Vice-Minister of State for Foreign Affairs; 10th day of 6th month of 19th year of Meiji (June 10, 1886)."

An affidavit as to the Japanese law and the validity of the petitioner's marriage was also produced and read. It was in these terms :

"I, Kasno Hatoyama, chief professor of law in the Imperial University of Japan, solemnly declare and say as follows : I am the chief professor of law in the Imperial University of Japan, and am thoroughly acquainted with the law of marriage of the empire. I have read the affidavit of Francis Brinkley, sworn herein on the 2nd day of November, 1888, and am of opinion that the facts therein deposed to show a valid marriage between the above-named petitioner, Francis Brinkley, and Yasu Tanaka, therein named, according to the law of Japan, and that the said petitioner, Francis Brinkley, is thereby precluded from intermarrying with any other woman during the subsistence of the said marriage."

Mr. John Frederick Lowder, a member of the English Bar who had practised for thirty years before the Japanese and Consular courts, was called and stated that a civil marriage in the Japanese empire is contracted before the governor of the city in which the parties reside. Such governor is the registrar, and the registration constitutes the marriage. The parties go before him, or before a duly constituted deputy acting in his stead, and cause their names to be registered as man and wife, and that is the whole ceremony. The certificates produced are the very best certificates that could be procured in Japan of the fact of the marriage having taken place. The witness recognised the names at the foot of the certificates, and the persons who had signed them were known by the witness to hold the respective offices, descriptions of which were thereunto appended.

Bayford Q.C. (Melsheimer with him) for the petitioner.

Gwynne James for the Attorney-General.

SIR JAMES HANNEN, P.—This case is clear from the difficulties which arose in the Mormon case (Hyde v. Hyde and Woodmansee (1)) and in the South African case (Re Bethell, Bethell v. Hildyard (2)), because in each of those cases an attempt was made to establish as valid a marriage which admitted the possibility of a subsequent marriage with a person, other than the first spouse, during the lifetime of the latter. The principle adopted in those cases is, that a marriage which is not a union between one man and one woman, to the exclusion of all others, although it may pass by the name of a marriage, is not the status which the law of England contemplates when dealing with the subject of marriage.

In this case it has been proved in a most satisfactory manner, by the depositions of a Japanese professor of law, that by the laws of the empire of Japan marriage does imply and involve this fundamental principle as a basis of the marriage contract, viz., that one man unites himself to one woman, and one woman to one man, to the exclusion of all others. Therefore, although throughout the judgments which have been delivered upon this subject, the words "Christian marriage," "marriage in Christendom," or some equivalent phrase, have been used for the sake of conveniently expressing the idea; yet the idea itself which it was desired to express was this, that the only marriages recognised in Christian countries and throughout Christendom "are marriages of the exclusively monogamous kind which I have mentioned." In the present case, it has been conclusively proved that in Japan marriages are of that character. It is well known that Japan has long since taken its place among the civilised countries of the globe, and the customs, laws and ceremonies prevailing in the empire of Japan are not to be dealt with, or looked upon in the same way as those of the Baralong or other tribes of South Africa. I come, therefore, clearly to the conclusion, that the cases referred to do not apply in the present instance, and, as was candidly conceded by the learned counsel representing the Attorney-General, that a valid marriage can take place in Japan according to the law of Japan between a domiciled British subject and a Japanese woman, and that such marriage may be valid in this country and everywhere else.

The only question, therefore, which remains for me to consider is that which has been very properly raised by counsel for the Attorney-General, viz.: Have I, or have I not, proper and sufficient evidence before me that a marriage, valid according to the lex loci contractus, i.e., the law of Japan, has in fact been entered into by the petitioner in this case? Mr. Lowder, who practised for thirty years before the Japanese courts, has been called, and has given satisfactory evidence as to the marriage law of Japan. He states that a valid marriage contract is constituted by the parties to the said contract appearing before a particular officer, the governor or his deputy, and declaring before him their intention to become man and wife, and obtaining from him a certificate to that effect. I have before me that which purports to be a certificate signed by that officer, and duly verified. He certifies that the two persons named in the certificate were duly married according to the laws of the empire, and, applying the well-known principle of law, omnia præsumuntur rite et solenniter esse acta, I must of course assume that everything has been done in due form. Indeed, Mr. Lowder has proved that the person who has appended his name to the certificate, and who purports to sign the same as the governor's secretary or deputy, does in fact hold that position; also, that the person named in the certificate as the governor, is in fact the person holding that office at Tokio. The certificates are signed by competent persons, and the evidence does satisfy my mind that a valid marriage has been contracted by the petitioner and Yasu Tanaka. I, therefore, pronounce the decree prayed for, and I declare the said marriage to be a good and valid marriage, and the issue thereof legitimate.

GARDNER v. INGRAM

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Bowen, L.J.), November 29, 1889]

Landlord and Tenant—Notice to quit—Need to be clear and unambiguous—Notice of intention to quit on or before particular date.

By an agreement for a lease of premises for five years it was provided that the tenancy might be determined "after the expiration of the term of three years out of the term of five years" by six months' notice in writing expiring on the quarter day corresponding to that on which the tenancy commenced. The tenant entered into possession on Sept. 29, 1885, and, on Mar. 29, 1888, he gave notice to the landlord in the following terms: "Kindly . . . take notice that I intend to surrender to you the tenancy of this house on or before Sept. 29, 1888."

Held: the notice was bad, since it did not plainly and unambiguously determine the tenancy, but rather expressed an intention to enter into negotiations with the landlord regarding the landlord's acceptance of the surrender.

Thompson v. Maberly (1) (1811), 2 Camp. 573, doubted.

Per LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.: Although no particular form need be followed in a notice to quit, there must be plain, unambiguous words claiming to determine the existing tenancy at a certain time.

Appeal by the tenant from a judgment of the Mayor's Court.

By a memorandum of agreement, dated Sept. 9, 1885, and made between the plaintiff and the defendant, the plaintiff agreed to let and the defendant agreed to take, certain premises situate at Loughton, in the county of Essex, "for the term of five years commencing from Sept. 29, 1885, and thenceforth until this tenancy is determined by notice, as hereinafter mentioned," at an annual rent of £45, payable by equal quarterly payments on Mar. 25, June 24, Sept. 29, and Dec. 25, in each year. The agreement further provided that

"The tenancy may be determined after the expiration of the term of three years out of the term of five years hereinbefore mentioned by six calendar months' notice in writing from either of the said parties to the other of them, and that such notice must expire at the corresponding quarter day at which the tenancy commenced."

The tenant entered into possession of the premises, and paid the rent payable under the agreement up to Sept. 29, 1888. During the tenancy, a question arose between the parties as to the execution of some repairs, and on Mar. 23, 1888 the tenant wrote the following letter to the landlord:

"Dear Sir—It will not be possible for me to undergo the inconvenience involved in the suggested necessary repairs under the conditions now apparently existing. Kindly, therefore, take notice that I intend to surrender to you the tenancy of this house on or before Sept. 29 next."

Shortly afterwards, the tenant quitted the premises, and the landlord brought an action against him for the rent payable under the agreement since Sept. 29, 1888. The assistant judge in the Mayor's Court held that the agreement created a tenancy for four years certain, and that the tenancy was not duly determined on Sept. 29, 1888, by the tenant giving, on March 23, 1888, six calendar months' notice in writing of his intention to determine the same.

Ashton Cross for the tenant.

A. H. Spokes for the landlord.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—Two points were made in this case, and I think that both of them must be decided against the tenant. With regard to the last point relied on by counsel for the tenant in his argument, I will, for the moment, assume that the notice was good in point of time, and that for this purpose, the judgment of LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., in Thompson v. Maberly (1), ought to be followed. But it appears to me that there was in fact no notice to quit at all, although that point does not appear from the judge's notes to have been specifically taken at the trial. The fact, however, is not material, because as was said by the Court of Appeal in Seymour v. Coulson (2), a point of law is sufficiently raised at the trial before the judge of the county court if it appears that the judge necessarily decided it in order to arrive at a conclusion, and the Court of Appeal may review his decision on that point whether or not it was taken in argument before him. This notice was before the learned judge in the Mayor's Court, and his judgment must have proceeded on what was his view of the effect of it. In my judgment, the notice is not a good one.

A notice to quit must be absolute in its terms. Although no particular form need be followed, there must be plain, unambiguous words claiming to determine the existing tenancy at a certain time. This notice is not of such a character. The tenant merely says that he intends to surrender the lease on or before a particular date. The words mean that he intends to enter into negotiations as to something which cannot be done without his landlord's consent—to surrender the lease to the landlord if he will accept it. That is no notice to quit, and there is an end of the case. Counsel for the tenant relied on Thompson v. Maberly (1), where LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., stated that, if premises are taken for twelve months certain and six months' notice to quit afterwards, the tenancy may be determined by a six months' notice to quit expiring at the end of the first year. That case is not, however, quite satisfactory, as it appears to have been decided on the meaning of the word "certain," and, as LORD CAMPBELL points out in a note, the decision was for the plaintiff on another point, so that LORD ELLENBOROUGH'S observation was obiter. It is true that, in Brown v. Symons (3), in the Common Pleas, which was an apprenticeship case and turned on the words "for twelve months certain," Thompson v. Maberly (1) was cited in the argument, and was not disapproved of. But I think that, in a case of a similar agreement, where the word "certain" does not occur, it would be very doubtful whether Thompson v. Maberly (1) should be treated as an authority.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion as to the question of the sufficiency of this notice to quit. I do not think that we are deciding on merely technical grounds in saying that the notice is bad. I think it is very necessary that, in a notice to quit, there should be plainness of speech—that is, it must be plain and unequivocal in its terms, leaving no doubt as to the intention of the party giving it. The effect of such a notice is to put an end to the relation of landlord and tenant, therefore, the landlord has a right to know whether the tenant is really going or not. If instead of adopting that course the tenant uses language which is ambiguous, makes use of expressions which leave matters at the conclusion of the term contingent on something to be done or some arrangement to be made, there is no sufficient notice to quit. We are asked to place a business construction on this notice; in my opinion, there was no business intended by it. The tenant used language on which the landlord could not safely act. On the other point I entirely agree with the Lord Chief Justice.

Appeal dismissed.

MERIVALE v. CARSON

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen, L.J.), December 1, 2, 1887]

Libel—Fair comment—Fairness of comment—Expression of strong opinions and prejudices of fair man—Criticism of stage play.

The criticism of a dramatic work in the public Press is not privileged, and may constitute a libel without actual malice on the part of the writer. Such a criticism, in order to be actionable, must, in the opinion of the jury, be something more than the expression of the strong opinions and prejudices of a fair man. If it goes beyond what any fair man would say in criticising a work, it is an actionable libel.

Appeal by the defendant from the decision of a Divisional Court (MATHEW and GRANTHAM, JJ.), refusing his application to enter judgment for him or for a new trial.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, who were the authors of a play called the "The Whip Hand," in respect of a criticism of their play, which was contained in a notice of a performance of the play at Liverpool, published in a theatrical newspaper, of which the defendant was the editor. This criticism was alleged by the plaintiffs to be in part libellous, the part complained of being as follows :

" 'The Whip Hand,' the joint production of Mr. and Mrs. Herman Merivale, gives us nothing but a hash-up of ingredients which have been used ad nauseam, until one rises in protestation against the loving, confiding, fatuous husband with the naughty wife and her double existence, the good male genius, the limp aristocrat, and the villainous foreigner. And why dramatic authors will insist that in modern society comedies the villain must be a foreigner, and the foreigner must be a villain, is only explicable on the ground, we suppose, that there is more or less of romance about such gentry. It is more in consonance with accepted notions that your continental croupier would make a much better fictitious prince, marquis, or count than would, say, an English billiard-marker or stable lout. And so the Marquis Colonna in 'The Whip Hand' is offered up by the authors upon the altar of tradition and sacrificed in the usual manner when he gets too troublesome to permit of the reconciliation of husband and wife, and lover and maiden, and is proved, also much as usual, to be nothing more than a kicked-out croupier."

The innuendo in the statement of claim was as follows :

"Meaning thereby that the play was not original, and that the plot and action of the play were based upon the adultery of the principal female character, and that the play had an immoral tendency and belonged to a class of plays founded on sexual intrigue and of a low moral character, and that the production of the play was discreditable to authors of good literary position and repute."

The defendant denied that the words published were intended to have, or could have, the meaning alleged, and said that the occasion was privileged. The incident on which the play turned was that of a wife, who had lost money at cards to a foreign adventurer, being induced, by threats of exposure, to turn her husband's house during his absence into a gambling-house; there being no suggestion in the play against the purity of the wife or her affection for her husband.

FIELD, J., in the course of his summing-up to the jury, said :

"The question is, first, whether this criticism bears the meaning which the plaintiffs put upon it. If it is fair, temperate criticism, and does not bear that meaning, then your verdict will be for the defendant. . . . It is not for a moment suggested by anyone that the defendant is animated by the smallest possible malice towards the plaintiffs. There is no ground for saying so, and no one has said so. . . . The malice which is necessary in this action is one which, if it existed at all, will be because the defendant has exceeded his right of criticism upon the play. You have the play before you; you must judge for yourselves. If it is no more than fair, honest, independent, bold, even exaggerated criticism, then your verdict will be for the defendant. It is for the plaintiffs to make out their case. They have to satisfy you that it is more than that; otherwise they cannot complain. If you are satisfied upon the evidence that it is more than that, then you will give your verdict for the plaintiffs."

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs with 1s. damages, and the judge entered judgment for the plaintiffs accordingly, and declined to deprive them of costs.

Cock, Q.C., and W. Blake Odgers for the defendant.

Lockwood, Q.C., and Boxall for the plaintiffs.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case, an action has been brought for an alleged libel contained in the criticism on a play written by the plaintiffs. What are the questions which ought to be left in such a case to the jury? The first question which they ought to be asked is: What is the meaning of the alleged libel? I am not sure that the jury ought not to look at the writing criticised. It is for them to say what, in the opinion of any reasonable man, the alleged libel means. In the present case, that question was left to them. The mischief of this criticism was said to be that it alleged that the play was founded on adultery without any stigma being attached to the adultery by the writers of the play. On behalf of the defendant, it was said that the criticism has not that meaning, and that the expression "naughty wife," did not mean adulterous wife. The jury had the right to put their own interpretation on the expression. Looking at the context, I should be inclined to agree with them in the interpretation that they have put on it.

The next question that arises is: Was this a privileged occasion? Ought the judge to tell the jury that it was, and that, therefore, to whatever length the criticism went, the defendant was entitled to a verdict, unless there was express malice, that is, malice in fact on his part, or, in other words, unless he was actuated by some indirect motive? That is clearly not the law. Campbell v. Spottiswoode (1) has never been overruled. That case lays down that a criticism on a published work is not a privileged occasion within the legal meaning of that term. BLACKBURN, J., in his judgment, points out that a privileged occasion exists where one person may do by reason of the privilege what no other person in the kingdom could do. But, with regard to a criticism on a published work, it is not that one person may do what another may not; every person may do the same thing, and every person is forbidden to do the same thing, and, therefore, the occasion is not privileged.

The next question is: Was this criticism an actionable libel? The answer to that question must be based on the principles laid down in Campbell v. Spottiswoode (1). CROMPTON, J., in that case says (3 B. & S. at p. 778):

"Nothing is more important than that fair and full latitude of discussion should be allowed to writers upon any public matter, whether it be the conduct of public men, or the proceedings in courts of justice, or in Parliament, or the publication of a scheme, or a literary work. But it is always to be left to the jury to say whether the publication has gone beyond the limits of a fair comment on the subject-matter discussed. A writer is not entitled to overstep those limits, and impute base and sordid motives which are not warranted by the facts, and I cannot for a moment think, because he has a bona fide belief that he is publishing what is true, that is any answer to an action for libel."

Whether the publication has gone beyond the limits of a fair comment on the subject-matter discussed is the question which should be left to the jury. On the answer to that question, the answer to the question whether the criticism is a libel or not depends. CROMPTON, J., goes on to say:

"The first question is, whether the article on which this action is brought is a libel or no libel, not whether it is privileged or not. It is no libel if it is within the range of fair comment—that is, if a person might fairly and bona fide write the article; otherwise it is."

I am prepared to say that the meaning of "fair comment" is this: is it in the opinion of the jury, beyond what any fair man, however prejudiced, or however strong his opinion may be, would say in criticising a work? It is impossible to get beyond that. Full latitude must be given to the strong opinions and even to the prejudices of a fair man, but there must be nothing beyond opinion and judgment. It is easy to see what would be outside that limit. Whether any particular case is within the limit must depend on the circumstances of that case. A B

Then was this case satisfactorily left to the jury? I think that it was. When you look at the whole summing-up, it is really an amplification of the final direction to the jury, when the learned judge said:

"If it is no more than fair, honest, independent, bold, even exaggerated criticism, then your verdict will be for the defendant." C

So that he gave them a wide limit. I think myself that even gross exaggeration would not necessarily make the criticism unfair. However wrong, however prejudiced the criticism, all that may be within the limit. The question that must be left to the jury is, would any fair man have said it? If it is more than a fair man would have said, then it is a libel. If the jury are not satisfied that it is more than that, then it is within the limits of allowed criticism and is no libel. I am aware that, in various cases, other words have been added from time to time to the definition of a libellous criticism; but I do not know of one such definition in which the word "fair" has not also been used. There is, therefore, no fault to be found with the direction of the learned judge in this case. Were the jury justified in finding that this was not a fair criticism? After they had found the meaning, they were clearly right in their other finding. If the meaning of the criticism is what they have found it to be, it is that the play is an obscene one. No fair man could say that of this play. Therefore, even if I had been dissatisfied with the summing-up, I would not have sent this case for a new trial. D E F

I will only add that I negative the proposition of counsel for the defendant that, in an action in respect of a criticism on a published work, it is necessary to prove malice. It is said that, if that is so, there might be a case in which the writing which was alleged to be a libel would not be beyond fair criticism, but, nevertheless, might contain imputations that would be libellous if they were not contained in the criticism of a published work, and might be written by the critic for the purpose of injuring the individual criticised. But, in my opinion, such a writing would not be within what is allowed to critics apart from any question of malice—the mind of the writer not being that of a critic, nor the writing really a criticism at all. G

BOWEN, L.J.—We begin by asking, what is the meaning of the alleged libel? The jury have found that the writer of this criticism has imputed to the plaintiffs that, in a play called "The Whip Hand," written by them, the main incident turns on an adulterous wife. It is immaterial whether the meaning is that they have not only founded their play on an adultery, but also have written it in such a manner as to show that they did not object to adultery. It is an admitted fact that this play does not contain an adulterous wife at all; so that there can be no question whether the plaintiffs treat adultery lightly. H I

What is the true question to be left to the jury in such a case? We must first see whether the matter has been properly left to the jury, and then whether there has been such a miscarriage as to justify us in ordering a new trial. I take the same view as the Master of the Rolls as to the manner in which the word "privilege" ought to be used. This is not a privileged occasion. Privilege is where one person is clothed with a greater immunity than the rest of the public. But the right of criticism is a right belonging to the whole world. If a person writes a book, he invites the whole world to criticise it. Another definition of the right of public criticism, by WILLES, J., is to be found in Henwood v. Harrison (2). WILLES, J., and the majority of the Court of Common Pleas appear to have preferred to treat it as a branch of the law of privilege, and to have found a justification for that use of the word "privilege" by applying it to the subject of the right instead of to the person exercising the right. I do not think that that is so good an explanation of the right of criticism as that which is given by BLACKBURN and CROMPTON, JJ., in Campbell v. Spottiswoode (1). I do not think that it would have made any difference in the present case, whichever view is held to be the right one. One reason why I prefer the view of BLACKBURN and CROMPTON, JJ., is because it leaves undisturbed the question which has been asked the jury for a great many years in these cases, viz., whether they think that the limits of fair criticism have been exceeded. As soon as the writer passes out of the region of fair criticism he ceases to be protected by the law, and the writing then becomes simply libellous. Until those limits are passed there is no question of libel at all.

It is still unsettled what is the meaning of the expression which has been sanctioned by Campbell v. Spottiswoode (1)—"a fair comment." What standard are the jury to apply in order to ascertain whether the criticism in question is "fair?" The only limitation imposed is on the mode of expression; the opinion itself is in no way limited. It is the expression of the writer's opinion that must be fair; the opinion may be anything that he likes. There must be some limitation conveyed in the word "fair," because all the judges are agreed in leaving the question to the jury whether the criticism goes beyond what is fair. We have no definition of what the law calls fair; perhaps it is purposely left to the jury to give its ordinary meaning to a word that is simple in itself. In Macleod v. Wakley (3), LORD TENTERDEN, C.J., says (3 C. & P. at p. 313):

"Whatever is fair, and can be reasonably said of the works of authors or of themselves, as connected with their works, is not actionable, unless it appears that, under the pretext of criticising the works, the defendant takes an opportunity of attacking the character of the author: then it will be a libel."

That is not unlike what the Master of the Rolls has said in the present case to be the meaning of fair comment. The question always must be whether the alleged libel transcends the reasonable limits of criticism by reason of the language in which it is expressed. That is to say, you must not judge the opinions expressed; you must judge the mode of expressing those opinions. In Campbell v. Spottiswoode (1), the first question that the jury were asked was, whether they thought the alleged libel was a fair comment on the work criticised. That case was an instance of one class of cases in which the critic travels out of the regions of fair criticism, viz., where the author is attacked apart from the work.

There is another class of cases in which the writer travels out of the regions of fair criticism, viz., where he imputes to the author that he has written what he has not. That is not a question of criticism at all. It is one thing to say that a work has a bad tendency; that is a matter of opinion. But to say of a work that it contains an adulterous wife, when there is no adultery in it at all, is not an expression of opinion, but a misstatement of fact. Turnbull v. Bird (4) was a case of that kind. It is not fair criticism to impute to a man that he has written what he has not. That applies to the present case. The criticism here was found by the jury to have the meaning alleged, viz., that the play was founded on adultery. If the learned judge left it to the jury to say whether that exceeded the limits of fair criticism, there being no adultery in the play, it is unnecessary to go minutely into the whole of the summing-up. I have twice read through FIELD, J.'s summing-up. Perhaps there are some expressions to be found in it that are not perfectly exact. But it must be remembered that what the jury had to deal with was not really a question of opinion, but a question of fact. It would be impossible for us to send down this case for a new trial because certain expressions in the summing-up were not exact, when the result arrived at was right. Supposing the view of the law which I do not adopt to be the correct one, it would make no difference. That view is that this was a privileged occasion, and that it was necessary for the plaintiffs to prove express malice. Looking at the misstatement of fact in the present case, I think that any jury in the world would presume that this criticism was malicious.

Appeal dismissed.

LEDUC & CO. v. WARD AND OTHERS

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Fry and Lopes, L.J.J.), February 11, 13, 1888]

Shipping—Carriage of goods—Deviation—Bill of lading—Contract to carry by ordinary sea route—Evidence to vary terms of voyage contained in bill of lading—Admissibility.

The plaintiffs were the endorsees of a bill of lading. The bill, which excepted the usual perils of the sea, stated that the goods were shipped in a steamship lying at Fiume and bound for Dunkirk, "with liberty to call at any ports in any order, and to deviate for the purpose of saving life or property." Instead of proceeding to Dunkirk, the ship sailed for Glasgow and was lost, with the goods, by perils of the sea. In an action by the plaintiffs against the shipowners for non-delivery of goods, evidence was given to show that the shippers of the goods knew, when the bill of lading was given, that the ship was going to Glasgow before proceeding to Dunkirk.

Held: the contract between the plaintiffs and the shipowners was contained in the bill of lading and was to carry the goods by the ordinary sea track between Fiume and Dunkirk with liberty to call at any ports substantially on the line of that voyage in any order; the evidence given was not admissible to vary the terms of the contract; Glasgow, not being a port on the line of the voyage, was out of the course of the voyage; and, therefore, the ship was lost while deviating from the voyage contracted for.

Appeal by the defendants (except Headley) from a decision of DENMAN, J., at a trial before him without a jury.

The plaintiffs entered into a contract with merchants abroad for the purchase of goods to be shipped from a foreign port. The plaintiffs were to pay the price in exchange for shipping documents provided by the vendors. The bill of lading, signed by the defendants' captain on the shipment of the goods, was endorsed to the plaintiffs. The bill of lading, so far as material, was as follows :

"Shipped in apparent good order and condition by Fruman Filiale de ingurischen Landesbank, in and upon the good steamship Austria, now lying in the port of Fiume, and bound for Dunkirk, with liberty to call at any ports in any order, and to deviate for the purpose of saving life or property: 3123 bags of rape seed, being marked and numbered as per margin, and to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the aforesaid port of Dunkirk unto order or assigns, &c."

The Austria, which was a general ship, had goods on board for Glasgow, and went there before going to Dunkirk. During this deviation, the plaintiffs' goods were lost by perils of the sea. The plaintiffs, as endorsees of the bill of lading, brought the action against the defendant shipowners for non-delivery of the goods. At the trial, evidence was given for the purpose of showing that the shippers knew and assented to the Austria going to Glasgow before going to Dunkirk. The learned judge held that the evidence did not prove any agreement on the shippers' part that the ship should proceed via Glasgow, and doubted whether it was admissible at all. He, therefore, gave judgment for the plaintiffs. A Gainsford Bruce, Q.C., and Lawson Walton (Finlay, Q.C., with them) for the defendants.

Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., and Gorell Barnes, Q.C., for the plaintiffs. B

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case, the plaintiffs were owners of goods shipped on board the defendants' ship, and they bring an action against the defendants because they say that they were parties to a bill of lading, and put their goods on board the defendants' ship on the terms of the bill of lading, and were entitled by those terms to have their goods delivered to them at Dunkirk. The answer of the defendants is, that the goods were lost by perils of the sea. The answer to that is that the goods were not lost by any perils of the sea which the defendants are entitled to rely on; that they were lost while the defendants were committing a breach of their contract; that they were lost in a place to which the exception of the perils of the sea did not apply, and that the defendants are, therefore, liable. It is clear that the plaintiffs were assignees of the bill of lading, and the persons to whom the contracts had passed strictly within the terms of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855. That Act passes the contract, and puts the assignee in a better position than the original shipper in some respects. C

The question in this case is, what is the contract contained in the bill of lading? It was suggested that a bill of lading is, in all circumstances, nothing but a receipt for the goods, and contains no contract, except that the goods have been received by the shipowners and are to be delivered by them at the place named. This is an instrument which has received one construction from the mercantile world and the courts for more than a hundred years. Where there is a charterparty, the bill of lading is only a receipt for the goods, because all the terms of the contract of carriage, as between the shipowner and the charterer, are contained in the charterparty, and the bill of lading is only given to enable the charterer to deal with the goods during transmission. But even where there is a charterparty, although the bill of lading is only a receipt as between the charterer and the shipowner, it is more than a receipt as between the endorsee and the shipowner; it contains the contract between them. Let us consider what a bill of lading is when it is to be regarded as a receipt for goods. It is not then a contract at all, nor is it conclusive as a receipt for the goods; treating it as a receipt, it can be contradicted by evidence. D

The question whether a bill of lading can be anything more than a receipt for goods depends on whether the captain has received the goods, because the captain has no authority from the owner to make a contract of carriage except for goods put on board. If the bill of lading is wrong as to the goods put on board, its effect is destroyed for any other purpose. But if the goods have been received on board, the bill of lading is more than a receipt, it is a contract of carriage. The captain has authority not only to make a contract of carriage, but to reduce it into writing. The bill of lading is, between him and the shipper, the contract for the carriage of the goods reduced into writing. Whenever a contract is reduced into writing, that writing is the only evidence of the contract. It can only be varied by showing a usage so general that it must be taken to be imported into the contract. That is the only evidence that can be given outside the written contract. To show that the parties have agreed to some other terms outside the contract is to seek to vary the terms of a written contract, and that is not allowed with regard to a bill of lading any more than it is with regard to any other contract which has been reduced into writing as the evidence of the contract. It is startling to be told that this is new law. E

The law was certainly so stated by BLACKBURN, J., in Fraser v. Telegraph Construction Co. (1). He said (L.R. 7 Q.B. at p. 571):

“The bill of lading, notwithstanding some case that Mr. Cohen referred to in the Common Pleas, must be taken to be the contract under which goods are shipped, and until I am told different by a court of error, I shall so hold.”

In Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Co. (2), I expressed the same view of the nature of a bill of lading as I had always expressed, and as I am now expressing. In Glyn, Mills & Co. v. East and West India Dock Co. (3), LORD SELBORNE said (7 App. Cas. at p. 596):

“Everyone claiming as assignee under a bill of lading must be bound by its terms, and by the contract between the shipper of the goods and the shipowner therein expressed. The primary office and purpose of a bill of lading, although by mercantile law and usage it is a symbol of the right of property in the goods, is to express the terms of the contract between the shipper and the shipowner.”

To say, therefore, except in the case which I have before stated of its being given to a charterer who has also a charterparty, that a bill of lading is only a receipt for the goods is to maintain a proposition which cannot be supported. It seems to me impossible to say that a bill of lading does not contain the terms of the contract of carriage.

The next question is whether, assuming the bill of lading to contain the contract of carriage, it is part of that contract that the goods shall be carried on the particular voyage described. The bill of lading in the present case is in the ordinary terms that have been used in bills of lading since they were first established, and one might, therefore, expect that they had by this time received some construction. It is argued on the part of the defendants that the course of the voyage is no part of the contract; but it is not said why, if that is so, the voyage is put into the bill of lading at all. Consider the effect on business, if that contention was right. Goods are bought by someone at the place where they are to send to some other place. The purchaser buys them at one place for the purpose of selling them at another. He does not want to buy things in the air. The goods are to be sold again at some particular market. If the purchaser does not know at all when the goods will be delivered, he will not buy them, because he cannot judge whether he can make a profit by them or carry out a contract which he may have entered into. Business could not be carried on on those terms.

Again, with regard to the insurance of the goods, what underwriters would insure a voyage, nominally from one port to another, but which might be all round the world? It would be impossible ever to insure under such circumstances. To suppose, therefore, that the voyage is no part of the contract, is to disregard the whole course of mercantile business. The voyage is a very important part of the contract of carriage. The contract is not simply to carry from one place to another, but to carry from the one place to the other by the ordinary and usual course. That is one part, and a very important part, of the contract of carriage. If the ship is to go to other places besides the port of destination, that is provided for in the bill of lading, and that is put into the bill of lading as part of the contract of carriage. The bill of lading states that the goods are shipped on a named ship lying in the port of shipment and bound for the port of destination. That being the universal mode of describing the voyage in the bill of lading, what is the construction that has always been put on that form of words? That form has received one universal construction, both from merchants and courts of law, that is, the ordinary description of a voyage from one point to another on the ordinary sea track from the one place to the other on such a voyage. That course may vary with the winds, or according to circumstances; the ordinary sea track is not a direct line that is always the same. It is the ordinary track of the voyage according to a reasonable construction of the term.

If that is the meaning of the bill of lading, how can the exception apply to the facts of the present case? The perils of a voyage from Rotterdam to Marseilles are not the same perils as the perils of a voyage from Liverpool to New York. This is a voyage from Fiume to Dunkirk by the ordinary sea track "with liberty to call at any ports in any order." It is argued that that means that there is liberty to call at any port in the world. Here, again, it is a question of what is the mercantile meaning of the words used. The meaning obviously is liberty to call at any ports on the voyage. The ship may call at those ports for any purpose; in that respect she is not confined at all. Moreover, the meaning must be that she is at liberty, not only to call, but to stop for a time; otherwise it would be useless to allow her to call. Without such a provision, to stop at a port, even though the ship is in her course, would be a deviation within the meaning of a policy of insurance. If a ship is allowed simply to call at any ports, that has been invariably held to mean in their geographical order; so a further power is given by adding the words "in any order." Those words give the power of going back to any port that has been passed. Therefore, the persons to whom the shipper gave this bill of lading would know that the ship was to go from Fiume to Dunkirk, calling at any ports substantially on the line of that voyage in any order. To go to any port beyond that line was to commit a deviation and a breach of contract. The defendants' ship went to Glasgow, a port not on the course of the voyage from Fiume to Dunkirk. Thereupon the exception in the bill of lading did not apply to relieve them. They have failed to deliver the goods at Dunkirk, and are not within any exception which excuses that failure. The principles which I have stated seem to me to be plain and business-like.

It is said that there is an American case (Lowry v. Russell (4)) in which it was held that, where the voyage is described in terms in the bill of lading, the shipowner may be allowed to show that the person to whom he gave the bill of lading knew that the ship was going on another voyage. If that was said at all, which I doubt, it was said in a case where it was not wanted for the decision, as there appears to have been proof of a custom to deviate. I am inclined to think that that case has been misreported. There are two other American cases (The Delaware (5) and May v. Babcock (6)) in which the principles are laid down exactly as they have always been on this subject in England. But I rest my judgment on what I think to be clear and recognised authority in the English courts.

FRY, L.J.—In my view, a very large portion of the argument which we have heard in this case is concluded by the provisions of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855. The plaintiffs entered into a contract with merchants abroad for the purchase of goods to be shipped from a foreign port. The substance of that contract was that the vendors were to deliver shipping documents to the purchasers, and that the purchasers were to pay the price in exchange for the documents. The Bills of Lading Act provides, by s. 1, that "... every endorsee of a bill of lading, to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned shall pass upon or by reason of such ... endorsement, shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit, and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself."

Those words appear to me to be applicable to the present case. The plaintiffs are endorsees of a bill of lading to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned has passed on or by reason of the endorsement. The legislature have declared that there is a contract in the bill of lading, and that the benefit of that contract is vested in the endorsees. It seems to me to be impossible in the face of that section for the court to say that a bill of lading contains no contract. The Master of the Rolls has referred to Fraser v. Telegraph Construction Co. (1), Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Co. (2) and the language used by LORD SELBORNE in Glyn, Mills & Co. v. East and West India Dock Co. (3). The contract, therefore, is to be sought for in the terms of the bill of lading itself, and I cannot bring myself to think that such an important term as the description of the voyage is no part of the contract. The question, therefore, simply becomes one of the construction of this contract. The contract says :

“Shipped in apparent good order and condition on the steamship Austria, now lying in the port of Fiume and bound for Dunkirk, with liberty to call at any ports in any order, and to deviate for the purpose of saving life or property.”

It appears to me that the only right of deviation is that described in those words; a right to deviate for the purpose of calling at any ports in any order, and for the purpose of saving life and property. Is Glasgow, which is hundreds of miles out of the course from Fiume to Dunkirk, a port within that provision? The answer is that which the Master of the Rolls has given—viz., that it is not, and that the ports referred to are the ports on the course of the voyage. But it is said that it has been laid down in an American case (Lowry v. Russell (4)) that notice to the shipper of the route by which the ship is going to sail will rebut the implied term in the contract that it shall proceed to the port of destination by the direct route. In the first place, it is to be observed that this was a mere obiter dictum not necessary for the decision of the case. Apart from that, however, it is impossible to say that any effect can be given to a notice to the shipper of something affecting the contract, which contract can by statute be passed on to another person. The power to deviate contained in the written contract repels the possibility of the existence of any other power to deviate. And, lastly, I may say that I agree with the learned judge who tried the case, that the evidence falls short of showing that there was any misunderstanding between the shippers and the shipowners that the vessel was to go to Glasgow before going to Dunkirk. I do not think it necessary to rely on that, because, as I have said, where a statute has made the benefit of a contract assignable to a third party, it is inconsistent with the policy of the statute to allow anything which took place between the parties to the contract, but which is not embodied in it, to affect the contract. For these reasons, I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I can add nothing to the exhaustive judgment of the Master of the Rolls, except to say that I think that this bill of lading is clear and distinct, not only as to the place to which the goods were to be conveyed, but also as to the voyage; and therefore, I think that the evidence which was given was inadmissible. The judgment of DENMAN, J., was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Shipping—Collision—Damages—Consequential damage—Loss of equipment for navigation—Mistake as to position—Vessel running aground.

As a result of a collision between a barque and a steamer, for which the steamer admittedly was to blame, the barque's steering compass, log and log glass, and gear for rudder and wheel were lost. The captain of the barque, using a spare compass, made for a place of safety but, without any negligence or want of skill on the part of those in charge of the barque, but owing to the master mistaking his position, she ran aground and was abandoned.

Held: the grounding of the barque was the natural result result of the collision, and, therefore, the owners of the steamer were liable for the damages occasioned by it.

I

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of BUTT, J., reversing the registrar's report.

On Nov. 7, 1888, a collision occurred between the plaintiffs' barque the Albatross and the defendants' steamship the City of Lincoln, as a result of which the starboard quarter of the Albatross was cut off, her steering compass, log, log glass and gear for rudder and wheel were damaged, and she was making a considerable quantity of water.

The defendants having admitted liability for the collision, the assessment of damages was referred to the registrar and merchants. At the reference the plaintiffs claimed (inter alia) for the loss of their barque subsequently to the collision, when she was making for a port of safety in a damaged condition. The registrar allowed this claim. His report was as follows:

"On Oct. 29, 1888, the Swedish barque Albatross of 483 tons left Sundswall for Cardiff with a cargo of battens, and with a crew of ten hands all told. On Nov. 7, at about 6 p.m., the defendants' steamship City of Lincoln of 2103 tons, bound to Bremerhaven collided with her about twelve miles north of the North Hinder Light, cutting off her starboard quarter and doing other damage. The mate of the City of Lincoln came on board her and remained while the steamship proceeded on her voyage. With the view of saving the barque, she was taken, though difficult to manage, towards the English coast, and between 3 and 4 a.m. a lightship was discerned, which those on board the barque, as well as the mate of the City of Lincoln, supposed to be the Kentish Knock, and thereupon, after sounding, the barque's course was altered to the north, and the vessel almost immediately grounded on what proved to be the Long Sand, and it became necessary for those on board to abandon the vessel, and to make for the lightship, which turned out to be the Tongue lightship instead of the Kentish Knock. On the following morning they were landed at Gravesend, while the barque was found by salvors and taken into Harwich. Under these circumstances, which it is not necessary I should state more fully, counsel on both sides have requested me to report at this stage solely on the question whether the grounding of this vessel under the circumstances stated in the evidence is to be considered as damages consequential on the collision, and for which the defendants, the owners of the wrong-doing ship, are liable. Having heard counsel on this point, I am of opinion, and the merchant assessor concurs in it, that the grounding of the barque was not due to any culpable negligence or want of skill of those on board her, and that the defendants are liable for all additional damages which may have resulted from such grounding."

BUTT, J., held that there had been negligence on the part of those in charge of the Albatross, and reversed the registrar's report.

Gorell Barnes, Q.C., H. Stokes and Stubbs for the plaintiffs.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall for the defendants.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case it seems to me, having carefully considered all the evidence, that the wrongful act of the defendants did not merely damage the barque, but had this further effect, that it deprived the captain of his best charts, of his best compass, and his best log line. It was very difficult for him to know where he was. In these circumstances, he resolved, and it is not contended wrongly, to make for the Thames. But he had to make for the Thames not exactly knowing his place of departure, without having the usual means of marking off his course on a proper chart, and without having the usual means of calculating his speed. We are advised by the gentlemen who assist us that, in those circumstances, he was not guilty of any want of skill in not knowing whereabouts on the sea he was. It almost A necessarily follows from that that he was not guilty of any want of skill in not knowing what the light was which he saw; i.e., in other words in concluding that the light was the Kentish Knock when, in fact, it was not. If that be true, then comes this question: If he was not wrong in assuming the light to be the Kentish Knock, did he, on that assumption, do anything which was wrong? Was he wrong in not going up close to the lightship to B see its name, as it is suggested he ought to have done? It is the first time I ever heard such a suggestion advanced. Whether it may be right in some circumstances, although to me it seems a strange thing, is immaterial for the present purpose. In this case, his omission to do so was not a want of care and skill. Taking into account the various assumptions to which I C have referred, there next comes the question whether the master of the barque was wrong, when he sounded and got five fathoms, to port his helm for the purpose, as he thought, of going round these sands? We are advised that he was not wrong in so doing. The result is that he was guilty of no want of ordinary care and skill, unless it is established that he ought to have sounded as the barque sailed along. Considering how and where the barque was sailing, D I doubt whether, until she came near the lightship, her master could be said to be guilty of any want of care or skill in not sounding as she came along. There is this much to be said, that, if he had sounded it would have told him nothing. He did sound when he saw the light, and that was at a time when, assuming it to be the Kentish Knock, it was a proper thing to do.

On the whole, the result is that we have come to the conclusion, assisted E by advice from our assessors, that the captain was not guilty of any want of care and skill. I do not think that the mere fact of a master being put into the position this master was by the wrongful act of the defendants, and his not acting negligently, necessarily concludes such a case as this, and makes the defendants liable for all the damage which occurred after their wrongful act. I agree that there may be intermediate circumstances which prevent the F ultimate damage being regarded as the result of the wrongful act of the defendants so as to make them liable. But in this case it seems to me to be the inevitable conclusion that the ultimate loss of the ship was caused by her master being deprived of the means of calculating where he was, such deprivation being the direct result of the defendants' wrongful act. Where defendants do a wrongful act which deprives the plaintiff or those for whom he is responsible G of the means of averting that which ultimately happens, I think that it follows, as a matter of course, that that which ultimately happens is the result solely of the wrongful act of the defendants. Therefore, without considering cases in which the damage may be too remote, I think that in this case it is clear that the ultimate damage is not too remote. Under those circumstances, I think that the registrar and merchants must assess the damages on the H principle we have indicated. I do not think that any of the cases cited are contrary to what I have said.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As regards the evidence of the officer from the City of Lincoln, who was on board the vessel, it is obvious that it is given with a view to minimise the loss to his owners. I I think that the view of the facts taken by the registrar who saw the witnesses was correct, and, having regard to what LORD ESHER, M.R., has said, it will not be necessary for me to go over them again. We are advised that there was nothing negligent or unseamanlike in the conduct of the master of the Albatross. We cannot, therefore, accept the view that it was his negligence or want of skill which led to the ultimate loss of this ship. On that point we differ from BUTT, J. But that does not dispose of the case, because, assuming that there was no negligence on the part of the master of the Albatross, the question arises whether her ultimate loss is not too remote a consequence of the collision to render the defendants liable for it. That depends on the application to this particular case of the general rule applicable to damages, and for that I refer to MAYNE ON DAMAGES (4th Edn.). It is there stated (at p. 44):

“Damage is said to be too remote, when, although arising out of the cause of action, it does not so immediately and necessarily follow from it as that the offending party can be made responsible for it.”

Later on (at p. 45)

“The first and in fact the only inquiry in all these cases is whether the damage complained of is the natural and reasonable result of the defendants’ act: it will assume this character, if it can be shown to be such a consequence as in the ordinary course of things would flow from the act.”

That is a general method of stating the rule which, as I understand, was applied by LORD HERSCHELL in The Argentino (1), and, without criticising it, I take it to be sufficiently accurate for the purpose.

What we have to consider is, what is meant by “the ordinary course of things.” Counsel for the defendants has asked us to exclude from the “ordinary course of things” all human conduct. I cannot do anything of the kind. I take it that reasonable human conduct is part of the “ordinary course of things.” So far as I can see, the ordinary course of things, so far from excluding human conduct, includes the reasonable conduct of those who, having sustained damage, seek to save themselves from further loss. Let us see what are the facts. What was the real cause of the mischief? It seems to me that it was the deprivation of the barque’s master of the means of ascertaining his position and of properly navigating his ship. He was deprived of his compass, his logline and his charts, and his vessel was practically waterlogged. I do not say that the barque was utterly unmanageable, for she was, as we know, navigated a considerable distance, but, in any event, I do not think that her master was to blame for making the mistake he did. In these circumstances, it appears to me that this case is one of those in which the ultimate loss was within the rule which I have stated as to the “ordinary course of things,” and that, therefore, the defendants must pay for the damages incidental to the stranding of the barque.

LOPES, L.J.—We have been advised that, having regard to the condition of the Albatross, her loss was not caused by a want of proper care or skill on the part of those in charge of her. That being so, it appears to me that the case may be stated thus: By the misconduct of the defendants, the plaintiffs’ ship was placed in a position of the utmost peril. The plaintiffs, to save their ship and minimise as far as possible the loss to the defendants, endeavoured to reach a place of safety. While so endeavouring, without any negligence on the part of those in charge of her or any want of skill, and without any intervening independent cause, the Albatross ran ashore.

In those circumstances are the defendants liable for the stranding? In my opinion, they are. The original fault being the defendants’, they are, broadly speaking, responsible for what follows. They are responsible for all the natural consequences occasioned by their original misconduct, and when I say original misconduct, I mean not only the collision but also the deprivation of the Albatross of the usual means of navigation. If those consequences were caused by any want of skill on the part of those in charge of the Albatross, no liability would attach to the defendants. If the consequential loss had been brought about by the independent act of a third party, no liability would attach. If the consequential loss had been caused by anything which those on board the Albatross by the exercise of proper skill and care could have prevented, no liability would attach. But in this case, we are advised that there was no want of skill on the part of those on board the Albatross, and it is not suggested that there was any interposition or act of a third party. In these circumstances, I am clearly of opinion that what happened to the Albatross subsequently to the collision was the natural result of the wrongful act of the defendants, and I think, therefore, that the decision of the learned judge should be reversed.

Solicitor — Charging order — Variation — Order made under Solicitors Acts — Variation by judge in bankruptcy.

Judgment having been given in an action in the Chancery Division dissolving a partnership and appointing a receiver of the partnership assets, both the partners were adjudicated bankrupt. The action was transferred to the Queen's Bench Division in Bankruptcy, and the judge sitting in bankruptcy made an order under s. 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, charging the costs of the solicitor for the plaintiff in the action on moneys in the hands of the receiver. Prior to the order being made the landlord of the partnership premises had made a claim on the receiver for payment of rent, but the judge was not informed of this. On the application of the receiver, the judge later made an order directing the receiver to pay the rent due to the landlord and to pay the residue of the moneys in his hands to the solicitor.

Held: (i) since the landlord had not distrained, the solicitor's order took priority under s. 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860; (ii) the charging order not having been made under the bankruptcy jurisdiction, the judge had no power to rescind or vary it under s. 104 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Notes. The Solicitors Act, 1860, s. 28, has been repealed. See now the Solicitors Act, 1957, s. 72. The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 104, has been replaced by the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 108.

Appeal by the solicitor from an order of CAVE, J., directing the receiver in an action of Suffield v. Watts to pay out of the money in his hands £49 6s. 6d. to the bankrupts' landlord.

The action of Suffield v. Watts was commenced in the Chancery Division for a dissolution of partnership between the plaintiff and the defendant, and for a receiver. Judgment was obtained dissolving the partnership and appointing Brown receiver of the partnership assets. In consequence of the bankruptcy of both partners, the action was subsequently transferred to the bankruptcy court and afterwards stayed. On April 6, 1887, an order was made by CAVE, J., sitting in Bankruptcy, that certain moneys in the hands of the receiver, amounting to £84, produced by the sale of goods on the partnership premises, should be paid by him to the solicitor for the plaintiff in the partnership action in respect of his taxed costs, which amounted to over £100. The attention of the court was not then called to the fact that, on Mar 19, a claim had been made on the receiver by the landlord of the partnership premises for payment of rent. The receiver afterwards applied to the court for directions as to the application of the moneys in his hands as such receiver, the landlord being then represented. On Jan. 11, 1888, CAVE, J., made an order directing the receiver to pay £49 6s. 6d. to the landlord, and to pay the residue of the moneys in his hands to the solicitor towards the amount of his taxed costs, holding that a solicitor's lien extended only to the net, not the gross, proceeds recovered.

F. Cooper Willis for the landlord.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case, it is not denied that the solicitor has preserved property by his acts, and he is, therefore, entitled to a charging order for his costs on the property preserved under s. 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, if nothing stands in his way. The charging order must be under the Solicitors Act, for it is only by that Act that there is power to make such an order. The charging order was made by CAVE, J., sitting as judge of the Bankruptcy Court; but he was also sitting as a judge of the High Court, and, being a judge of the High Court, he had power to make other orders besides orders in bankruptcy, and among such other orders, orders under the Solicitors Act. An application was made to him as a judge of the High Court to make this order under the Solicitors Act, and he did so; having done so, he had no jurisdiction to alter the order. It was not made under the jurisdiction given to him by the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and, therefore, having made the order, he could not re-hear the application. Moreover, he was not asked to re-hear the application, and, even if he was asked to re-hear it, he did not do so. The receiver in the partnership suit asked the court for direction regarding what he was to do with money in his hands. A

The difficulty with regard to which he sought directions was whether the money, which was partnership assets, was to be paid to the landlord of the partnership premises for rent in priority to the charge of the solicitor. That might have been a difficulty if it had not been already decided. But there is a succession of cases which decide that, until the fund has been paid over to someone, a solicitor who has a charging order on it has priority over everyone except a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. Is that the true construction of s. 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860? In Dallow v. Garrold (1), it was held in terms to be so. In that case, I said (14 Q.B.D. at p. 546): C

“I really think that the statute means what it says: it means a person, who has actually purchased without notice the ‘property preserved or recovered,’ and who has paid in money the price for it.”

It is clear that the landlord has not done that. That case is a decision that a charging order in favour of a solicitor has priority over everyone except an actual purchaser for value as long as there is money in the hands of the holder of the fund charged which has not been paid away. That case adopted and approved of the previous decision in Shippey v. Grey (2), in which LORD BRAMWELL, BAGGALLAY, L.J., and myself had come to the same conclusion—viz., that a solicitor’s charging order has priority over everyone except a bona fide purchaser, unless the fund charged has been properly paid away to someone. Therefore, on authority and on principle, the charging order has priority over the landlord unless he has put in a distress, in the same way as it would have priority over a judgment creditor unless he had put in an execution. E

It was argued that this was an order made in bankruptcy, and that it could, therefore, be rescinded under s. 104 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. I have already said that this was not an order made in bankruptcy. It is true that CAVE, J., was sitting in Bankruptcy when he made the order, but he made it as a judge of the High Court. Section 104 (1) says: G

“Every court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy under this Act may review, rescind, or vary any order made by it under its bankruptcy jurisdiction,” that is, any order which is made by virtue of the powers given by the Bankruptcy Act. This order was not made by virtue of the powers given by the Bankruptcy Act, and I cannot, therefore, agree with the decision of CAVE, J., rescinding it. Neither of the cases that I have referred to were cited before CAVE, J. H

FRY, L.J.—I also am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts, and continued:] The first question is, was it competent to the learned judge to make an order varying the order he had previously made? I am of opinion that it was not. When once an order has been drawn up, the jurisdiction of the judge of the High Court in that matter has come to an end. The charging order in this case having been drawn up, and not having been made under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (which gives a special power of reviewing orders made under that Act to the bankruptcy court) but under the Solicitors Act, 1860, CAVE, J., had no power to re-hear the application. It is I

A further to be observed that the form of the second application was not that CAVE, J., should re-consider his former order, nor does the order on the second application purport to vary the former order.

Then the second question is, was the order that CAVE, J., finally made substantially right? He has given priority to the landlord's claim for rent over the solicitor's charge. It is suggested that the landlord has priority because of his right of distress. As far as I understand, if he does not avail himself of that right he has no priority because of it. The words of s. 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, are :

"In every case in which a solicitor shall be employed to prosecute or defend any suit or proceeding in any court of justice, it shall be lawful for the court or judge before whom any such suit or proceeding has been heard, or shall be depending, to declare such solicitor entitled to a charge upon the property recovered or preserved, and upon such declaration being made such solicitor shall have a charge upon and against and a right to payment out of the property, of whatsoever nature, tenure, or kind the same may be, which shall have been recovered or preserved through the instrumentality of any such solicitor, for the taxed costs, charges, and expenses of or in reference to such suit or proceeding; and it shall be lawful for such court or judge to make such order or orders for taxation of and for raising and payment of such costs, charges, and expenses out of the said property as to such court or judge shall appear just; and all conveyances and acts done to defeat, or which shall operate to defeat, such charge or right, shall, unless made to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, be absolutely void, and of no effect as against such charge or right."

That I take to be a declaration that the charge is to have priority over the claims of every one, except a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. Subject to that, the solicitor's charge takes priority over every other claim. Haymes v. Cooper (3), Shippey v. Grey (2), and Dallow v. Garrold (1), are all of them cases which support the plain language of the Act. I, therefore, think that there was no valid reason for rescinding the charging order.

LOPES, L.J.—The charging order was made by CAVE, J., as a judge of the High Court sitting in Bankruptcy, in April, 1887, and the first question is whether it is a subsisting and binding order. It is said that it is not, because the matter was re-heard, and the order varied by CAVE, J. I am of opinion that CAVE, J., had no jurisdiction to re-hear the matter. Re St. Nazaire Co. (4) shows clearly that a judge of the High Court has no jurisdiction to vary or discharge his order when once it has been drawn up and perfected. But, further, CAVE, J., was never asked by the receiver, to whom the charging order was directed, or by any other person, to vary that order. All that CAVE, J., did was to give some directions with regard to the payment of rent to the landlord out of the money in the receiver's hands. What, then, does the charging order bind, if it is a subsisting order? The authorities are clear that it binds all that is under the jurisdiction of the court of the fund charged in priority to every one, except a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. The landlord, in my opinion, cannot in any way be said to be a bona fide purchaser for value of this fund. Therefore, the solicitor who has the charging order takes priority, and this appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Appeal by the defendants from the decision of MANISTY and MATHEW, JJ., on the plaintiffs' motion for judgment.

The action was brought to recover damages for fraudulent misrepresentation by the defendants' secretary. At the trial before LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., with a jury, it appeared from the evidence that Tremayne, the defendants' secretary, in conjunction with one Maddison, had fraudulently issued certificates for debenture stock in excess of the amount which the defendants were authorised to issue. The plaintiffs' manager called on Tremayne, and made inquiries of him with reference to certain transfers of a part of the stock so issued, on which the plaintiffs had been asked to advance money. Tremayne said, in effect, that the transfers were valid, and that the stock which they purported to transfer existed. This statement did not benefit the defendants in any way, and was made solely in the interest of Tremayne and Maddison. Acting on it, the plaintiffs advanced the money and lost it. The jury found that the inquiries were made of Tremayne as secretary, and that the defendants held him out as such to answer such inquiries. The Chief Justice left either of the parties to move for judgment, and the Queen's Bench Division directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 21, 1887. LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case, an action has been brought by the plaintiffs to recover damages for a fraudulent misrepresentation of the defendants by their secretary, the defendants being a corporation. It cannot be doubted that the misrepresentation was a fraudulent one—that is to say, that the secretary knew at the time he made it that it was false. I think that the case was not clearly argued before the Divisional Court. The point argued there seems to have been that the fact that the defendants were a corporation was a fatal defect in the plaintiffs' case. It seems to me that there was a defect in the plaintiffs' case equally fatal whether the defendants were a corporation or not. One of the purposes for which the secretary was appointed was to answer questions on behalf of the defendants. If he had answered such questions falsely and fraudulently, I think that the defendants would have been liable. But he did not make the representation on their behalf; he made it for himself, having a friend whom he wished to help. If he was acting solely for himself or to assist his friend he was not acting for the defendants. The defendants would not have told a falsehood for the purpose of assisting their secretary or his friend. The secretary did that which the defendants would certainly not have done if they had been there. It is said that, if he was acting for their benefit, although the particular act was not for their benefit, they are bound by it. I know of no case where a master has been made liable for the fraud or negligence of his servant, where the purpose of such fraud or negligence is not the master's but solely the servant's own. The argument in the court below was founded on the defendants being a corporation; but the principle which I have stated is equally applicable to individuals and to corporations. The appeal must be allowed.

BOWEN, L.J., read the following judgment.—There is, so far as I am aware, no precedent in English law, unless it be Swift v. Winterbotham and Goddard (1), a case that was overruled on appeal sub nom. Swift v. Jewsbury and Goddard (1), for holding that a principal is liable in an action of deceit for the unauthorised and fraudulent act of a servant or agent, committed, not for the general or special benefit of the principal, but for the servant's own private ends. The true rule was, as it seems to me, enunciated by the Exchequer Chamber in a judgment of WILLES, J., delivered in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank (2) (L.R. 2 Exch. at p. 265):

"The general rule is, that the master is answerable for every such wrong of the servant or agent as is committed in the course of the service and for the master's benefit, though no express command or privity of the master be proved."

This definition of liability has been constantly referred to in subsequent cases as adequate and satisfactory, and was cited with approval by LORD SELBORNE in the House of Lords, in Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank (3). Mackay v. Commercial Bank of New Brunswick (4) is consistent with this principle. It is a definition strictly in accordance with the ruling of MARTIN, B., in Limpus v. London General Omnibus Co. (5), which was upheld in the Exchequer Chamber: see per BLACKBURN, J.

It was argued on behalf of the plaintiffs in the present appeal, that the defendants, although they might not have authorised the fraudulent answer given by the secretary, had, nevertheless, authorised the secretary to do "that class of acts" of which the fraudulent answer, it was said, was one. This is a misapplication to a wholly different case of an expression which, in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank (2), was perfectly appropriate with regard to the circumstances there. In that case, the act done, though not expressly authorised, was done for the master's benefit. With respect to acts of that description, it was doubtless correct to say that the agent was placed there to do acts of "that class." Transferred to a case like the present, the expression that the secretary was placed in his office to do acts of "that class" begs the very question at issue, for the defendants' proposition is, on the contrary, that an act done, not for the employer's benefit, but for the servant's own private ends, is not an act of the class which the secretary either was or could possibly be authorised to do. It is said that the secretary was clothed ostensibly with a real or apparent authority to make representations as to the genuineness of the debentures in question; but no action of contract lies for a false representation, unless the maker of it or his principal has either contracted that the representation is true, or is estopped from denying that he has done so. In the present case, the defendants could not in law have so contracted, for any such contract would have been beyond their corporate powers. And if they cannot contract, how can they be estopped from denying that they have done so?

The action against them, therefore, to be maintainable at all, must be an action of tort, founded on deceit and fraud. But how can a company be made liable for a fraudulent answer given by their officer for his own private ends, by which they could not have been bound if they had actually authorised him to make it, and promised to be bound by it? The question resolves itself accordingly into a dilemma. The fraudulent answer must have either been within the scope of the agent's employment or outside it. It could not have been within it, for the defendants had no power to bind themselves to the consequences of any such answer. If it is not within it, on what ground can the defendants be made responsible for an agent's act done beyond the scope of his employment, and from which they derived no benefit? This shows that the proposition that the secretary in the present case was employed to do that "class of acts" is fallacious, and cannot be maintained. The judgment of the court below is based on the view that the act done was, in fact, within the scope of the secretary's employment, and, if this proposition cannot be maintained, the judgment must fall with it. How far a statutory corporate body could in any case be made liable in an action for deceit beyond the extent of the benefits which they have reaped by the fraud is a matter on which I desire to express no opinion, for none is necessary to the decision here; but even if the principals in the present case were not a statutory body, with limited powers of contracting and of action, I think that there would be danger in departing from the definition of liability laid down by WILLES, J., in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank (2), and in extending the responsibility of a principal for the frauds committed by a servant or agent beyond the boundaries hitherto recognised by English law.

I think, therefore, that this appeal must be allowed, with costs.

FRY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I agree with the judgment which has just been delivered. It appears to me that the misrepresentations of the secretary, which are relied on in this case, were made in the interest of his friend, and not in the interest of the defendants. The defendants cannot be estopped from saying that the secretary had no authority to make these representations. If there was any ground of estoppel in this case, the effect would be that the defendants would be estopped from denying that the stock was good. But no corporate body can be bound by estoppel to do something beyond their corporate powers, such as issuing stock beyond the authorised limit. If there is no estoppel, it certainly cannot be said that the secretary had, in fact, authority to make these representations. Nor can it be put on any ground of ratification by the defendants, as it perhaps might have been if the defendants had accepted benefits that accrued to them owing to the representations. I am unable, therefore, to see any ground for maintaining this action, and the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

ROYAL BRISTOL PERMANENT BUILDING SOCIETY v. BOMASH

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Kekewich, J.), January 15, 17, 1887]

[Reported 35 Ch.D. 390; 56 L.J.Ch. 840; 57 L.T. 179]

Sale of Land—Contract—Breach—Person in unlawful occupation—Right of purchaser to eviction by sheriff.

Sale of Land—Contract—Breach—Damages—Measure—Right of purchaser to compensation for loss of profit.

Sale of Land—Contract—Position pending completion—Vendor's duty to take reasonable care of property.

A purchaser agreed to buy two houses, vacant possession of which was to be given on completion. When the day fixed for completion arrived, the houses were occupied by someone who was holding over. He was evicted by the sheriff a month later, but, as a result of the delay, the purchaser lost a tenant to whom he had agreed to let one of the houses. The vendors had failed to take reasonable care of the property since the agreement. The purchaser having refused to complete, in an action for specific performance brought against him by the vendor, he counterclaimed for specific performance, with compensation for the rent he had lost and damages for the injury to the property.

Held: (i) although the purchaser could have had the person in occupation evicted by the sheriff, the vendor was in breach of his obligation to give vacant possession on completion; (ii) where damages in respect of delay caused by one party's refusal to perform the contract were claimed in addition to specific performance, the other party might recover in respect of loss of profit, damages naturally arising from the delay, or which might be reasonably supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties as likely to arise from the partial breach, and, therefore, the purchaser was entitled to compensation for the rent lost; (iii) the vendors were trustees of the property for the purchaser from the date of the contract and ought to have taken reasonable care of the property, and, therefore, they were liable for the injury which had happened to it.

Action in which the plaintiffs, the Royal Bristol Permanent Building Society, claimed specific performance by the defendant, T. S. Bomash, of an agreement by him to purchase from them certain property, and a Counterclaim by the defendant for specific performance of the agreement, damages for not having been given possession on the date fixed for completion, and damages for deterioration of G the property since the agreement was entered into.

The plaintiffs were the mortgagees from Mr. W. Fleming of two leasehold houses at Penarth, Glamorganshire. On Oct. 14, 1885, the houses were put up for sale by the plaintiffs under the power of sale contained in their mortgage, and were bought by the defendant, Mr. T. S. Bomash, for £650, subject to conditions of sale. The defendant signed the usual memorandum of agreement, and H paid a deposit of £65. By the particulars of sale it was stated that the property was "recently in the occupation of Mr. William Fleming." The day fixed by the conditions for the completion of the purchase was Nov. 11, 1885. By the 15th condition it was provided that as from the day fixed for completion the rents or possession should belong to the purchaser, but, unless otherwise provided by the special conditions, he should not be let into the actual possession or receipt of I the rents until the completion of the purchase. By condition 16 it was provided that if the purchaser should not complete at the time appointed he should pay interest on the remainder of the purchase money until the same should be paid; or the vendors might, at their option, take the rents or retain possession of the property; but that, if the delay in completion should arise from any cause other than the neglect or default of the purchaser, and he should place the remainder of the purchase money in the bank named in the conditions upon a deposit account bearing interest and give notice to the vendors, they should, during the continuance of such deposit, be entitled to such interest only as should be produced thereby, and should not be entitled to take the rents. On Nov. 28, 1885, the defendant deposited £585, the balance of the purchase money, in the bank named in the conditions, and gave notice of such deposit to the vendors. Fleming was in occupation of the houses at the date of the agreement for sale, and was not removed until Dec. 15, 1885, after an action of ejectment against him by the plaintiffs. Possession was not offered to the defendant until Dec. 12, 1885. The defendant having refused to complete until the plaintiffs performed their part of the agreement by giving him possession, the plaintiffs instituted this action on Dec. 17, 1885, and claimed specific performance of the agreement of Oct. 14, 1885, and damages. The defendant relied upon the misdescription in the particulars as to the occupation as implying that there was vacant possession, and asserted that he had bought with a view of immediate letting, and had lost a tenant for a term of fourteen years at £85, and had otherwise suffered damage from the plaintiffs having failed to give him possession. He, therefore, counterclaimed for specific performance of the agreement, and for damages for the failure of the plaintiffs to give him possession on Nov. 11, or, at any rate, Nov. 28, 1885.

E. Ford for the plaintiffs.

KEKEWICH, J.—I have now to dispose of two questions which depend more or less on the main question who is in default.

The first question is as to the possession. I have no doubt, quite independently of Hughes v. Jones (2), that this contract was a contract for the sale of these houses, with vacant possession. I have no doubt that this contract contains what I may describe as a guarantee that, on completion of the purchase, the purchaser would be let into possession. That being so, and it being admitted on all hands that he could not have possession at the date fixed for the completion of the contract, and could not have had possession until either Dec. 15 or 16, the question is, whether the purchaser or the vendors were in default, and whether, if the vendors were in default, the purchaser is entitled to any and what compensation.

Counsel for the plaintiffs has argued with considerable force that the sheriff could have given possession and would have given possession to the purchaser on a day which would have satisfied all the reasonable requirements of the purchaser. I do not think that a purchaser having a contract to sell, with vacant possession, is bound to take possession from the sheriff when he knows, as he did know in this case, that the man to be evicted, the man who had been holding over, was still on the premises, and would have to be turned out by force. I think the purchaser is, under those circumstances, entitled to say: "Exercise your rights; first turn the man out; then give me vacant possession." Therefore, I think the vendors were in fault; that they had contracted to give vacant possession; that they were not prepared to give vacant possession; that they were not prepared to give vacant possession at the time when the contract ought to have been completed; and that in fact the purchaser could not have got within a reasonable time that vacant possession for which he had contracted; and to that extent he has obtained something less than that which he contracted to buy.

The question is whether he is entitled to be compensated for that. On Nov. 2, 1885—that is, before the date fixed for the completion—he entered into an agreement with a Mr. Wilson to let him these houses for a term of fourteen years at the yearly rent of £85, and that was to be completed on Nov. 16, 1885. The day of completion of the original contract having been the 11th there was five days' margin. As a matter of fact, Mr. Wilson's contract went off. He wanted vacant possession; he could not get vacant possession; and on some day not accurately fixed, but varying, I think, from Nov. 16 to 23, 1885, he A threw up his bargain as he was entitled to do. He was cross-examined to show that he was willing to stay on. I dare say he was. The premises seemed suitable to him. He does not seem to say that it was too much rent to pay, and it may be, after all, he will take them; but was the purchaser bound to urge him to wait, and can we say now that Mr. Wilson was not reasonable in throwing them up? B At that time there was no proof that Mr. Fleming would be turned out at any particular day. He was still in possession, and was apparently not intending to go out, and I do not think Mr. Wilson acted otherwise than prudently in throwing up a bargain of that kind, nor that the purchaser acted otherwise than prudently in acquiescing, and saying: "I cannot help it. I am not prepared to give you the possession which I bargained for, and I must part with you." C Therefore, the defendant suffered some reasonable loss. I think he might fairly presume that the vendors would do their duty and get rid of Fleming, so as to complete the contract, say by Dec. 3; and I do not think it was an unreasonable contract for him to enter into. He did enter into it, and lost it; and he claims to be compensated for that loss.

This question deals with a branch of law which is very difficult, and for the D reason that there is certainly a distinction between compensation and damages.
It has always been held that a purchaser may, if he likes, take specific performance with compensation, though a vendor cannot force it upon him; but where what he wants is strictly damages, such as were claimed in Bain v.
Fothergill (1)—damages for the loss of a bargain where the title has failed—then it has been held that he cannot get those damages. The question here is, not E whether this is compensation or damages, because the distinction is not sufficiently defined for that, but whether it is damages in the nature of compensation or not.
In FRY ON SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (2nd Edn.), p. 550, the distinction is drawn, and reference is made to Protheroe v. Phelps (3), in which damages were given in the nature of compensation. I hold the distinction applicable here, and, giving the purchaser damages in the nature of compensation, I must consider what is the F proper measure of damages. There, again, I am assisted by Jaques v. Millar (4).
FRY, J., says in his judgment (6 Ch.D. at p. 159):

"The question of damages is a more difficult one. Damages are claimed in addition to the specific performance of the agreement, in respect of the delay which was caused by the defendant's wilful refusal [here it is the plaintiffs' G refusal, though there is no wilful refusal on their part, and I do not impute it to them] to perform his contract, and the consequent loss of profit to the plaintiff. I think I am at liberty to consider what would have been the value of the possession of the premises to the plaintiff for the period between Sept. 5, 1876, and the time when he actually obtained possession of other premises. I shall not attempt to explain in detail the motives which operate H on my mind. But I am entitled to have regard to the damages which may be reasonably said to have naturally arisen from the delay, or which may be reasonably supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties as likely to arise from the partial breach of the contract."

I hold this case to fall, not within Bain v. Fothergill (1), which seems to me to deal with a different class of circumstances altogether, but to fall within a class I of cases which is illustrated by Jaques v. Millar (4), and I must give the defendant damages calculated on some such principle as FRY, J., indicated. I think that the proper way of doing that is simply to take the rent which he would have received under that contract, against which there is nothing to set off. That seems to me to be the reasonable way of dealing with the case. I take it at a year and three months roughly, and I shall award the defendant £110 damages by way of compensation for not having obtained that vacant possession, which I think he was entitled to under the contract.

A There is one other question, and that is the question of deterioration of the premises after the date of the contract. I have to consider what was the duty of the vendors. The duty of the vendor was considered in Foster v. Deacon (5), which was cited to me on behalf of the defendant; but I prefer to turn to the later case of Phillips v. Silvester (6). There LORD SELBORNE in substance says that the vendor under a contract of sale of real estate is a trustee for the purchaser. Of course we all know that he is a trustee in a modified sense. There are many things to be done before he becomes a mere trustee; but still LORD SELBORNE says he is a trustee, and I have no doubt that that is the right position, and I so decide. He deals with the question on p. 177 of 8 Ch.D. I will not read his language at length; but it comes to this: that a vendor having property under his control, and in his possession, which he has contracted to sell, is bound to keep it in a reasonable state of repair, so that a purchaser may take the thing which he has contracted to buy, unless there are some special circumstances which alter that obligation. He suggests the possibility of a case where the expenses of repair might be greater than those which the property would bear; and cases of that kind might of course occur. But the general nature of the case is what I have stated. I was referred to DART ON VENDORS AND PURCHASERS (5th Edn.), p. 650, in which comments are made on Phillips v. Silvester (6) as with the authority of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., who decided the case on further consideration. That makes me regret still more that the case was not reported on further consideration. I must take Phillips v. Silvester (6) as laying down the law, unless in the remarks made upon it (which I may take to be SIR GEORGE JESSEL's remarks) I can see established some exception to the general rule, as laid down by LORD SELBORNE. I do not find any such exception, and, on turning to Earl of Egmont v. Smith (7), I find SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., himself stating the obligation of the vendor precisely in the language which was used by LORD SELBORNE. He says that it is the duty of the vendor to re-let the farm which he had sold to the purchaser, as to which he says (6 Ch.D. at p. 475): "I have no doubt whatever." But I rely on this passage (ibid.):

"He is certainly a trustee for the purchaser, a trustee, no doubt, with peculiar duties and liabilities, for it is a fallacy to suppose that every trustee has the same duties and liabilities; but he is a trustee."

Therefore, I regard the vendors in this case as trustees for the purchaser from the date of the contract. I think they ought to have taken that reasonable care of the property which would have prevented it from being damaged by Fleming in the exercise of his legal rights, or by anyone who removed the fixtures, or by vagrants or other persons coming in, or by people who broke windows, or anything of the kind. I think they ought to have kept it in a reasonable state of repair, and the evidence proves conclusively that they have done nothing of the kind. The place is much dilapidated. It is difficult to say how much would put it in repair, because the evidence on that point has been mixed up with that as to the removal of the fixtures; but I think it right and fair under the circumstances to award £25 under that head.

There will be judgment on the claim, and counterclaim for specific performance, and for the payment by the defendant to the plaintiffs of the purchase money with interest until the agreed day when the money was deposited in the bank, with the following deductions: £1 for damage to the garden; £110 as compensation for the want of vacant possession; and £25 for the damage to the property since the date of the contract. The plaintiffs must pay the general costs of the action.

Company—Shares—Transfer—Forged transfer—Joint holders—Co-executors—Transfer by one executor—Signature of other executor forged—Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict., c. 16), s. 20.

Limitation of Action—Company—Invalid transfer of shares—Subsequent discovery of fraud—Accrual of cause of action.

Executor—Powers—Co-executors—Shares—Sale by one executor—Signature of other executor forged—Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict., c. 16), s. 20.

Under the will of a testator, who died in 1870, railway stock was vested in his executors, T. B. (his son) and A. B. (his widow), upon certain trusts. At various times during the years 1880 to 1885 T. B., without the knowledge of A. B., entered into contracts for sale of the stock, and signed and executed transfers thereof to the several purchasers, forging the signature of A. B. to such transfers, so that they appeared to be signed and executed by her. These transfers were duly registered by the railway company, and the proceeds of sale were received by T. B. and applied by him to his own purposes, but he continued to pay the amount of the dividends to the persons entitled. A. B. remained ignorant of the forgeries until May, 1886, when she discovered them. She then wrote to the secretary of the railway company asking whether any stock was standing in the names of herself and T. B., and a deed was executed appointing a new trustee of the will in the place of T. B. In August, 1886, A. B. and the new trustee informed the company that the transfers resulting from T. B.'s transactions were invalid, and claimed to be registered as holders of the stock. The company declined to accede to the claim, and in December, 1886, A. B. and the new trustee brought an action, alleging that the transfers were invalid, and claiming that the company might be ordered to register the plaintiffs as owners of the stock. The action was brought more than six years after some of the transfers were executed and registered, and, as to the stock comprised in such transfers, the defendants sought to raise by amendment the defence of the Statute of Limitations. They also contended (among other grounds of defence) that T. B., being one of the two executors, had power to transfer the stock, and that the transfers were, therefore, valid.

Held: (i) the cause of action was not the invalid transfer of the shares in question, but the refusal of the company, when the forgery was made known to them, to treat the plaintiffs as shareholders, and, therefore, the action was not statute-barred; (ii) the transfers were invalid, since, whatever the powers of the executors as to other property vested in them in that character, one co-executor had no power alone to transfer stock or shares governed by the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, which were in the joint names of the executors; (iii) in equity, A. B. had sufficient interest to enable her to sue; (iv) whatever remedies the company might have against T. B., they could not, at the suit of A. B., deny that the stock had not been validly transferred; (v) the fact that the purchase money had been paid to T. B., one of the co-executors, did not give rise to any counterclaim by the company against the testator's estate; and, therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to be registered as the owners of the shares.

Per CURIAM: If A. B. had signed a transfer, supposing it to be a document of some other kind, her signature would in law be as complete a nullity as a forged signature.

Action by the plaintiffs, Ann Barton and Elizabeth Ashe, the then trustees of the will of Samuel Barton deceased, claiming that the defendant company might be ordered to appropriate or purchase and to transfer to and register in the names of the plaintiffs £5,000 consolidated stock, and £1,090 preference stock of the company. Purchasers of the stock were joined as third parties, but an order was made directing that the question of their liability should be determined at a future time.

On Jan. 2, 1870, Samuel Barton died, having by his will appointed his son, Thomas Barton, and his widow, the plaintiff, Ann Barton, trustees and executors, and having made bequests under which £3,000 ordinary stock of the North Staffordshire Rail. Co. was held upon certain trusts for the benefit of his three daughters, sisters of Thomas Barton, and their respective children, and £1,090 preference stock of the same railway company upon trust for his widow, Ann Barton, who was his third wife and not the mother of Thomas Barton, and his two daughters by her, now Mrs. Dyer and Mrs. Rogers. Thomas Barton and Ann Barton both proved the will. After the testator's death they invested a portion of his estate in the purchase of a further sum of £2,000 ordinary stock of the same railway company upon trust for the widow and her two daughters. The probate of the will was produced to the railway company, and all the stock was registered in the names of the two executors, the address of both being given as Parvey Cottage, near Macclesfield, which was the family residence at the testator's death, so that any notice as to the stock would be sent to them there. Other part of the testator's estate was invested in stock of the London and North-Western Rail. Co., which was also, I understand, registered in the names of both executors in like manner. A

For a short time after the testator's death Thomas Barton and Ann Barton and her daughters continued to live together at Parvey Cottage, but in June, 1870, the widow and her daughters removed to Willow Cottage, another house belonging to the testator, about two hundred yards distant. Thomas Barton, who was a married man and was engaged with his brother George in a business of silk manufacturers in Macclesfield, continued to live with his family at Parvey Cottage. In 1875 one of Mrs. Barton's daughters, Mrs. Dyer, married and left Willow Cottage. She attained twenty-one in 1877. The other daughter, Mrs. Rogers, lived with her mother till July 5, 1883, when she also married. Down to the year 1872 the widow was accustomed to sign the dividend warrants on the railway stock. In August of that year she seems to have gone away for a fortnight's visit to Southport, and after that time she alleges that these warrants were no longer signed by her, though they seemed to have been signed with her name as well as that of Thomas Barton. It has, however, been proved that she did sign and cash at Messrs. Brocklehurst's bank at Macclesfield two dividend warrants, dated Mar. 1, 1876, and that on Mar. 1, 1877, she also signed two other dividend warrants, and divided the amount with her daughter, Mrs. Rogers. The dividends on all these stocks were paid regularly to the parties respectively entitled down to the end of 1885 by remittances, generally in cash, from Thomas Barton. The certificates of the railway stock and other trust documents were kept in a box at Parvey Cottage, of which Thomas Barton and Ann Barton each had a key. On May 26 or 27, 1886, Mrs. Dyer went to visit her sister, Mrs. Rogers, who lived at Seaforth, near Liverpool, and on the 29th, being a Saturday, Mrs. Dyer went to visit her mother, Ann Barton, at Willow Cottage, and on Monday, the 31st, Mrs. Rogers followed her. B C D E F

One of her stepdaughters, the plaintiff, Mrs. Ashe, a sister of Thomas Barton, whose suspicions seemed to have been aroused by the irregularity in the payment of her dividends, and by the reluctance of her brother Thomas to produce the papers which were necessary to prove the will of another sister, who had died in November, 1885, induced Ann Barton to take the advice of Mr. Hand, a solicitor at Macclesfield, and at his suggestion, some time in May, 1886, they went to Parvey Cottage when Thomas Barton was not there and opened the deed box and ascertained that the certificates of the railway stock had disappeared. Thereupon they took away the deed box to the office of Mr. Hand. Afterwards they had an interview with Thomas Barton, at which—so Mrs. Barton stated—he told her that he had sold all the stock, and had signed her name and that of a witness to the transfers. Mrs. Ashe said that she and Mr. Hand were present when she heard him confess the forgery. Mrs. Dyer, in her cross-examination, stated that she only heard him say he had signed the name of a witness. G H

On June 14, 1886, the following letter, which had been composed by Mr. and Mrs. Dyer and Ann Barton, was written out by Ann Barton and sent to the North Staffordshire Rail. Co., and a similar letter was at the same time sent to the London and North-Western Rail. Co., some stock of which it seemed Barton had also sold : I

“Sir,—Will you kindly inform me if there are still any shares in the North Staffordshire Rail. Co. standing in my name and that of my co-trustee, Thomas Barton, of Parvey, Sutton, Macclesfield? The reason I ask for the information is that all the scrip relating to the shares has disappeared from the deed box. If any transfer has taken place, would it be possible to inform me when it occurred, and to whom? £3,000 N. S. consolidated stock was bought prior to the date of the will of my late husband, Samuel Barton, Esq., of Parvey, Sutton, Macclesfield, made in 1864; £1,090 five per cent. preference stock and £2,000 ordinary stock was bought between the years 1864 and 1880. The will of my late husband was proved at Chester on Feb. 14, 1870, by my co-trustee, Thomas Barton, and myself. An early answer will greatly oblige me, as the matter is most urgent.—Faithfully yours, ANN BARTON. I may as well state that I have received no intimation of any transfer. Address Mrs. Barton, care of Mrs. Cooper, Rushton, near Macclesfield.”

On June 17, 1886, the secretary of the railway company answered thus :

“Secretary’s Office, North Staffordshire Railway, Stoke-upon-Trent, June 17, 1886. Madam,—In reply to your letter of 14th inst., I beg to give you on the other side details of the sale of the £3,000 ordinary stock, and the £1,090 new preference stock originally registered in the name of the late Samuel Barton, of Macclesfield, and to state that all the transfers are signed by yourself and Mr. Thomas Barton, and witnessed by William Broadhurst, Sutton, clerk. Your obedient servant, J. PEARCE, for the Secretary. Mrs. Barton, care of Mrs. Cooper, Rushton, near Macclesfield.”

On the other side there was the following statement :

“Re £3,000 ordinary stock; £1,000 sold by transfer registered Aug. 10, 1880; £700 ditto, Mar. 23, 1881; £300 ditto, April 19, 1881; £1,000 ditto, Aug. 9, 1881—total £3,000. Re £1,090 new Five per Cent. Preference stock: £400 sold by transfer registered Mar. 7, 1882; £690 ditto, Mar. 16, 1882—total £1,090.”

On July 1, 1886, two deeds were executed by Thomas Barton, one appointing the plaintiff Mrs. Ashe a new trustee in his place, and the other assigning his interest under his father’s will to indemnify the other beneficiaries from any loss which they might incur owing to his having sold the railway stock. On July 17 Thomas Barton sailed for America. On the 24th the husband of Mrs. Rogers, who it seems was a sailor, came home from sea, and in August Mrs. Rogers swore an information against Thomas Barton, on which, however, no proceeding was taken.

On Aug. 26, 1886, a solicitor’s letter was written to the railway company stating distinctly that the transfers were alleged to be forged, and claiming that the plaintiffs were still shareholders, and this not being acceded to, on Dec. 10, 1886, the writ in this action was issued against the railway company.

There was evidence by Mrs. Barton and her two daughters, Mrs. Dyer and Mrs. Rogers, that after her removal to Willow Cottage, Mrs. Barton very seldom saw her stepson Thomas Barton. He visited her, it was said, about three times by special invitation, but except on these occasions he did not go to her house. Mrs. Barton left Willow Cottage and went to reside at Rushton, about six miles distant, on June 12, 1886.

The stock in the defendant railway company was transferred by eleven deeds in different sums on the following dates: £1,000 ordinary stock on July 31, 1886; £1,000 on the same day; £700 on Feb. 28, 1881; £300 on the same day, and £1,000 on July 16, 1881; £200 preference stock on Feb. 17, 1882, £200 and £150 on the same day, £540 on Mar. 22, 1882; £800 ordinary stock on Sept. 30, 1882, and £200 on July 18, 1885. The sales were all made by Mr. Reynolds, a dealer in stocks and shares, living at Walbrook, on the instructions of Thomas Barton, to whom all the proceeds were sent by cheques, which Thomas Barton endorsed and cashed. For each of the sums of stock last mentioned, a separate transfer deed was executed which purported to be signed both by Thomas and Ann Barton. Mrs. Barton’s signature in every case appeared to be witnessed by William Broadhurst, who was a clerk in the employ of Thomas Barton.

By the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 20 :

"The company shall not be bound to see to the execution of any trust, whether express, implied or constructive, to which any of the said shares may be subject; and the receipt of the party in whose name any such share shall stand in the books of the company, or if it stands in the names of more parties than one the receipt of one of the parties named in the register of shareholders, shall from time to time be a sufficient discharge to the company for any dividend or other sum of money payable in respect of such share, notwithstanding any trusts to which such share may then be subject, and whether or not the company have had notice of such trusts; and the company shall not be bound to see to the application of the money paid upon such receipt."

Rigby, Q.C., Renshaw, Q.C., and Whitaker for the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 15, 1888. KAY, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts as set out above, and continued: Mrs. Barton, in her evidence, denied that she executed any of the transfers, or knew anything about them, but she said in effect that Thomas Barton was the acting executor, and that she was accustomed to sign, and probably would have signed, anything he asked her. I cannot bring myself to believe that the signatures to the deeds of transfer were really hers. Even if they were, the inference seems to be irresistible that they were obtained under circumstances which would support a plea of non est factum. A signature to a deed which the party signing did not know to be a deed of transfer, but supposed to be a document of some other kind, is in law as complete a nullity as a forged signature. But the fair inference from all the evidence is that Ann Barton's signatures to these eleven deeds of transfer were forgeries actually written by Thomas Barton. The plaintiffs and defendants are all perfectly innocent in this matter, and have been deceived by the fraud of Thomas Barton.

Possibly some amendments of the pleadings on both sides may be necessary to raise the issues with which I am going to deal. Whatever amendments may be requisite I allow and shall consider as made.

The real claim of the plaintiffs is to be treated by the railway company as shareholders. They say, and I agree with the contention, that the forged transfers must be considered as nullities. One defence raised by amendment is a plea of Statute of Limitations. The actual plaintiffs are Ann Barton and Mrs. Ashe, who was appointed her co-trustee by the deed of July 1, 1886, in the place of Thomas Barton. This suit was instituted on Dec. 10, 1886, more than six years after most of the attempted dealings with this stock. It is settled that after a partnership has ceased any claim on simple contract by one former partner against the others in respect thereof is prima facie subject to be barred after the expiration of six years: Knox v. Gye (1). On the other hand, while a partnership is continuing there is no authority for suggesting that a claim between the partners is affected by the statute, and the opinion of LINDLEY, L.J., is to the contrary: LINDLEY ON PARTNERSHIP (4th Edn.), p. 966. In a case of exclusion time would begin to run from the act of exclusion. It has been argued in this case that if a partner does not draw his share of profits or act as partner for six years he, at the end of that time, loses all remedy against his co-partners, and, therefore, practically ceases to be a partner. And it is urged that this being the case as to a partnership, the analogy ought to be followed in railway companies and other trading corporations, and that a shareholder who makes no claim for six years has no remedy in respect of his share against the company. If this be so, any such company might direct that after six years' silence a pen should be drawn through the shareholder's name on the register, and he would practically cease to be a member of the corporation. And, in answer to a question from the court, the argument was pressed to this extent. Such a conclusion shows that there must be a fallacy in the premises. I know of no authority for saying that a partner who does nothing for six years loses all remedies against his co-partners. Time only begins to run against him from an act of exclusion.

If the analogy be applicable there must be a similar act in the case of a shareholder to enable the company to avail itself of the statute against him. Nothing of the kind took place here until the resistance by the company to the claim made in this action. The cause of action is, not the invalid transfers of the shares in question, but the refusal of the company, when the forgery was made known to them, to treat the plaintiffs as shareholders. It is an elementary principle that time does not begin to run until there is a complete cause of action, and there was no complete cause of action in this case until such refusal.

In Davis v. Bank of England (1) there is a judgment of BEST, C.J., in which the question of the Statute of Limitations, in a similar case, is considered. The facts of that case somewhat resembled the present. Certain sums of consols and other government securities standing in the name of the plaintiff had been sold under forged powers of attorney. The plaintiff sued the Bank of England in an action on the case for permitting the transfer without his authority, and for refusing to pay him dividends. The action was brought within six years from the date of the sales, so that no decision on the question of the Statute of Limitations was necessary. BEST, C.J., said (2 Bing. at p. 405) :

"We cannot do justice to this plaintiff unless we hold that the stocks are still his. . . . Another consequence of the stocks being considered as transferred will be most alarming to those who live at a distance from London, and receive their dividends by attorney, namely, that their claim to compensation in case their stocks should be transferred without their authority may be barred by the Statute of Limitations."

Later on he says (ibid. at p. 410) :

"If the plaintiffs' action had been founded on the concealment of the forgeries it could not have been supported, but the action is founded on the refusal of the bank to pay on demand the dividends of the plaintiff due on stocks belonging to him ;"

and judgment was given for the plaintiff accordingly. That decision was reversed in error upon the ground that there was no allegation in the declaration, and no finding in the verdict that the bank had ever received the dividends from the government, but the judgment of BEST, C.J., has not been considered as affected by such reversal: see Coles v. Bank of England (3); Sloman v. Bank of England (4).

Then it was suggested that Thomas Barton and Ann Barton being co-executors, one of them alone could have transferred the stock which was registered in the names of both. No authority for this proposition was cited, and I am clearly of opinion that, whatever the powers of executors may be as to other property vested in them in that character, they have no such power as to railway shares or stock which are governed by the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. With respect to these their rights and liabilities as between themselves and the company are the same as those of other shareholders, and the company is expressly exonerated by s. 20 from being bound to see to the execution of any trust.

The next argument was that if they are to be treated as joint holders of the stock, the transfers must be good as to one moiety, because it is not denied that they were executed by Thomas Barton. This was answered by SHADWELL, V.-C., in Sloman v. Bank of England (4) (14 Sim. at p. 488). If the transfers were good as to one half, the other half would remain in the names of the two, and he might then transfer one moiety of that, and so on until the residuum was infinitesimal.

Another consideration which was not pressed at the Bar, but which I cannot overlook, is that it may be said that this action is practically brought by Thomas Barton as one of the co-plaintiffs. Mrs. Ashe has been appointed a trustee in his place. Of course she is not executrix of Samuel Barton, but she and Ann Barton are suing as co-trustees of the will, and, as far as the legal interests in this stock are concerned, the suit may be said to be the same as a suit by or in the names of Thomas and Ann Barton. One of two joint owners having forged the name of the other to transfers, the two then come and say those transfers are nullities. Doubtless they are; but could Thomas Barton be heard to say so, and if not, how does this estoppel affect Ann Barton? I apprehend that the answer is that in equity Ann Barton has sufficient interest to enable her to sue, making Thomas Barton a defendant. Of course, if he were here, the company might have remedies against him personally—criminal and civil. But at the suit of Ann Barton they could not deny that the stock had not been validly transferred. This seems to have been taken for granted in more than one case. In Sloman v. Bank of England (4) government stock standing in the names of two trustees was sold by one of them under a forged power of attorney. The bill was filed by the other trustee and the beneficiaries suggesting that the remedy was in equity, for if an action had been brought it must have been in the joint names of the two trustees, one of whom had fraudulently sold the stock. It was held by SHADWELL, V.-C., that relief could be had in equity, because the other trustee could say against the bank, "Stock stood in my name, and I have not authorised the transfer of it. You are responsible to me; that is to say, you must make the account stand as it ought to have stood." In Taylor v. Midland Rail. Co. (5) stock of the Midland Rail. Co. standing in the names of Taylor and Bright was attempted to be transferred by Bright by a deed of transfer to which he forged the name of Taylor. After Taylor's death his legal personal representatives were held entitled to recover his share of the stock against the railway company; and this was affirmed in the House of Lords. And it was distinctly decided that there was a right to sue in equity even if the right at law was gone by the death of Taylor in the lifetime of Bright.

It was suggested that the pleadings should be amended by allowing a counter-claim on the ground that the money for the purchase of the shares was properly paid to Thomas Barton as one of two executors. The answer is obvious. The money was not paid by the railway company, but by the purchaser of the shares. They are not parties, and I am not dealing with their rights in any way. Another answer is that, if the railway company could make any claim to this money, that claim must be made against Thomas Barton, not against the estate of the late Samuel Barton. The claim must proceed upon an admission that the money was obtained by forgery and fraud. How could the estate be made liable for it? I cannot permit such an amendment. The defence, as actually framed, denies the forgery, and also pleads that the loss has been occasioned by the negligence of Ann Barton. This latter point was not insisted on at the Bar, and I think properly, for it seems to me that no such case of negligence is established by the evidence.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs have made out their case and are entitled to a declaration that the alleged transfers were invalid by reason of the forgery of the name of Ann Barton as a person executing the same, and the railway company must be ordered to register the plaintiffs as owners of the shares. No doubt the matter deserved the closest investigation, and it was quite natural that the railway company should desire to have it formally tried. But the present plaintiffs are, I think, free from all blame, and, as my opinion upon all the points raised is in their favour, I think they are entitled to judgment, with costs. I observe that the costs were given to the plaintiff in Sloman v. Bank of England (4).

WHITHAM v. KERSHAW

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Cotton and Bowen, L.JJ.), December 18, 1885, February 1, 1886]

[Reported 16 Q.B.D. 613; 54 L.T. 124; 34 W.R. 340; 2 T.L.R. 281]

Landlord and Tenant—Waste—Damages—Measure—Diminution in value of property.

In an action for waste brought by a landlord against a tenant during the continuance of the tenancy, the measure of damages is the diminution in value of the property caused by the acts of waste, and not the cost of restoring the property to the condition in which it was before such acts were committed.

Notes. LORD ESHER, M.R., in his judgment states that the amount of damages recoverable for breach of the implied covenant against waste is not so great as that recoverable for breach of the covenant to deliver up the premises in good condition at the expiration of the term. At common law, the measure of damages for breach of the latter was the sum which it would cost to put the premises in the state of repair in which the tenant ought, under the covenant, to have left them, but it is now limited to the amount by which the value of the reversion has been diminished: Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18 (1).

Martin v. Porter (1839), 5 M. & W. 351; 2 Horn & H. 70; 151 E.R. 149; 34 Digest 657, 567.

Appeal by the defendant, a tenant, on the issue of damages, from a decision of MATHEW, J., without a jury at Leeds Assizes awarding £60 damages to the plaintiff, the landlord, for waste committed by the defendant.

The plaintiff and the defendant being allottees of adjoining plots of moorland, the plaintiff demised his plot of seven acres to the defendant. At the period when the acts of waste complained of were committed, about nine years of the term remained unexpired. The acts of waste consisted in removing portions of the soil of the plot of land which the defendant held on lease from the plaintiff, and depositing the soil so removed on the defendant's own allotment, for the purpose of fertilising and bringing into cultivation the land of the defendant's allotment. The learned judge gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff for £60 damages, being the amount which it appeared from the evidence it would cost to reinstate the land of the plaintiff's allotment in the same condition in which it was before the commission of the acts complained of. The defendant appealed from this judgment on the ground that the damages were assessed on a wrong principle, and were excessive. On the hearing of the appeal, in order to avoid the necessity for a new trial, it was arranged by the consent of both parties that, in the event of its being decided that the principle on which the damages had been assessed was erroneous, the Court of Appeal should decide as to what reduction should be made.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 1, 1886. LORD ESHER, M.R.—This is an action for waste. The plaintiff and the defendant were allottees of adjoining plots of moorland, and the plaintiff let his allotment to the defendant. While the defendant was in occupation of both allotments he took away a quantity of soil off the plaintiff's land and put it on his own land.

The question to be decided is what is the proper measure of damages in an action for waste brought by a landlord against his tenant. I am of opinion that the mistake which has been made is that the learned judge at the trial treated the implied covenant against waste as producing the same result as the covenant to deliver up the premises in good condition at the expiration of the term. The two cases are not the same, and the amount of damages recoverable in the former case is not so great as that recoverable in the latter. The effect of the implied covenant against waste is that the tenant must not do anything to affect the value of the property, and that is not the same thing as putting the property in the same condition as before. The value is proved by calling valuers as witnesses, and asking them how much the property is diminished in value by the injury which has been done to it.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the learned judge took the wrong measure of damages, and as the parties have consented, in order to avoid the expense of a new trial, that we should say what the damages ought to be, I think the amount may fairly be assessed at £10, and that the judgment ought to be varied by reducing the damages to that sum. With regard to costs, as the case has raised a point of law, and the plaintiff has proved his cause of action, we think that he should have his costs of the trial on the High Court scale. There will be no costs of the appeal.

COTTON, L.J.—I agree that the wrong test has been taken in assessing the damages recoverable by the plaintiff. The action is brought by the reversioner for injury caused by acts of waste done by the tenant in possession. It is true that in some cases the extreme limit of the damages might be the costs of putting the property in the same condition as before, but that is only the limit, and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover that amount in such a case as the present. As the parties leave us to determine the amount to which the plaintiff is entitled, I agree that the damages should be reduced to £10, and I also agree with what has been said by the Master of the Rolls as to costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Viewing this as an action for waste, I think the true measure of damages is the diminution of the value of the reversion. If it is treated as an action for wrongful severance of soil from the freehold, the measure of damages is only the value of the soil severed. Therefore, taking either view of the case, the measure of damages adopted by the learned judge was wrong. It is clear that no value can be attached to the soil which has been severed in the present case which can be assessed at anything like the sum which has been awarded to the plaintiff. In deciding this

A case we do not in any way derogate from the principle that where a wrongful act is done and the circumstances call for vindictive damages, a jury may give such damages, but there are no such circumstances here.

Appeal allowed.

Husband and Wife—Separation agreement—Resumption of cohabitation—Termination of agreement—Construction of agreement.

At the trial of a suit for judicial separation terms were agreed upon as follows: "If judicial separation decreed, following terms to be agreed upon: Mrs. N. to be permitted to enjoy during her life the use of all furniture . . . now in No. 7, C. Terrace, with full right to remove the same. . . . After her death same to revert to Mr. N. . . . The right of Mrs. N. to enjoy the furniture . . . as above to be subject to the condition that she is not to interfere with or annoy Mr. N." Judicial separation was decreed. Subsequently a reconciliation took place between the parties who resumed cohabitation, but later the wife again left her husband. On a claim by her to be entitled to a life interest in the furniture,

Held: a renewal of cohabitation might put an end to all or any of the provisions of a separation agreement, and would do so if the language of the agreement, properly construed in the light of the surrounding circumstances, showed that its provisions were intended to take effect only while the separation lasted; on the construction of the present agreement, the wife's right to the furniture ceased on re-cohabitation.

Dictum of LORD CAMPBELL in Randle v. Gould (1) (1857), 8 E. & B. 457, disapproved.

Decision of NORTH, J., 30 Ch.D. 143, affirmed.

Appeal by Mrs. Nicol from a decision of NORTH, J, reported 30 Ch.D. 143, dismissing her claim against her husband, the defendant, for the recovery of furniture to which Mrs. Nicol claimed to be entitled for her life. C

A suit was brought by the husband against the wife, in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, for judicial separation on the ground of the wife's cruelty. On the suit coming on for trial before a judge and jury, on Feb. 26, 1880, terms of agreement were arranged as follows : D

"Order for jury discharged. Case to be tried before the judge. If judicial separation decreed, following terms to be agreed upon: Mrs. Nicol to be permitted to enjoy during her life the use of all furniture, and all the articles of every kind and description, now in No. 7, Chichester Terrace, Brighton, with full right to remove the same elsewhere in Great Britain. After her death same to revert to Mr. Nicol, or his personal representatives. Inventory of such articles to be taken by some person to be named by Mr. Lewis and by Mr. Campbell. Mrs. Nicol to be at liberty, if she think fit, to continue to occupy No. 7, Chichester Terrace, on terms of lease, she being liable as tenant. If she determine to quit the house, to be at liberty to do so on giving Mr. Nicol two months' notice within six months from this date. The right of Mrs. Nicol to enjoy the furniture and articles as above to be subject to the condition that she is not to interfere with or annoy Mr. Nicol. In the event of her so doing her right to enjoy the use of same to cease." E

A judicial separation was decreed and leave was given for the terms of arrangement to be filed. At the date of the arrangement the furniture and articles were the property of Mr. Nicol. Mrs. Nicol was possessed of considerable separate property. After the decree for judicial separation, Mrs. Nicol for some time resided by herself at No. 7, Chichester Terrace, having the sole possession of the furniture and articles according to the agreement. On or about Sept. 29, 1880, Mrs. Nicol took a lease of a house in Sussex Square, Brighton, and removed thither with the furniture and articles. Shortly afterwards, namely, on Mar. 10, 1881, it became necessary to institute proceedings in lunacy against Mrs. Nicol. An inquisition followed, and Mrs. Nicol was removed to a private asylum, where her health improved, and she made applications to her husband, asking to be allowed to return home to him. About Feb. 10, 1883, Mrs. Nicol was allowed to leave the asylum, and she went to reside again with her husband, under the care of a guardian. Mrs. Nicol continued with her husband until the end of July, 1883. On June 12, 1883, a supersedeas of the inquisition was obtained. At the end of July, 1883, Mrs. Nicol left her husband under the circumstances mentioned in the judgment of COTTON, L.J., and the cohabitation was not renewed. The husband had re-taken possession of the furniture under an arrangement in the lunacy, and the present action was brought by the wife to obtain delivery up by him of the furniture to certain persons as trustees for her. NORTH, J., found that the parties had been reconciled and the cohabitation renewed, and that such reconciliation and re-cohabitation had put an end to the agreement. Mrs. Nicol appealed. F

By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 25 :

"In every case of a judicial separation the wife shall, from the date of the sentence and whilst the separation shall continue, be considered as a feme sole with respect to property of every description which she may acquire or which may come to or devolve upon her; and such property may be disposed of by her in all respects as a feme sole, and on her decease the same shall, in case she shall die intestate, go as the same would have gone if her husband had been then dead: provided, that if any such wife should again cohabit with her husband, all such property as she may be entitled to when such cohabitation shall take place shall be held to her separate use, subject, however, to any agreement in writing made between herself and her husband whilst separate."

Hilbery for Mrs. Nicol.

Barber, Q.C., and Hadley for the defendant, Mr. Nicol.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of NORTH, J., dismissing an action by Mrs. Nicol against her husband under an agreement which was come to in a suit brought by Mrs. Nicol against her husband for a judicial separation. The ground of that suit was the cruelty of the defendant here. The suit came on for hearing on Feb. 26, 1880. Judgment was not then given, because it is the practice of the court in such cases, before giving the husband a decree, to require him to make a proper provision for his wife. The case accordingly stood over till Feb. 27, and in the meantime the agreement was signed upon which this action is brought. Judicial separation was decreed, and Mrs. Nicol took possession of the furniture. She afterwards became of unsound mind, and was removed to an asylum and found lunatic by inquisition on proceedings instituted in March, 1884, committees of her person and estate being appointed. Under an arrangement made in the lunacy Mr. Nicol resumed possession of the furniture, and it is now said that it is the separate property of the wife, and that he must be ordered to restore it to her. The husband's rights and those of his wife are not under the lunacy, but under the agreement. In February, 1883, Mrs. Nicol's state of mind had improved, and she went to reside with her husband, and on June 12, a supersedeas of the inquisition in lunacy was obtained. From that time till July 30, 1883, she was living on friendly terms with her husband, and she then, having, as the judge below has found, become reconciled to him, left him and went to Buxton in order to get medical advice, as she had sustained an injury through a carriage accident.

The questions argued were, whether there was reconciliation between the parties, and if so, what was the effect of the reconciliation and cohabitation on this agreement? In the first place, let us consider what is the effect of reconciliation and re-cohabitation on a separation deed. There is the authority of LORD ELDON in Bateman v. Countess of Ross (2) that the effect of reconciliation and re-cohabitation is to entirely put an end to a separation deed. That is the general principle; but it has been contended by Mrs. Nicol that in this case the arrangement is not to be considered as at an end, as it was intended to be a post-nuptial settlement on the lady, her rights under which were to be independent of her cohabitating with her husband, and not to be affected when the separation was at an end. But that is a question of terms, and depends on the true construction of the agreement. The agreement was one made in an action for judicial separation, and the provisions for Mrs. Nicol entirely depended on there being a decree for judicial separation. It is contended that the usual rule applicable to agreements on separation—that they should end with the separation—ought not to apply here, because the agreement contains a special provision as to the circumstances under which the wife's enjoyment of the furniture, which was to be during her life, was to cease, and that this excludes the idea of her enjoyment being limited to the period of separation. A

But this view is erroneous. We must inquire what the object of the agreement was. The sole object of the agreement was to provide for the separation, and the provisions contained in it as to the wife's user of the furniture are inconsistent with the state of things which would arise if the separation came to an end. The provisions of the instrument could not be applicable if the husband and wife lived together again. To such a state of things the agreement would be wholly inapplicable. In taking this view we are not introducing any new condition into the agreement, for the whole of it comes to an end when the separation ends. Apart from authority, therefore, I consider this deed was merely intended as a provision for the separation while it continued, and not as an independent post-nuptial settlement on the wife, and the proviso for enjoyment by the wife during her life was only intended to guard against the idea of her having any greater interest under the agreement. B C

It is said that, as the gift of the furniture to her was complete, she cannot now be deprived of it; but this is a mere affair of words. It may be that if, under an agreement such as this, there had been a completed gift to the wife, such as payment of a sum of money, that would continue unaffected, except perhaps as to what might remain of the gift when cohabitation was resumed and having regard to the rights of the wife under s. 25 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857. But here the gift, if complete, was entirely under a contract lasting only during the separation. D

A variety of cases have been cited to us, of which it is useless to consider those which only lay down that an agreement on a separation may be of such a character as not to depend on the continuance of the separation, but may be such as to last although the husband and wife are living together again. But cases have also been cited in support of the construction which it is sought to place on the agreement, viz., that it was not the intention of the parties that the wife's rights should come to an end with the separation. It is unnecessary to consider whether such an intention could lawfully exist. E F

In Randle v. Gould (1) there was an express agreement that the provision for the wife was to terminate in the event of their agreeing in writing to resume cohabitation, and cohabiting accordingly. That condition was not fulfilled, and it was held that the presence of that condition excluded the contention that a cohabitation resumed under different conditions put an end to the wife's rights under the separation deed. There is, however, in that case a dictum of LORD CAMPBELL that, even if there had been no express proviso for avoiding the deed in a certain manner, the wife's allowance would not have ceased on the reconciliation and renewed cohabitation. I doubt whether I could concur in that dictum. But even that dictum cannot be relied on in support of the Mrs. Nicol's argument. G H

In Crouch v. Waller (3) a provision was made for the wife under two deeds, one of which was expressly to be avoided on the husband and wife again cohabiting; the other being a settlement. It was sought to have the other avoided also, but it contained a trust in favour of future children of the marriage, which trust could only arise in the event of cohabitation being resumed; and this was used to show that the second deed amounted to a post-nuptial settlement on the wife, and was not dependent on her living separate from her husband. It is true that Randle v. Gould (1) was referred to by the Lord Chancellor without disapproval, and it is said that he, therefore, approved of that judgment. I think it right, therefore, now to express my dissent from the dictum in Randle v. Gould (1), lest it should hereafter be said that it was approved of by this court. I

Then Mrs. Nicol relied on Charlesworth v. Holt (4), where it was contended that subsequent divorce put an end to the wife's rights under a separation deed, because the marriage itself was at an end, which is a totally different state of facts from those in the present case. The case which is most in point is Negus v. Forster (5). There the court held that a wife's provision under a separation deed continued, though the separation was at an end. But that was only a case of construction of the particular instrument, and, whatever the judges said, they laid down no principle of law which can bind us now to come to any conclusion other than that which, as I think, follows from the general principle which I have stated.

The terms of the agreement in the present case depend simply and solely on the continuance of the separation; and, in my opinion, if it is shown that there was such a reconciliation between the husband and wife as put an end to the separation, the appeal must fail. Then were the parties reconciled? It has been urged that, if a reconciliation took place during the lunacy, that would not put an end to the separation. But from the time when the supersedeas was obtained until July 30, they were living together as man and wife, and in my opinion there is nothing to induce us to interfere with the finding of fact that the parties were reconciled.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question is: What is the effect of this agreement, and what is the principle of law to be applied thereto? In my opinion, the true principle is that a renewal of cohabitation may put an end to all or any of the provisions of a separation deed, and will do so, so far as the language of the deed, properly construed by the light of the surrounding circumstances, shows that its provisions were intended to take effect only while the separation lasted.

The language of LORD ELDON goes a little further—to this extent indeed, that there exists a presumption which ought to lead one to hold that it ended by a renewal of cohabitation. This view was not adopted by the Court of Queen's Bench in Randle v. Gould (1), and I am not myself in favour of applying presumptions to the construction of written documents in such a way as to dictate the inferences to be drawn from the circumstances outside the deed, and from the relations between the parties. In a complicated deed of this description some of the provisions, usually from their nature, are intended to come to an end when the separation is over; others may, from their nature, be wholly perfected when cohabitation is renewed, or be wholly inapplicable to the then existing circumstances, and others may be intended to continue though the separation is at an end. I would rather construe such deeds with reference to the surrounding circumstances than lay down any strong and unbending presumption as to when marital rights are to be suspended.

This like most cases, can be decided by the light of the fact that the agreement was entered into with the view to meet a certain set of circumstances. All the cases which have been cited were decided on deeds differently expressed, and are, therefore, not of binding authority in this case. Randle v. Gould (1) turned on the special words of a particular document. There the court said that the decision would have been the same if there had been no such provisions of the deed; but this is merely an obiter dictum in which I find it difficult to acquiesce. Crouch v. Waller (3) also turned on the special terms of the deed, and the same may be said of Negus v. Forster (5) in the Court of Appeal. Whether we should acquiesce in the construction put upon the deed in that case is wholly beside the point, for there is nothing in the law as laid down in that case to affect the present decision.

I come back, therefore, with confidence to the document on the construction of which this case depends. Are there any facts differentiating this document from an ordinary separation deed? The agreement was entered into in a suit for judicial separation, and was not intended to come into effect unless a decree was pronounced. In the light of that fact, it is clear that there was no absolute gift of the furniture to the wife, but only a licence, irrevocable because given for a valuable consideration, that the wife should enjoy the furniture during her life. Ought we to imply a condition limiting this to the duration of the separation? The subject-matter to be enjoyed is the furniture of a particular house, which the wife was to be at liberty to remove, and her enjoyment was to cease if she annoyed her husband. I cannot doubt that the licence was to operate on an implied condition that the separation lasted, and that on the separation coming to an end it was to cease. In other words, the enjoyment was to depend on a decree being pronounced, and there was an implied condition that it was to last only so long as it continued in effect. If this be the true construction, it is obvious that the wife's interest in the furniture cannot be preserved to her under s. 25 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, because all her property in the furniture came to an end as soon as the separation ended.

On the question of fact, whether cohabitation was resumed and a reconciliation took place between the husband and wife, I agree with the view taken by COTTON, L.J.

FRY, L.J.—The question we have to decide is, whether the terms of the arrangement come to in 1880 amount merely to an agreement for a separation, under which provision is made for the wife during its continuance, or one under which it was intended to give her some property, irrevocable licence, or benefit, to endure whether the separation came to an end or not. There may be cases where a separation deed is made, the terms of which are to continue notwithstanding re-cohabitation, and which amounts in fact to a post-nuptial settlement on the wife, and there may be included therein provisions which are to last only during separation. That is the true nature of the inquiry, and all the cases cited to us have proceeded on that view.

In Randle v. Gould (1) the court had to consider whether the instrument was merely a separation deed, or was a post-nuptial settlement, and it is unnecessary for us to consider whether the conclusion we should have come to would have been the same. The court added that, had the condition which was present in that case been absent, they would still have held the instrument to be a post-nuptial settlement, but that expression of opinion, whether correct or not, is immaterial in this case. The question considered by the court in Negus v. Forster (5) was the same. The answer must depend on the construction of the instrument, and those cases do not apply because the deeds were differently worded from the instrument before us.

This document begins with the words, "If judicial separation decreed, following terms to be agreed upon"; and it is obvious that, so far as the parties were concerned, if no separation had been decreed no part of the instrument would have taken effect. This is strong to show that the arrangement was made with a view to separation. The proviso that the wife was to enjoy during her life is relied upon; but the clauses which follow are quite inconsistent with that proviso continuing in force after the separation was at an end. For it is obvious that, if the husband and wife became reconciled and cohabited, it would be inconsistent with the ordinary relation between husband and wife that the wife should still be enjoying the use of the furniture separate from her husband, with the right of removing the same. It is obvious that these stipulations were to last only during the separation, and not while the husband and wife were living together. The intention of the parties that this was to be so is apparent, and without hesitation I arrive at the conclusion that this was not intended to be an independent settlement for the wife's benefit, the words "during her life" being intended to limit, not to enlarge, the wife's right of enjoyment.

On the question of fact I have nothing to add. The evidence is clear and distinct that a reconciliation took place.

A It has been contended that, by s. 25 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, the furniture became the separate property of the wife, but on this point I agree with NORTH, J., and the other lords justices that the wife has nothing on which the section can operate. In my opinion, the appeal fails and ought to be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Sir James Hannen, P.), June 21, 1890]

[Reported [1891] P. 205; 60 L.J.P. 18; 63 L.T. 259]

E

From the time of the marriage a husband repeatedly refused to occupy the same room with his wife, and told her he loathed being with her and hated the sight of her. He habitually neglected her and would not take her out, but he often went out by himself and refused to tell his wife where he had been. On some occasions the husband left the wife for several days at a time. He received letters in a woman's handwriting, but when his wife asked about them he told her it was no business of hers. He threatened to leave his wife unless she did exactly what he liked, and often was angry, his wife becoming frightened. He often swore at his wife and used violent language towards her. On one occasion only did the husband use physical violence on his wife; that was when she went into his room to speak to him and he pushed her away roughly and she fell to the ground. The wife's health suffered as a result of this conduct, and she warned the husband of this, but he continued to behave in the same way. It was subsequently discovered that the husband was carrying on an adulterous association with another woman and for that purpose had been using money brought into a marriage settlement by the wife.

Held: the husband's conduct amounted to cruelty.

Petition by Evelyn Isabel Bethune for the dissolution of her marriage with Charles Congleton Bethune on the grounds of his cruelty and adultery. The respondent filed an answer admitting the adultery, but denying the cruelty. The case is reported on the issue of cruelty. A

The marriage took place on Feb. 24, 1886, the petitioner being at that time about twenty-eight, and the respondent thirty-six years of age. The wife was absolutely possessed of property to the amount of about £3,000 a year, with the reversion, on the death of her mother, to some £4,000 or £5,000 a year more. The respondent had little or no income of his own, but he had inherited an estate in Scotland which was very fully mortgaged. Upon the marriage, the petitioner settled an income of £1,000 a year upon the respondent for life, in case he should survive her, and shortly after the marriage she paid some debts of his, amounting to about £4,000. B

After the marriage the parties went to various places, at all of which the respondent told his wife that he could not sleep unless he were alone, and he ordered a separate bedroom for her. In April, 1886, on their return from Cairo, they put up at the Grand Hotel. Up to that time there had been no attempt by the respondent to consummate the marriage. The petitioner spoke to her husband, and the petitioner's mother also remonstrated with him upon his conduct to the petitioner. He made the excuse that he was not well, and could not sleep unless he were alone. He told the petitioner that he hated being in the same room with her; he repeated that on many occasions. The petitioner was very much attached to him, and was anxious to live with him as his wife. In the summer of 1886 they went to Scotland, to the respondent's seat; he still insisted on occupying a separate room. While there, the respondent left the petitioner for nearly a fortnight; she implored him not to go, or to take her with him. She went to his room at night to speak to him about it. He gave her a violent push, which threw her to the ground, and so prevented her entering the room. D

The respondent habitually neglected the petitioner, and would not take her out with him. When he had absented himself from her, she frequently asked him where he had been and what he had been doing, but he refused to tell her. From Scotland they went to stay with the petitioner's mother for a time. His unkind conduct continued. He frequently said very unkind things to the petitioner; he told her he loathed being in the same room with her, and that her presence made his life a hell. He was constantly receiving letters in a lady's handwriting, and when the petitioner asked him about them, he said it was no business of hers. She once saw a postal order; when asked by the petitioner about it, he said it was to help a friend who was in trouble; and he got very angry and excited, and left the house. About the end of 1886 the respondent was ill, though not very seriously; his illness lasted five or six months, and the petitioner did what she could for him, but he never appreciated what she did. F
H

About the end of 1887 they took a house at 5, Seymour Street, and kept it until the respondent went abroad, in 1888. He often threatened to go away and leave her, unless she did exactly what he liked. The petitioner did all she could to make him fond of her, as she was very fond of him. His continued neglect and unkindness made her very ill; she was continually crying, got very thin, and could not eat or sleep. Her mother and servants noticed the petitioner's altered appearance, and the petitioner told her husband about it. He said that she should live her own life apart from him. In the autumn of 1888 he said that he was going to Ems. She entreated him to take her. He refused. So far as she then knew, he went alone, but she had since found out that he had someone with him. Previously, in July, 1887, the petitioner and respondent had been to Ems together, but, at the respondent's request, they occupied separate rooms; he was constantly receiving letters from women, and left the petitioner alone a great deal. He used to get very angry when she spoke I to him, and she was much frightened at his anger. The petitioner and her mother, in order to try and please him, paid off the encumbrances on the respondent's Scottish property. They also bought the equity of redemption, and paid £16,000 or £17,000 in all upon the property. Even this had no good result.

Before that, in the summer of 1888, the petitioner and respondent were at the Cliftonville Hotel, Margate. The respondent was acquainted with a gentleman and two ladies, and the petitioner used to see him walking about with them. He said he could not introduce her to them, as they were not ladies. He told the petitioner she must go, as he wanted to be alone, and that if she did not go, he must. The petitioner went to an old servant's. Subsequently, he said the petitioner must go to Scotland alone, as he did not wish to travel with her. The petitioner frequently spoke to him about changing his mode of life towards her; he said he never could change. Her health was being seriously injured. The respondent told the petitioner he was going to take a sea voyage, and promised to take his wife with him; she took the tickets and paid for them; he had already engaged a large cabin; he afterwards refused to permit her to go with him; she was extremely desirous of going, and suggested that, if she took a separate cabin, he might let her go, and his brother might share his cabin. He consented, on condition that she was not to sit next to him, and that he should treat her as an entire stranger. He said he could not bear to be with her, and that she would have more liberty if he were not there. She told him her doctor was very anxious that she should go on a sea voyage, and her mother also wrote to the respondent about it. Finally, he refused to take her. The respondent was so ill that she went to her mother's. The respondent would only allow his wife to go to their own house in Seymour Street by appointment. The respondent constantly used violent language and swore in the presence of, and towards the petitioner. On December 28, 1888, the respondent left England. By the time he returned, the petitioner had found out that he had been keeping a mistress during the whole of their married life, and she instituted these proceedings.

Dr. Quain was called, and said that he had known the petitioner from her childhood. He saw her a few weeks after she was married, and noticed that she was very much depressed, and was feeble and weak. He saw her on many occasions, in 1887 and 1888, and noticed that her health was rapidly failing. In 1888 he was satisfied that, if the trouble lasted from which she was suffering, she would not continue to live. If her husband's conduct, such as described, were persisted in, it would injure her health, and it did, in fact, injure it. After her husband had been away some time, and she discovered the position she was in, her health partially recovered.

Dr. Broadbent gave evidence that, in 1887, the petitioner was suffering from excitement and depression, and great disarrangement of digestive organs, and weakness; she complained of sleeplessness and loss of appetite. That state of things was clearly produced by mental distress and anxiety but that he knew only a little of the history of the parties. On Oct. 19, 1888, and on several occasions during that month, he saw the petitioner, and found her then so thin that he was apprehensive that she might be in consumption. The same weakness, depression, want of sleep, and indigestion were all present, as before. He had then heard something of her marital relations, and, in his opinion, they would account for all she was suffering from, and, in his belief, they did, in fact, cause the injury to her health.

Evidence as to the respondent's ill-treatment of the petitioner was also given by the mother of the latter; and witnesses were also called upon the issue of adultery.

Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., Inderwick, Q.C., and C. A. Middleton for the A petitioner.

Bayford, Q.C., for the respondent, did not cross-examine the witnesses, nor address the court.

SIR JAMES HANNEN, P.—It is not necessary for me to say more than that I think the medical evidence, taken in conjunction with the evidence given by B the petitioner, brings the case within the authority of Kelly v. Kelly (1), and I, therefore, pronounce a decree nisi, on the grounds of cruelty and adultery, with costs against the respondent.

Appeal by the claimants from a decision of NORTH, J., in a motion, in chambers, disallowing their claims to the balance of a banking account (a client's account) of the defendant a stockbroker in an action in which the plaintiff a creditor, had obtained a judgment for a specific sum and being a judgment creditor had attached the defendant's banking by a garnishee order.

On Jan. 17, 1888, the plaintiff obtained judgment against the defendant for £650 and costs, and on Nov. 5, 1888, he obtained a garnishee order nisi attaching a balance of £301 1s. 3d. then standing at the defendant's credit at the London and Westminster Bank, Lothbury. The defendant was a stockbroker and had been a member of the Stock Exchange until December, 1886. Since that time he had continued to act as broker for his former clients, with the assistance of a broker who was a member of the Stock Exchange. He deposed that all moneys paid into his account at the London and Westminster Bank were moneys received by him on behalf of clients. On Nov. 27, 1888, the defendant's solicitor gave notice to the bank that the balance of £301 1s. 3d. belonged to the following persons in the following proportions: Mrs. Eliza Jones, £221 3s.; Edmund Shaw, £60; Miss Palmer, £14 12s. 6d.; Miss Abrey, £3 8s. 6d., the remainder consisting of small commissions to which the defendant was entitled. The above-mentioned persons were summoned to appear under R.S.C. Ord. 45, r. 5. The chief clerk allowed the claim of Mrs. Jones and Miss Abrey, and disallowed those of E. Shaw and Miss Palmer. The latter claims were adjourned to the judge, and on Jan. 14, 1889, NORTH, J., in chambers, disallowed them. The claims were all similar, the particulars of Shaw's being as follows. On Oct. 15, 1888, the defendant paid into his account £409 15s. received by him as broker for Shaw. On that day he paid in no other sum, but drew out sums amounting to £554 16s. 2d., and at the close of the day the balance at the defendant's credit was £522 13s. 6d. On Oct. 30 the defendant drew out £340 to complete a purchase for Shaw, having previously drawn out on his behalf £9 15s., and, therefore, £60 remained due to him from Shaw. After Oct. 15, and before the presentation of the cheque for £340, sums amounting to £1,073 18s. 9d. had been paid in, and sums amounting to £1,187 2s. 1d. drawn out. If the rule in Clayton's Case (1) applied, no money of Shaw's remained in the bank. On Feb. 1, 1889, Shaw and Miss Palmer moved in court before NORTH, J., to discharge the order of Jan. 14, 1889.

Townsend for the claimants.

R. F. Norton for the creditor.

NORTH, J., stated the facts, and continued: Applying the doctrine of appropriation of payment out to the payments in in order of date, the sums paid in representing the two claimants' money had been more than paid out, and no part of the balance left in the bank consisted of any part of either of the two sums claimed. But, say the claimants, that does not preclude them, because as between themselves and the bank they are entitled to everything left in. No doubt they are entitled to say that all payments out of the bank, on the broker's private account, are made out of the money of the broker's own in the bank. But the broker has sworn that he had no private moneys in the bank, and the whole of the money paid into the account represented and consisted of money received for his clients. The result is, that all the moneys paid in were trust moneys, and as between the persons to whom these moneys belonged the payments out are to be taken to be set off against the moneys first paid in in order of date. That was settled by FRY, J., in Re Hallett's Estate (2), and his decision on that point was not questioned in the Court of Appeal. There the rule, as stated in the headnote (13 Ch.D. 696), is,

"as between two cestuis que trust, whose money the trustee has paid into his own account at his bankers, the rule in Clayton's Case (1) applies, so that the first sum paid in will be held to have been first drawn out."

I can see other difficulties in the way of the claimants, but it seems to me that the principle laid down by FRY, J., is a fatal difficulty, and it is unnecessary to go into other matters. The motion must be refused.

Accordingly the claims of Mrs. Jones and Miss Abrey were paid out of the balance in hand, and the balance paid to the plaintiff. On Feb. 8, 1889, Shaw gave notice of appeal from the orders of Jan. 14 and Feb. 1, 1889. A Townsend and Fossett Locke for Shaw.

R. F. Norton for the plaintiff.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—We are all clearly of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to attach this balance, but we are not quite satisfied that we can make an order in Mr. Shaw's favour. It does not appear to be distinctly made out that there is no other client of Smith who can make a claim. B

The defendant, being in court, was then called, and gave evidence. He stated that all the moneys which had been paid into the account were moneys of his clients, and that he had paid all the moneys received on behalf of his clients to or for the purpose of the clients on whose behalf respectively he had received the same, except as regarded the four claimants, to whom there remained due the above-mentioned sum, making together £299 4s., the small excess being some small transfer fees which he had paid for his clients without drawing them out of the bank. C D

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I am of opinion that the orders under appeal cannot be supported. I do not think that the case raises the question which NORTH, J., seems to have considered it to raise, viz., that of appropriation of payments. The rule in Clayton's Case (1) is a very sound rule in cases such as that in which it was first applied, but here the circumstances are entirely different. E The whole fund here consists of money not borrowed by the defendant from his clients, but received by him as agent for them, and, therefore, for the present purpose may be treated as trust money. As between cestuis que trust, the rule is applicable, but it cannot be applied here because no question arises between the different cestuis que trust. The question arises between them and a person who claims under a judgment against their trustee. An execution can only take effect on property which the debtor has a right to dispose of for his own purposes. F The balance here in question was not the debtor's own money; he had no right to deal with it as his own, and his execution creditor has no claim upon it. The only doubt I have felt was whether we could order payment to the claimants, but on the evidence now before us I think that we can do so without any risk of doing injustice to any person not before us. C

COTTON, L.J.—An execution creditor can only lay hold of what is the property of his debtor, and the evidence shows clearly that this money was paid in under such circumstances that no part of it is the debtor's own. The rule in Clayton's Case (1) would apply as between the cestuis que trust if there was not enough to pay them all. Here there is no conflict between them, for the evidence shows that there is no client of the defendant who can claim an interest except these four persons, and there is money in hand to pay them, so the rule in Clayton's Case (1) does not apply. It was said that the money to be paid out is not the same money that was paid in, and that, therefore, the claimants cannot follow it; but no one ever does receive out of a bank the same sovereigns that he paid in. If a trustee has money of his own mixed with trust money in the same account, all his drawings out for his own purposes must be attributed to his own money, and he cannot claim to apply the rule in Clayton's Case (1) for his own benefit as against the cestuis que trust, nor can his execution creditor do so, and still less in a case where no money of the debtor's own has ever gone into the account. J

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. An execution creditor can only take subject to all equities. The plaintiff, therefore, stands in the shoes of Smith, and

A the case is as between Smith and the persons whose money he had in his hands. Smith could not set up the rule in Clayton's Case (1), and say that this money was his; so neither can the plaintiff. I think that this case is decided by Re Hallett's Estate (2); not by that branch of the case on which NORTH, J., relied, but by the other branch.

Appeal allowed.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of the Divisional Court (FIELD and CAVE, JJ.), refusing an application by the defendant for an order that the service of the writ and all subsequent proceedings in the action might be set aside, on the ground that at the date of the issuing of the writ the defendant was not within the jurisdiction of the court. A

A writ in an action for breach of promise of marriage within the jurisdiction was issued on November 23, 1888, addressed to the defendant, at Woodbridge, Suffolk. The alleged promise was made on September 17, 1888, and the defendant had left England for Canada in October, 1888, and no licence was obtained to issue the writ out of the jurisdiction. On Jan. 3, 1889, the plaintiff obtained an order for substituted service of the writ on the defendant's brother, a solicitor in London, and on Jan. 4 the writ was served on defendant's brother. No appearance was entered to the writ, and on Jan. 12, judgment was signed against the defendant in default of appearance. On Jan. 28 a summons was taken out, by the defendant's brother, purporting to act on behalf of the defendant, asking that the judgment might be set aside, and that the plaintiff might be ordered, within ten days, to deliver a statement of claim. On Mar. 2, after the defendant had been communicated with, and had himself retained a solicitor, another summons in the same terms was taken out by the defendant, and was dismissed. The defendant's application to set aside the service of the writ, and all subsequent proceedings, having been dismissed by the Divisional Court, the defendant appealed. B C D

LINDLEY, L.J.—The writ for a cause of action within the jurisdiction was issued on Nov. 23, 1888. The defendant was then out of the jurisdiction so that it could not be served within the jurisdiction; and as no leave had been obtained for the issue of the writ out of the jurisdiction it could not be served on the defendant; but it was perfectly regular, because the plaintiff might have kept it until the defendant came within the jurisdiction. On Jan. 3, 1889, an order was made for substituted service of the writ on the defendant's brother. That order was in the common form; but at the time that it was made the defendant was out of the jurisdiction. E F

The first question is whether, under those circumstances, the defendant being abroad, the order that was obtained for service on his brother was right. When one comes to look at the rules, it appears that they have not particularly provided for this point. But the principle that underlies the rules for service out of the jurisdiction, and Field v. Bennett (1) sufficiently show that there cannot be substituted service of a writ which could not be served personally; and that is a sound principle, because a principal cannot be affected by an act done to an agent when he could not be affected by the same act done to himself. I think that, when one looks at the consequences of an opposite conclusion, it is apparent that the decision in that case is sound common sense. The consequences of a contrary decision would be that, in the case of a defendant who was a foreigner resident out of the jurisdiction, the plaintiff might say, "I will not or I cannot obtain an order for service out of the jurisdiction, but I will apply for an order for substituted service." I think that there is principle and authority for saying that an order for substituted service of a writ of summons cannot be obtained when the defendant is out of the jurisdiction. Therefore, the order for substituted service that was made in this case was wrong. G H I

Then comes the question whether the service of the writ under that order was an irregularity or a nullity. It appears to me to have been an irregularity rather than a nullity. I am not prepared to say that an improper mode of serving the writ is a nullity that cannot be waived. Then, was the irregular service of the writ waived in the present case? The defendant has taken two steps which are inconsistent with there having been no proper service of the writ: First, the brother, who had been served, took out a summons to set aside the judgment that had been signed in default of appearance, and for delivery of a statement of claim. I think that the brother knew the facts, and had authority to act for the defendant. But further, after the defendant had been communicated with and had himself instructed a solicitor, another summons was taken out in the same terms. These two summonses appear to me to be so inconsistent with the contention that the writ had not been properly served as to amount to a waiver of the irregularity.

Under these circumstances the case stands thus: The writ itself was perfectly regular; the order for substituted service of the writ was wrong; service of the writ in pursuance of that order was an irregularity, but not a nullity; and the irregularity has been waived. The appeal will, therefore, be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—The two cases of Field v. Bennett (1) and Hillyard v. Smyth (2), clearly show that there cannot be substituted service of a writ which could not itself be served upon the defendant. In the present case the writ of summons being one for service within the jurisdiction, could not have been served upon the defendant, who was out of the jurisdiction. The order for substituted service of that writ was, therefore, irregular. If we were to hold otherwise, all the rules as to obtaining leave for service out of the jurisdiction would be entirely useless. Then a further question arises as to whether the service under that order was a nullity or an irregularity, and, if an irregularity only, whether the irregularity has been waived. I think that the substituted service was not a nullity. The writ was perfectly regular, and I think that the mistake in the mode in which the service was carried out was an irregularity only. I further think that that irregularity has been waived. After the defendant was himself represented by a solicitor, a second summons was taken out asking that the plaintiff be ordered to deliver a statement of claim. That is inconsistent with there being no action pending at that time. This appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Conflict of Laws—Lis alibi pendens—Stay of proceedings—Petition for divorce presented abroad—Restitution petition presented in England by respondent to divorce suit.

The husband, an officer in the Indian army, commenced proceedings in India for dissolution of marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery in that country. Two months previously, with the husband's consent, the wife had returned to England and the petition was served on her in England. Shortly afterwards the wife commenced proceedings in England for the restitution of conjugal rights, the husband then being in England on leave. The husband applied to the court to stay the English proceedings until the suit in India had been determined on the ground that all his witnesses, as well as the co-respondent, were resident in India. A

Appeal from a decision of BUTT, J., refusing to stay proceedings in a suit brought by the wife for restitution of conjugal rights until a petition for the dissolution of the marriage brought by the husband in India had been determined.

The husband was a captain in the Indian Army, and resided there with his wife. In December, 1885, he discovered a correspondence between his wife and another officer, and later he alleged that his wife had confessed that she had been guilty of adultery. Shortly afterwards, with the husband's consent, the wife left India and went to her father's house in England. In February, 1886, the husband presented a petition to the High Court of Judicature at Bombay for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery in India. An office copy of the petition was received by the wife on Mar. 23 or 24, 1886, and on Mar. 25 she was served with the petition in England under an order of the Indian court. On Mar. 26, 1886, the wife presented to the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division a petition for restitution of conjugal rights, and this was served on the husband in England. He had left India in February, 1886, bringing the children with him, his object being to provide a home for them in England. When the wife's petition was served on the husband he moved BUTT, J., for an order that the suit for restitution be dismissed, or, in the alternative, that all proceedings therein be stayed pending the determination of the proceedings in India. In his affidavit the husband deposed that the co-respondent and all the witnesses needed to corroborate the wife's confession of adultery were resident in India. BUTT, J., dismissed the application and the husband appealed. D

Inderwick, Q.C., and Bargrave Deane for the husband.

Bayford, Q.C., and Searle for the wife. E

COTTON, L.J.—This is a case of some nicety, and the point is this. The husband commenced in India a suit for dissolution of marriage against his wife and the co-respondent. Before that suit was commenced the wife came over to England—I will not say whether she was sent here or came of her own accord. When her husband accidentally came over to England for a short time, she commenced proceedings in this country for restitution of conjugal rights. Therefore, there are suits going on in two courts, both of which, according to my present opinion, had jurisdiction over the matter as against the husband. The Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division of the High Court in this country has jurisdiction over him, from the fact of his presence here. On the other hand, he had commenced proceedings in a court which, as far as I can see, had jurisdiction, notwithstanding that his wife had gone abroad before the suit there was commenced. In that state of things what the husband asks is, that, as his objection and defence to the suit for restitution of conjugal rights is the adultery of his wife, which is his ground of action in India, the proceedings in England, on the petition of the wife, should be stayed until the question of adultery has been decided, not only as F

A against her but as against the co-respondent in the suit in India. Undoubtedly there are certain advantages in taking that proceeding, for it will make that suit effectual, not only as against the wife but as against the co-respondent; the action will be in a place where all the witnesses, except the wife, are now resident; and certainly, if one could avoid it, one would not allow the husband to be put to the expense of having two proceedings for proving the adultery of the wife, especially when the fact is considered that one of the suits is in England and the witnesses are in India.

B But then what we have to consider is whether we can deprive the wife, in a suit duly instituted by her, in a court having jurisdiction, of her right to have the questions which arise in that suit decided in England, and say the matter should be tried somewhere else. I feel a difficulty in doing that; indeed, I feel it would not be right for us to do it. The wife says that, although there is some evidence by the husband that she made a confession of adultery to him, yet she did not commit adultery, and wishes to have that question tried, and to be able, without going to India, to give her explanation in court of the circumstances relied upon by her husband. I do not think it can be said to be unnatural or unreasonable that she should wish to do that in England rather than have go to India to give her evidence in the suit commenced by her husband in that country. I think that, notwithstanding the inconvenience and expense which the husband must be put to if both actions are allowed to go on, we ought not to prevent the wife, as she insists upon it, from going on with her proceedings here free from any stay, free from any prohibition from going into this question here, and without putting her upon the terms of her action being stayed until the action in India is decided. The appeal must, therefore, fail.

E BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The decision comes, in the end, to rest upon a very small point. The lady has, prima facie, a right to prosecute her suit here. She thinks she has an advantage in doing so. She thinks it is for her benefit that, if the issue of her adultery is raised, she should have it tried in England, and in London. I can conceive that that is not an unreasonable view if she is an innocent woman. Even if she is guilty, she might not unreasonably hope to escape more easily in England. Ought we then to interfere with the natural course of this suit, which she has a right to prosecute here, by making an order in it which, in the result, might possibly transfer the decision of the question of her adultery from this English court to an Anglo-Indian court? I do not deny we could do so if we saw clearly that the ends of justice required it, if we saw clearly that there would be oppression, or waste of time, or vexation in allowing her to proceed here with the suit without interference on our part. I do not think we ought to interfere in such a way unless it is very clear that we could not do any harm at all by the interference, and I do not think that such a case has been made clear to us. It seems to me we cannot interfere with the judgment, and that we ought to dismiss the appeal with costs.

FRY, J.—I am also, but not without regret, of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

STANLEY v. POWELL

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Denman, J.), October 25, November 3, 1890]

Trespass to the Person—Accidental wounding—Absence of intention or negligence.

In the absence of intention and negligence an action for trespass to the person is not maintainable.

The plaintiff was employed to carry cartridges and game for a shooting party. The defendant, who was one of the party, fired at a pheasant, and a shot from his gun glanced off the bough of a tree and wounded the plaintiff in the eye. The jury found that the plaintiff was injured by a shot from the defendant's gun, but that the defendant was not guilty of any negligence.

Held: as the defendant had fired his gun without negligence and without intending to injure the plaintiff, he was not liable.

Further Consideration by DENMAN, J., of an action tried by him at Maidstone Assizes.

Cur. adv. vult.]

Nov. 3, 1890. DENMAN, J., read the following judgment.—This case was tried before me and a special jury at the last Maidstone Summer Assizes. In the statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that the defendant had negligently and wrongfully and unskillfully fired his gun and wounded the plaintiff in his eye, and that the plaintiff in consequence had lost his sight and suffered other damage. The defendant denied the negligence alleged. After the evidence on both sides, which was conflicting, had been heard, I left the three following questions to the

A jury: (i) Was the plaintiff injured by a shot from defendant's gun? (ii) Was the defendant guilty of negligence in firing the charge to which that shot belonged, as he did? (iii) Damages.

The undisputed facts were, that on Nov. 29, 1888, the defendant and several others were pheasant shooting in a party, some being inside and some outside a wood which the beaters were beating. The right of shooting was in one Greenwood, who was of the party. The plaintiff was employed by Greenwood to carry cartridges and the game which might be shot. Several beaters were driving the game along a plantation of saplings towards an open drive. The plaintiff stood just outside a gate which led into a field outside the plantation at the end of the drive. The defendant was walking along in that field a few yards from the hedge which bounded the plantation. As he was walking along a pheasant rose inside the plantation. The defendant fired one barrel at this bird, and, according to the evidence for the defendant, struck it with his first shot. There was a considerable conflict of evidence as to details, but the jury must, I think, be taken to have adopted the version of the facts sworn to by the defendant's witnesses. They swore that the bird, when struck by the first shot, began to lower and turn back towards the beaters, whereupon the defendant fired his second barrel and killed the bird, but that a shot glancing from the bough of an oak which was in or close to the hedge, and striking the plaintiff, must have caused the injury complained of. The oak in question, according to the defendant's evidence, was partly between the defendant and the bird when the second barrel was fired, but it was not in a line with the plaintiff, but, on the contrary, so much out of that line that the shot must have been diverted to a considerable extent from the direction in which the gun must have been pointed in order to hit the plaintiff. The distance between the plaintiff and the defendant in a direct line when the second barrel was fired was about thirty yards. The case for the plaintiff was entirely different, but I think it must be held that the jury took the defendant's account of the matter, for they found the second question left to them in the negative.

Before summing up the case to the jury I called the attention of the parties to the doctrine which seemed to have been laid down in some old cases that, even in the absence of negligence, an action of trespass might lie, and it was agreed that I should leave the question of negligence to the jury, but that if necessary the pleadings were to be deemed to have been amended so as to raise any case or defence open upon the facts, with liberty to the court to draw inferences of fact, and that the damages should be assessed contingently. The jury assessed them at £100. I left either party to move the court for judgment, but it was afterwards agreed that the case should be argued before myself on further consideration, and that I should give judgment, notwithstanding that I had left the parties to move the court, as though I had originally reserved it for further consideration before myself.

Having heard the arguments, I am of opinion that by no amendment that could be made consistently with the finding of the jury could I properly give judgment for the plaintiff. It was contended on his behalf that this was a case in which an action of trespass would have lain before the Judicature Acts, and this contention was mainly founded on certain dicta which, until considered with reference to the cases in which they were uttered, seem to support that contention; but no decision was cited, nor do I think that any can be found which goes so far as to hold that if A. is injured by a shot from a gun fired at a bird by B. an action of trespass will necessarily lie, even though B. is proved to have fired the gun without negligence, and without intending to injure the plaintiff.

The jury having found that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant, the most favourable way in which it is now possible to put the case for the plaintiff is to consider the action as brought for a trespass, and to consider that the defendant has put upon the record a defence denying negligence and specifically alleging the facts sworn to by his witnesses, which the jury must be considered to have found proved, and then to consider whether those facts, coupled with the absence of negligence established by the jury, amount to an excuse in law. A

The earliest case relied upon by the plaintiff was one in the YEAR BOOK 21 Hen. 7, 28A, which is referred to by GROSE, J., in the course of the argument in Leame v. Bray (1), in these words: B

“There is a case put in the YEAR BOOK 21 Hen. 7., 28A, that where one shot an arrow at a mark which glanced from it and struck another, it was holden to be trespass.”

On turning to the case in the YEAR BOOK it appears that the passage in question was a mere dictum of REDE, who (see 5 FOSS' LIVES OF THE JUDGES, p. 230) was at the time (1506) either a judge of the King's Bench or Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, in a case of a very different kind from that now in question, and it only amounts to a statement that an action of trespass may lie even where the act done by the defendant is unintentional. The words relied on are: C

But in that very passage REDE makes observations which show that he has in his mind cases in which that which would be prima facie a trespass may be excused. D

The next case in order of date relied upon for the plaintiff was Weaver v. Ward (2), decided in 1616. There is no doubt that that case contains dicta which per se would be in favour of the plaintiff, but it also contains the following summing up of the law applicable to cases of unintentional injury by acts which are prima facie trespasses: E

showing clearly that there may be such cases. That case, after all, only decided that where the plaintiff and the defendant were skirmishing as soldiers of the trainband, and the one “casualiter et per infortunium et contra voluntatem suam” (which must be translated “accidentally and involuntarily”) shot the other, an action of trespass would lie unless he could show that such involuntary and accidental shooting was done under such circumstances as utterly to negative negligence. Such cases may easily be supposed in which there could be no two opinions about the matter; but other cases may—as the present case did—involve considerable conflicts of evidence and opinion which until recently a jury only could dispose of. Gibbons v. Pepper (3), decided in 1695, merely decided that a plea showing that an accident caused by a runaway horse was inevitable was a bad plea in an action of trespass—because, if inevitable, that was a defence under the general issue. It was a mere decision on the pleading, and laid down nothing as regards the point raised in the present case. The concluding words of the judgment, which show clearly the ratio decidendi of that case, are these: F

“He should have pleaded the general issue, for if the horse ran away against his will, he would have been found not guilty, because in such case it cannot be said with any colour of reason to be a battery in the rider.”

The more modern cases of Wakeman v. Robinson (4) and Hall v. Fearnley (5) lay down the same rule as regards the pleading point, though the former case was also relied upon as an authority by way of dictum in favour of the G

A plaintiff, and the latter may be fairly relied upon by the defendant, for WIGHTMAN, J., in his judgment, explains Wakeman v. Robinson (4) thus (3 Q.B. at p. 922):

B "The act of the defendant—viz., driving a cart at the very edge of a narrow pavement on which the plaintiff was walking so as to knock the plaintiff down—was prima facie unjustifiable, and required an excuse to be shown. When the motion was first made I had in my recollection the case of Wakeman v. Robinson (4). It was there agreed that an involuntary act might be a defence on the general issue. The decision, indeed, turned on a different point, but the general proposition is laid down. I think the omission to plead the defence has deprived the defendant of the benefit of it and entitled the plaintiff to recover."

C But in truth neither case decided whether, where an act such as discharging a gun is voluntary, but the result injurious, without negligence, an action of trespass can nevertheless be supported as against a plea pleaded and proved, and which the jury find established to the effect that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant.

D Underwood v. Hewson (6), decided in 1724, was relied on for the plaintiff. The report is very short (1 Stra. 596):

"The defendant was uncocking a gun, and, the plaintiff standing to see it, it went off and wounded him, and at the trial it was held that the plaintiff might maintain trespass. Strange pro defendente."

E The marginal note in NOLAN'S edition of 1795—not necessarily STRANGE'S own composition—is this, "Trespass lies for an accidental hurt," and in that edition there is a reference to BULLER'S N.P., p. 16. On referring to BULLER, p. 16, where he is dealing with Weaver v. Ward (2), I find he writes as follows:

F "So it is no battery if one soldier hurts another in exercise; but if he plead it he must set forth the circumstances so as to make it appear to the court that it was inevitable and that he committed no negligence to give occasion to the hurt, for it is not enough to say that he did it casualiter et per infortunium contra voluntatem suam, for no man shall be excused of a trespass unless it be justified entirely without his default (Weaver v. Ward (2)), and, therefore, it has been holden that an action lay where the plaintiff, standing by to see the defendant uncock his gun, was accidentally wounded: Underwood v. Hewson (6), per FORTESCUE and RAYMOND, Stra. 596."

On referring back to Weaver v. Ward (2), I can find nothing in the report (Hob. 134) to show that the court held that in order to constitute a defence in the case of a trespass it is necessary to show that the act was inevitable. If inevitable, it would seem that that was a defence under the general issue; but a distinction is drawn between an act which is inevitable and an act which is excusable, and what Weaver v. Ward (2) really lays down is that "no man shall be excused of a trespass except it may be judged utterly without his fault." Day v. Edwards (7), decided in 1794, merely decides that where a man negligently drives a cart against the plaintiff's carriage, the injury being committed by the immediate act complained of, the remedy must be trespass and not case.

I But the case on which most reliance was placed by the plaintiff's counsel was Leame v. Bray (1). That was an action of trespass in which the plaintiff complained that the defendant with force and arms drove and struck a chaise which he was driving on the highway against the plaintiff's curricule, which the plaintiff's servant was driving, by means whereof the servant was thrown out and the horses ran away, and the plaintiff, who jumped off to save his life, was injured. The facts stated in the report (3 East, at p. 593) include A a statement that

“the accident happened in a dark night, owing to the defendant driving his carriage on the wrong side of the road, and the parties not being able to see each other, and that if the defendant had kept his right side there was ample room for the carriages to have passed without injury.” B

The report goes on to state :

“But it did not appear that blame was imputable to the defendant in any other respect as to the manner of his driving. It was, therefore, objected for the defendant that, the injury having happened from negligence and not wilfully, the proper remedy was by an action on the Case and not of trespass vi et armis, and the plaintiff was thereupon nonsuited.” C

On the argument of the rule to set aside the nonsuit the whole discussion turned upon the question whether the injury was, as put by LAWRENCE, J., ibid. at p. 596, immediate from the defendant's act or consequential only from it, and in the result the nonsuit was set aside. But it clearly appears from the report that there was evidence upon which the jury might have found negligence, and, indeed, the defendant's counsel assumed it in the very objection which prevailed with LORD ELLENBOROUGH when he nonsuited the plaintiff. There is nothing in any of the judgments to show that if in that case a plea had been pleaded denying any negligence, and the jury had found that the defendant was not guilty of any negligence, but (for instance) that the accident happened wholly through the darkness of the night rendering it impossible to distinguish one side of the road from the other, and without negligence on either side, the court would have held that the defendant would have been liable either in trespass or in case. D E

All the cases to which I have referred were before the Court of Exchequer in 1875 in Holmes v. Mather (8), and BRAMWELL, B., in giving judgment in that case, dealt with them thus (L.R. 10 Exch. at pp. 268, 269) : F

“As to the cases cited, most of them are really decisions on the form of action, whether case or trespass. The result of them is this, and it is intelligible enough : if the act that does an injury is an act of direct force vi et armis trespass is the proper remedy (if there is any remedy) where the act is wrongful, either as being wilful or as being the result of negligence. Where the act is not wrongful for either of these reasons no action is maintainable, though trespass would be the proper form of action if it were wrongful. That is the effect of the decisions.” G

This view of the older authorities is in accordance with a passage cited by counsel for the defendant from BACON'S ABRIDGMENT, “Trespass,” p. 706, with a marginal reference to Weaver v. Ward (2), where the word “inevitable” does not find a place. H

“If the circumstance which is specially pleaded in an action of trespass does not make the act complained of lawful [by which I understand justifiable even if purposely done to the extent of purposely inflicting the injury, as, for instance, in a case of self-defence], and only make it excusable, it is proper to plead this circumstance in excuse, and it is in this case necessary for the defendant to show not only that the act complained of was accidental [by which I understand, ‘that the injury was unintentional’], but likewise that it was not owing to neglect or want of due caution.” I

In the present case the plaintiff sued in respect of an injury owing to defendant's negligence, and there was no pretence for saying that it was intentional so far as any injury to the plaintiff is concerned. The jury negatived such negligence. It was argued that nevertheless, inasmuch as the plaintiff was injured by a shot from the defendant's gun, that was an injury owing to an act of force committed by the defendant, and therefore an action would lie. I am of opinion that this is not so, and that to any statement of claim which the plaintiff could suggest the defendant must succeed if the defendant pleaded the facts sworn to by the witnesses for the defendant in this case, and the jury believing those facts, as they must now be taken by me to have done, found the verdict which they have done as regards negligence. In other words, I am of opinion that, if the case is regarded as an action on the case for an injury by negligence, the plaintiff has failed to establish that which is the very gist of such an action. If, on the other hand, it is turned into an action of trespass, and the defendant is (as he must be) supposed to have pleaded a plea denying negligence and establishing that the injury was accidental in the sense above explained, the verdict of the jury is equally fatal to the action. I am, therefore, of opinion that I am bound to give judgment for the defendant.

Judgment for defendant.

BOUCH AND OTHERS v. SPROULE

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Herschell, Lord Watson, Lord Bramwell and Lord FitzGerald), April 5, 8, 9, 12, 1886, June 13, 1887]

[Reported 12 App. Cas. 385; 56 L.J.Ch. 1037; 57 L.T. 345; 36 W.R. 193]

Company—Capital—Increase—Issue of new shares—Payment by shareholders out of “bonus dividend”—Distribution of accumulated profits.

Where a testator or settlor directs or permits the subject of his disposition to remain as shares or stock in a company which has the power either of distributing profits as dividends or of converting them into capital, and the company validly exercises this power, such exercise of power is binding on all persons interested under the testator or settlor in the shares, and consequently what is paid by the company as dividend goes to the tenant for life and what is paid by the company to the shareholders as capital, or appropriated as an increase of its capital stock in the concern, enures to the benefit of all who are interested in the capital.

A testator died in 1876 having bequeathed his residuary personal estate to T. B. in trust for the testator's widow for life, and, after her death, to T. B. absolutely. Part of the residuary estate consisted of 600 £10 shares in a company, on which £7 10s. per share had been paid up. In August, 1880, the directors of the company recommended that a reserve fund, the whole of which, and an “undivided profit fund” a great part of which, had been accumulated out of undivided profits of the company during the testator's lifetime, should be distributed as a “bonus dividend” of £2 10s. per share, and that new £10 shares should be created to the number of one-third of the original shares, so that one new share might be allotted to each shareholder for every three original shares which he held, £7 10s. per share to be paid on allotment, payable out of the bonus received by the shareholders. In September, 1880, these recommendations were adopted at a general meeting, in valid exercise of the powers of the company. T. B. accepted the 200 new shares allotted to him, and signed a memorandum directing the registrar of the company to apply the bonus in payment of the call. The new shares were registered in the name of T. B., who died in 1880, predeceasing the testator's widow.

Held: the bonus declared in 1880, and the new shares did not belong to the tenant for life, but were capital and belonged to the estate of T. B. the remainderman.

C Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal, reported 29 Ch. D. 635, reversing an order of KAY, J., in an action brought by the respondent as executor of Jane Bouch, the tenant for life under the will of one William Bouch deceased, against the appellant, as executor of Sir T. Bouch, the remainderman.

D William Bouch, who died on Jan. 19, 1876, by his will bequeathed all the residue of his personal estate to Sir Thomas Bouch upon trust to convert the same into money, or, with the consent of Jane Bouch (the testator's wife), to allow the same to remain unconverted, and upon further trust to permit his wife to receive the interest, dividends, and annual income of the personal estate during her life. Subject thereto, he bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to Sir Thomas Bouch absolutely. Part of the residuary personal estate of William Bouch consisted of 600 shares of £10 each in the Consett Iron Co., upon which £7 10s. per share had been paid. These shares were, with the consent of E Jane Bouch, allowed to remain unconverted, and she received the dividends thereon during her life. Sir Thomas Bouch died on Oct. 30, 1880, having by his will appointed the appellants his executors and trustees. Jane Bouch, the tenant for life, died on Feb. 22, 1883, having by her will appointed the respondent her executor.

F The Consett Iron Co. was incorporated in the year 1864, with a capital of £400,000 divided into £10 shares. The articles of association provided that whenever the net profits of the company during any financial year ending June 30 would admit, the directors should recommend to the meeting to declare a dividend on the company's capital, and thereupon it should be competent at such meeting to make and declare a dividend of such amount, and payable at such time, as the meeting should determine. By art. 109 :

J "The directors may before recommending any dividend, set aside out of the profits of the company such sum as they think proper as a reserved fund for meeting contingencies, or for equalising dividends, or for repairing or maintaining the works connected with the business of the company, or any part thereof; and the directors may invest the sum so set apart as a reserved fund upon such securities or in such manner as they may think proper."

I The capital of the company was afterwards increased to £552,000 by the addition of 6,000 and 9,200 new shares of £10 each, with £7 10s. per share paid thereon. In the accounts of the company for the year beginning June 30, 1874, there stood to the credit of a reserve fund £100,000, made up from undivided profits of previous years, and there stood to the credit of another fund, styled "undivided profit," a further sum of £6,203 12s.

In August, 1880, the £100,000 still stood to the credit of the reserve fund, and, in addition to the profits of the previous year, £36,070 1s. 8d. was standing to the credit of the undivided profit fund. The report of the directors of Aug. 12, 1880, after recommending that the profits of the previous year should be appropriated to the payment of a certain dividend, and that £7,246 4s. 5d. should be carried forward as undivided profit, proceeded as follows :

"Your directors feel that the time is now come when they may safely recommend some permanent appropriation of the £100,000 standing to the credit of the reserve fund, and of a considerable portion of the undivided profit fund. They, therefore, propose that the reserve fund £100,000 and £38,000 out of the £43,316 6s. 1d. (to which the undivided profit would be brought up by the mode of appropriating the year's profit previously recommended), making together £138,000 shall be distributed as a bonus dividend of £2 10s. per share, equalling £7 10s. in respect of every three existing shares; but as the company's operations render it desirable to raise an equal amount as capital account, your directors propose that there be created 18,400 new shares of £10 each with £7 10s. per share payable concurrently with the payment of the bonus dividend. This would allow of one new share being allotted in respect of every three existing shares, and the bonus dividends would pay the £7 10s. on each such new share. Your directors propose that the bonus dividend and the call of £7 10s. per new share be made payable on Sept. 30, the members registered in the company's books on Sept. 25 being treated as those entitled to such dividend, and to the allotment of new shares. They also propose that the new shares shall take dividend from July 1, 1880, as if the £7 10s. per share had been paid up on that date. They will, therefore, stand on an equal footing with the present shares in regard to all dividends beyond that about to be declared. Every member of the company on Sept. 25 would consequently receive a new £10 share in respect of every three shares he then holds, such new share having, like the existing shares, £7 10s. paid thereon."

On Sept. 4, 1880, the directors' report and accounts were received and adopted, and a special resolution was passed adding to the articles of association a new article empowering the directors, with the sanction of the company in general meeting, to declare a bonus to be paid to the members in proportion to their shares out of the reserve fund, or out of any other accumulated profits of the company. Special resolutions were also passed sanctioning the creation of capital and its allotment in the manner recommended by the directors.

At a meeting of the company on Sept. 25, 1880, these resolutions were confirmed, and a resolution was passed sanctioning the payment of a bonus of £2 10s. per share out of the £100,000 standing to the credit of the reserve fund, and £38,000 part of the undivided profit then in hand. On the same day the registrar of the company sent to the shareholders, including Sir Thomas Bouch (in whose name the 600 shares belonging to William Bouch's estate were registered), a letter enclosing a warrant and forms relating to the new shares. The letter was in the following terms:

"I am instructed to inform you that in accordance with the special resolutions confirmed at the meeting of the company held this day, the directors have, in respect of the 600 shares now registered in your name, allotted to you 200 new shares of £10 each, subject to the sum of £7 10s. per share being paid up thereon on or before the 30th inst., and I enclose you a bonus dividend warrant payable on that date for £1,500, which you will be good enough to sign and return to me by Thursday next, when the amount will be applied in payment of £7 10s. per share on your above named new shares. Regarding the registration of these new shares, I have to explain that, if you desire to have all that you are entitled to registered in your own name, you must fill up and sign the enclosed form No. 1. If you desire to have all or part registered in some other name, forms No. 2 must be filled up and signed both by yourself and by the person in whose name the shares or any of them are to be registered."

The enclosed form No. 1 was as follows:

"Gentlemen, I hereby accept the 200 new shares which have been allotted to me, subject to the conditions on which they are issued, and request that the whole be registered in my own name."

A This was signed and returned by Sir Thomas Bouch. He also signed and returned the enclosed warrant, which was in the following form :

“Consett Iron Co., Ltd. Bonus dividend warrant of £2 10s. per share payable on Sept. 30, 1880. To the members registered in the company's books on Sept. 25, 1880. No. 102. Name of member—Thomas Bouch, Esq. Number of shares, 600. Amount of bonus dividend, one thousand five hundred pounds. (Signed) WM. COCKBURN, Registrar. I hereby authorise and request you to apply the above amount in payment of the call of £7 10s. per share on the 200 new shares that have been allotted to me in accordance with the special resolutions passed at the ordinary general meeting of the company held on Sept. 4, and confirmed at the extraordinary general meeting held on Sept. 25, 1880. N.B. This warrant must be signed and sent to the registrar Mr. Wm. Cockburn, 33, Westgate Road, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on or before Sept. 30, 1880.”

D The 200 new shares were accordingly registered in the name of Sir Thomas Bouch, and £7 10s. was credited as paid on each share. The dividends on these new shares, as well as on the original shares, were paid to Jane Bouch, the tenant for life, down to the last dividend day prior to her death.

E KAY, J. expressed an opinion that the bonus of £2 10s. per share sanctioned on Sept. 25, 1880, on the 600 shares in the company was capital of the estate of William Bouch deceased, and declared that the plaintiff, as executor of William Bouch's widow, was not entitled to the payment of the amount of the bonus or any part thereof, nor to the 200 new shares allotted to Sir Thomas Bouch or any part thereof, and interest accordingly. His judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeal, and the defendants in the action, the executors and trustees of Sir Thomas Bouch appealed.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Freeman for the appellants.

Rigby, Q.C., and Buckley for the respondent.

F Their Lordships took time for consideration.

July 13, 1887. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL (a) (after stating the facts as set out, ante).—This appeal arises upon a Case stated for the opinion of the court to determine whether a bonus of £2 10s. per share, sanctioned in the circumstances I have mentioned, on 600 shares in the Consett Iron Co. Ltd., was income of the estate of William Bouch or capital of that estate. It is to be observed that before the allotment of the new shares in 1880 the shares of the company were at a premium of about £21 per share, but immediately after such allotment they fell to £14 per share premium. The case came, in the first instance, before KAY, J. He considered that it might be open to doubt whether the bonus at the time it was declared belonged to the tenant for life, or was to be regarded as an accretion to capital, though, on the authority of Paris v. Paris (2), he inclined to the latter opinion. But he came to the conclusion that the bonus had been capitalised with the consent of the tenant for life, and that she had agreed that the shares should be treated as capital of the testator's estate, so as to avoid raising this question. The Court of Appeal reversed this judgment. They held that there was no evidence to show that the tenant for life had agreed to relinquish any of her rights, and that the bonus belonged to her, and, having been invested by the trustees in shares of the Consett company, those shares became her property. I quite concur with the Court of Appeal in thinking that there is no evidence that the tenant for life relinquished her right to the bonus if she was ever entitled to it; and, in my judgment, the sole question for determination is whether this bonus is to be regarded as income passing to the A tenant for life under the trusts of the will, or an accretion to capital, to the income of which alone she was entitled, and which enured after her death for the benefit of the remainderman.

(a) In the interval between the argument of the case and the judgment, Lord Herschell had ceased to hold the office of Lord Chancellor, having been succeeded by Lord Halsbury on August 3rd, 1886.

I think this is a question of very considerable difficulty. It was argued at your Lordships' Bar on behalf of the appellants that it was really settled in B their favour by authority. It was said to be well established that where a dividend or bonus appeared to be declared out of accumulated profits, which, de facto, had formed part of the capital of the company, it must be treated as an addition to capital, and that the tenant for life was not entitled to it. If I thought that any such rule had been established and was applicable to the circumstances of the present case, I should certainly advise your Lordships to C decide in accordance with it, whatever I might think of its expediency. The division of the enjoyment of property between a tenant for life and a remainder-man is itself artificial, and if any artificial rule had been established regulating such enjoyment, every settlor or testator may well be presumed to have intended that the objects of his bounty should share its benefits according to this rule.
I may observe, however, at the outset, that there would often be considerable D difficulty in the application of the suggested rule, and that it does not appear to rest on any satisfactory basis of principle.

I will proceed now to consider the authorities relied on. The earliest of these was Brander v. Brander (3), decided in 1799. The Bank of England, having paid out of their funds for the public service £1,000,000, received £1,125,000 three per cent. Annuities. These they resolved to distribute pro rata among E the then proprietors of bank stock. The question arose whether the proportion allotted to the testator's representatives was to be regarded, as between the tenant for life and remainderman, as income or capital. LORD ROSSLYN, L.C., took the latter view. He said (4 Ves. at p. 801):

"If I am to go upon principle, I must hunt back to see to what part of that saving each is entitled. I have often considered this question, and it F seemed to me in all the different ways I could turn the consideration of it, that there was no way to be taken but to consider it as an accretion to capital."

FRY, L.J., says in the present case that the principle of this decision was that what the company says is income shall be income, and what it says is G capital shall be capital. He says (29 Ch.D. at p. 654):

"The Lord Chancellor seems to have proceeded on the ground that the original £1,000,000 was part of the capital of the bank. . . . If that were so, it follows that the bank was distributing amongst its proprietors that which had been returned by the government in satisfaction for the outlay of a part of its capital." H

I cannot concur in this view of Brander v. Brander (3). It does not appear to me to have proceeded on any such principle. The company had in no way said that either the £1,000,000 which had been advanced for the public service, or the annuities which were received in return for it, should be capital. Moreover, it is to be observed (and the importance of this will be seen when we come to I consider the scope of this authority and of those which have followed it), that the bank could not have declared that either of these sums should be added to, or form part of, its capital property so-called, for the bank had no power (as is pointedly stated in the case) to increase its capital, except by obtaining an Act of Parliament. I think the decision in Brander v. Brander (3) proceeded on the ground which FRY, L.J., accurately states as the foundation of the judgment in Irvine v. Houstoun (1), viz., that the accumulated profits had become part of the floating capital of the concern. But they had become so, not by

A reason of any declaration of the company that they should be so, but only in the sense that, having accumulated, they were de facto used as part of its capital. In this sense, however, all accumulated profits which are in use for the purposes of the business of any company may equally be said to form part of its floating capital. And I think that the learned counsel for the appellants were well founded in saying that the greater part, if not the whole, of the accumulated profits of the Consett Iron company, the division of which has given rise to this controversy, were in this sense a portion of the capital of the company.

I pass to Irving v. Houstoun (1), the most important of the series, for, being a decision of this House, your Lordships are bound by it. In that case the Bank of Scotland had passed a resolution that an extraordinary dividend or bonus should be given to proprietors holding stock on June 1. LORD ELDON, in delivering his opinion in this House, after stating that Brander v. Brander (3) had been frequently acted upon, and pointed out the inconvenience of having a different law as to English and Scottish bank stock, proceeded as follows :

"It is impossible to deny that great difficulties attend this matter; the proper question is on which side the fewer difficulties lie. The Bank of England, to which the Bank of Scotland is similar in this respect, has a capital limited by Parliament to a certain amount. This limitation, if strictly adhered to, would have this inconvenience attached to it, that circumstances might occur to oblige them to reduce their ordinary dividends. Therefore, it is that these companies have what is termed their floating capital, which they lay out in the shape of Exchequer and Navy Bills, in discounts, and in every species of property that can be turned into cash at pleasure. Every person who buys bank stock is aware of this; and if he gives a life interest of his estate to anyone, it can scarcely be his meaning that the life-renter should run away with the bonus that may have been accumulating on the capital for half a century."

LORD ROSSLYN, the only other learned Lord who expressed an opinion, said :

"When I first came to consider the case of Brander v. Brander (3), I thought it would be necessary to learn what part of the bonus had accumulated before the testator's death, and what since, to do justice between the claimants. The bank were very much alarmed when I hinted at any intention of that kind. On considering the matter maturely in all its consequences, the judgment was pronounced in that case."

The decision in Irving v. Houstoun (1) was followed in 1804 in Paris v. Paris (2), and again in Clayton v. Gresham (4), though in the former case the Lord Chancellor said that he had great difficulty in stating the principle that led to the earlier decisions. It was further followed in 1807 in Witts v. Steere (5); and again in 1847 in Re Hodgens, Ex parte Hodgens (6), where the directors of the Bank of Ireland having decided, "on account of the favourable result of the last four years," to recommend a bonus of 5 per cent. in addition to the ordinary dividend of 4 per cent., BRADY, L.C., held that this bonus must be considered as capital. But a disposition was early shown to limit the operation of the rule laid down in Brander v. Brander (3), and adopted by this House, and it is manifest that from the first it was felt not to rest on any stable principle. Thus, in Barclay v. Wainwright (7), the directors of the Bank of England declared a dividend of 5 per cent. interest and profits for the half year. It was contended that as this exceeded their ordinary dividend of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., a portion of it must be considered as arising from accumulated profits, and, therefore, treated as capital. LORD ELDON, L.C., in repelling this contention, said (14 Ves. at p. 80) :

"If it be contented that any part of the 5 per cent. is given out of, or to be paid from, capital, a case must be brought before the court, either making that out by evidence or under circumstances forming a fair ground for inquiry. But, as the case now stands, I have no means of considering it as more or less than a declaration in the due execution of the right and duty of the bank that the dividend, which the proprietor ought to receive, is a half-yearly dividend of 5 per cent."

Again, in Preston v. Melville (8), the directors of the Bank of England, having declared a dividend of £3 10s. per cent. out of interest and profits for the half-year, and in addition thereto a bonus of interest and profits of 1 per cent., SHADWELL, V.-C., held the tenant for life entitled to both. It is to be noticed that here, as in the case just cited, there was nothing to show that the bonus was to be paid out of accumulated profits. FRY, L.J., commenting in the court below on the several cases to which I have referred, says (29 Ch. at p. 656):

"These cases, however binding they may be under similar circumstances with regard to the same stocks, certainly do not appear to us to support to any extent the proposition now under investigation [i.e., that the authorities have established a rule that where a sum is paid, whether called bonus or dividend, out of the accumulations of profits in previous years it must be taken as a payment out of, or on account of, capital]. The last case, viz., that of Preston v. Melville (8), seems to lean strongly in the other direction."

Unwilling as I confess myself to be to apply the decision in Irving v. Houstoun (1), in any case where I am not bound to do so, I feel some difficulty in limiting it to the extent suggested by the lord justice when I consider the language used by LORD ELDON and LORD ROSSLYN. Their language seems equally applicable to any company unable to increase its capital, which uses, and is known to use (as many companies are) accumulated profits for capital purposes. I may add that, for the reason I have noted above, Preston v. Melville (8), appears to me to be in complete harmony with the earlier authorities. It seems clear that the decision in Irving v. Houstoun (1), was not considered as applicable only to bank dividends. It was followed, as FRY, L.J., has pointed out, in the case of other companies. Thus in Ward v. Combe (9), the question arose in 1836 in respect of certain settled shares in the London Assurance Co. At a court in 1835 the ordinary dividend of £1 a share was voted, and by another resolution on the same day it was provided that a sum at the rate of £12 per share should be taken out of the profits of the company and divided among the shareholders. SHADWELL, V.-C., held that the £12 a share was capital; and he observed that there was nothing to show at what time the profits out of which the sum was taken arose, and that they might have been profits that had lain dormant for a series of years. It may be doubted whether this decision is altogether consistent with that in Preston v. Melville (8), already alluded to. But it is a clear recognition of the doctrine that a division of accumulated profits among the shareholders is to be regarded as given by way of increase of capital. It is true, indeed, as FRY, L.J., says, that in Price v. Anderson (10), SHADWELL, V.-C., held in the case of the Royal Exchange Assurance Co., whose practice was to declare dividends on their stock half-yearly, and bonuses at intervals of two or more years, that a dividend of £12 10s. per cent. declared in 1846, in addition to the ordinary dividend, belonged entirely to the tenant for life. But it will be observed, on examining the report, that where the same company in 1840 had resolved that in addition to the ordinary dividend of £2 10s. per cent., a distribution of 5 per cent. out of accumulated profits be made to the proprietors, the Vice-Chancellor held that, as this was not made as dividend, it must be considered capital, and ordered it to be invested. The distinction apparently was that in this case the dividend in terms was paid out of accumulated profits, and was not expressed to be a dividend.

A I think therefore, that Irving v. Houstoun (1) must still be regarded as good law, unaffected by any counter-current of authority. But it is, in my opinion, an authority governing only a case similar in its facts—that is to say, a case where the company has no power to increase its capital, but has accumulated profits and has used them, in fact, for capital purposes, and afterwards distributes these profits among the proprietors. I think it will be seen that there is a substantial reason for the limitation I have suggested. I quite agree with the court below that, apart from the authorities to which I have alluded, the general principle for the determination of such a question as that before us, and, in my opinion, the only sound principle is that which is well expressed in the judgment of Fry, L.J. (29 Ch. at p. 653):

C “When a testator or settlor directs or permits the subject of his disposition to remain as shares or stock in a company which has the power either of distributing profits as dividends, or of converting them into capital, and the company validly exercises this power, such exercise of power is binding on all persons interested under the testator or settlor in the shares, and consequently what is paid by the company as dividend goes to the tenant for life, and what is paid by the company to the shareholders as capital, or appropriated as an increase of the capital stock in the concern, ensures to the benefit of all who are interested in the capital.”

D And it appears to me that, where a company has power to increase its capital, and to appropriate its profits to such increase, it cannot be considered as having intended to convert, or having converted, any part of its profits into capital when it has made no such increase, even if a company having no power to increase its capital may be regarded as having thus converted profits into capital by the accumulation and use of them as such.

E I come now to the question whether the company did in the present case distribute the accumulated profits as dividend, or convert them into capital; and here I find myself constrained to differ from the conclusion at which the Court of Appeal arrived. I think we must look both at the substance and form of the transaction. It is to be observed, in the first place, that the amount of that portion of the new capital created which was to be paid up was exactly equal to the amount of profits to be distributed. And it was obviously contemplated, and was, I think, certain, that no money would, in fact, pass from the company to the shareholders, but that the entire sum would remain in their hands as paid-up capital. It is said in the judgment below that a shareholder who refused to take new shares, and to fill up the form of authority at the foot of the dividend warrant, would have been nevertheless entitled to receive his dividend from the company. I agree that this is so. But, to my mind, it was certain, and known to be so by the company, that no shareholder would make such a claim. Take the facts of the present case as an illustration. The holder of 600 shares was, we will assume, entitled to claim from the company £1,500, and to decline to take any new shares. But if he had been indisposed to add any new shares to those he already held, he would not have dreamed of adopting such a course. By doing so he would have received in cash £1,500 only. If his desire was to have cash, instead of new shares, he would have sold his interest in the new shares, and signed the second form enclosed in the registrar's letter, and the authority at the foot of the dividend warrant, for he would then have obtained from a purchaser, not £1,500, but probably upwards of £4,000.

I It is said by Fry, L.J., that the two transactions—the payment of the dividend and the payment of the call—could not be carried into effect as one operation, inasmuch as in the case of a person holding less than three shares, or holding a number not a multiple of three, the dividend on the odd share or shares must, in the absence of arrangement with some other member, have been paid in cash. But it must be remembered that the directors undertook to afford facilities for the sale or exchange of fractional new shares, and such arrangements were so obviously to the advantage of those entitled to fractional parts of a share, that it was certain they would be effected. I cannot, therefore, avoid the conclusion that the substance of the whole transaction was, and was intended to be, to convert the undivided profits into paid-up capital upon newly-created shares. And the form in which the operations were effected points in the same direction. The dividend warrant is not in the ordinary form. It is assumed that it will be signed by the member only at the foot of the authority to apply the amount in payment of the calls on the new shares. And it is intimated on the face of it that it must be "signed and sent" to the registrar before Sept. 30, 1880. Moreover, the letter of the registrar enclosing it contains these terms,

"which you will be good enough to sign and return to me by Thursday next, when the amount will be applied in payment of £7 10s. per share on your above-mentioned new shares."

It is to be observed also that, although the bonus was not sanctioned until August, and the £7 10s. per share was expressed to be made payable on Sept. 30, the new capital was to rank for dividend pari passu with the old capital from June 30 preceding, which is only explicable on the ground that these moneys, in the hands of the company, which were, in fact, in use as capital, were to be so treated as from that date. Upon the whole, then, I am of opinion that the company did not pay, or intend to pay, any sum as dividend, but intended to, and did, appropriate the undivided profits dealt with as an increase of the capital stock in the concern. I, therefore, move your Lordships that the judgment of the court below be reversed, and the judgment of KAY, J., restored, and that the respondents do pay the costs in the Court of Appeal, and the costs of this appeal.

LORD WATSON.—I am of opinion, with the learned judges of the Court of Appeal, that the present case does not come within the principle to which this House, following the decision of the Lord Chancellor in Brander v. Brander (3) gave effect in the Scottish case of Irring v. Houstoun (1).

In the first of these cases the Bank of England, and in the second the Bank of Scotland, whose constitution gave them no power to increase their capital, had, nevertheless, for a long period of years retained and employed a large amount of accumulated profits as capital in the course of their business; and they ultimately paid a considerable portion of these accumulations to their shareholders in the shape of bonus. In Irring v. Houstoun (1), LORD ELDON, L.C., appears to me to have come to the conclusion that the bonus belonged to the fiar, and not to the liferentrix of the testator's shares in the Bank of England upon two grounds. He expresses the opinion, in the first place, that these accumulated profits, which he describes as the floating capital of the bank, were regarded by the testator and the other owners of bank shares as being in the nature of capital; and in these circumstances, his Lordship says:

"if he [the testator] gives the life interest of his estate to anyone it can scarcely be his meaning that the liferenter should run away with a bonus that may have been accumulating on the floating capital for half a century."

In the second place, his Lordship intimates his opinion that on no ground of equity could it be contended that the liferentrix was entitled to accumulations made during the lifetime of the testator, and that an inquiry into the precise amounts of profit which had accrued before and after the commencement of the life-rent right would lead to inconveniences which would be intolerable. LORD ROSSLYN, who had, as Lord Chancellor, decided Brander v. Brander (3), concurred in the judgment. His opinion, so far as reported, proceeds upon the second ground stated by LORD ELDON. He said:

A “When I first came to consider the case of Brander v. Brander (3), I thought it would be necessary to learn what part of the bonus had accumulated before the testator’s death and what part since that period, to do justice between the claimants. The bank were very much alarmed when I hinted any intention of this kind. Upon considering the matter maturely B in all its consequences, the judgment was pronounced in that case holding the bonus to be an accretion to the capital.”

The Consett Iron Co., Ltd., stands in a different position from these two banks. By art. 109 of its articles of association, the directors are empowered, before recommending any dividend, to set aside, out of the profits of the concern, such sum as they may think proper

C “as a reserved fund for meeting contingencies, or for equalising dividends, or for repairing or maintaining the works connected with the business of the company, or any part thereof.”

The company has likewise under its articles the power which it exercised in 1872 of increasing its capital by the creation and allotment of new shares to D its members according to their respective interests, and of crediting them with a sum as paid on each share from its reserved or undivided profits. It is also worthy of observation, although in the view which I take of this case the circumstance is not material, that the books of the company were kept, and the annual balance-sheets issued to the shareholders prepared in such a form as E to disclose the precise amount of profit and loss upon each year’s trading, and that the parties have consequently been enabled to state in their joint case the exact proportion of the reserved profits in question which accrued during the currency of the life tenant’s right. So that the obstacles to an inquiry, which were regarded as insuperable in Brander v. Brander (3) and Irving v. Houstoun (1), do not exist in the present case.

F I do not doubt that the rule applied by this House in Irving v. Houstoun (1) must receive effect in all similar cases. But, in a case like the present, where the company has power to determine whether profits reserved and temporarily devoted to capital purposes shall be distributed as dividend or permanently added to its capital, the interest of the life tenant depends, in my opinion, upon the decision of the company. I entirely concur in the observations made G upon this point by Wood, V.-C., in Re Barton’s Trusts (11) (L.R. 5 Eq. at p. 244):

“The dividend to which a tenant for life is entitled is the dividend which the company chooses to declare. And when the company meet and say that they will not declare a dividend, but will carry over some portion of the half-year’s earnings to the capital account and turn it into capital, it is competent for them, I apprehend, to do so; and, when this is done, every-H body is bound by it, and the tenant for life of those shares cannot complain.”

In my opinion, that rule must obtain, whether the profits with which the company is dealing belong to the current year, or have been previously reserved for the purposes of its business.

I Applying these principles to the present case, I am unable to concur in the view which the Court of Appeal has taken of the real character of the arrangements under which the Consett Iron Co., on Sept. 25, 1880, issued a bonus dividend warrant, and a relative allotment of new shares to each and all of the shareholders of the company. The balance sheet of the company for the year ending June 30, 1880, states as an asset a sum of £100,000, which had in the year 1874 been carried from the undivided profits of previous years to a reserve fund, and had subsequently been entered, under that heading, in the books and balance sheets of the company. I do not think (and so far I agree with the learned judges of the Court of Appeal) that the mere fact of moneys being taken from undivided profits and carried to a reserve fund is equivalent to capitalisation of them. But the whole or part of the reserve fund may be legitimately expended on the repair and maintenance of works and plant in such a way as to make it practically unavailable for the purpose of paying dividend, so long as there is no increase of the capital of the company and the works continue in operation. The balance-sheet of June 30, 1880, shows that, in point of fact, not only the whole reserve fund of £100,000, but a large additional sum of undivided profits had, at that date, been spent upon, and were represented by, not cash or convertible securities, but the works and plant of the company. In these circumstances, it was undoubtedly within the power of the company, by raising new capital to the required amount, to set free the sums thus spent out of the reserve fund and undivided profits for distribution among the shareholders. It was equally within the power of the company to capitalise these sums by issuing new shares against them to its members in proportion to their several interests.

I am of opinion that the latter alternative was, in substance, that which was followed by the company. The directors issued their annual report on Aug. 12, 1880, to which a copy of the balance sheet was annexed. In their report they recommended “to the shareholders some permanent appropriation of the £100,000 standing to credit of reserve fund, and of a considerable portion of the undivided profit fund.”

These words do not suggest either the realisation of the works and plant in which the funds had been invested, or the creation of new shares for the purpose of raising moneys for distribution among the shareholders. What they do suggest is the permanent appropriation of the moneys to the capital purposes to which they had already been temporarily appropriated. In order to attain that object, the directors proposed that the reserve fund and £38,000 of undivided profits, together amounting to £138,000,

“shall be distributed as a bonus dividend of £2 10s. per share, equalling £7 10s. in respect of every three existing shares, but as the company's operations render it desirable to raise an equal amount on capital account, your directors propose that there be created 18,400 new shares of £10 with £7 10s. per share payable concurrently with the payment of the bonus dividend. This would allow of one new share being allotted in respect of every three existing shares, and the bonus dividend would pay the £7 10s. on each such new share.”

The directors further proposed that the bonus dividend and the call of £7 10s. per new share should be made payable on the same day; that the shareholders whose names appeared in the register on Sept. 25, 1880, should be entitled to the dividend and to the allotment of new shares; and that the new shares should stand on an equal footing with the old as from July 1, 1880.

The report of the directors was received and adopted without reservation at the ordinary annual meeting of the company, held upon Sept. 4, 1880. Various resolutions were passed by the company at that and also at subsequent meetings, but I do not consider the terms of these resolutions as of material importance, because they merely provide the requisite machinery for enabling the directors to carry into effect the scheme suggested in their report. For the same reason, I do not think any importance can be attached to the form of the dividend warrant and allotment of new shares, which was subsequently issued to the shareholders by the officers of the company. None of these documents can, in my opinion, affect the substance of the scheme, which was recommended in the

A report of the directors and adopted by the company. At the time when that scheme was submitted, the capital of the company consisted of 55,200 shares of £10 each with £7 10s. paid up per share. Before the proposal to issue new shares was made, the old shares were selling at a premium of £21 per share, but after the allotment of new shares the premium fell to £14. The executor of William Bouch held 600 old shares which belonged to the remainderman. The selling value of these shares was in consequence of the adoption of the new scheme diminished by £4,200. The bonus on the shares was only £1,500; but the value of the 200 new shares, with that sum imputed as paid upon them, was £4,300. If the company had offered to its members a choice between the bonus dividend and new shares with £7 10s. paid on each, no sane shareholder would have elected to take the dividend. If William Bouch's executors had done so, the life tenant would have benefited to the extent of £1,500, but the estate of the remainderman would have been depreciated in value to the extent of £4,200. I doubt whether, in the case supposed, it would be the duty of an executor to choose the bonus and reject the shares; but I am satisfied that in the present case no such option was given by the company.

I am unable to resist the conclusion that, in adopting the scheme recommended by the directors, the company must have intended that each shareholder should get an allotment of new shares, and that the money declared to be payable as dividend, which was not in the coffers of the company, and did not exist in a form available for distribution, should not be paid to the shareholder, but should simply, by means of an entry in the company's books, be imputed in payment of the call of £7 10s. upon each new share. That is plainly indicated in the report as the necessary result of the shareholders agreeing to the proposals therein made. It states expressly that, if the shareholders sanctioned these proposals

"every member of the company, on Sept. 25 would consequently receive one new share in respect of every three shares he then holds, such new shares having, like the existing shares, £7 10s. paid thereon, and leaving £2 10s. uncalled."

If I am right in my conclusion, the substantial bonus which was meant to be given to each shareholder was not a money payment, but a proportional share of the increased capital of the company. In that view of the facts, it does not, in my opinion, admit of doubt that the benefit must accrue to the remainderman, and not to the tenant for life. I am, accordingly, of opinion that the order of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed, and the judgment of KAY, J., restored.

LORD BRAMWELL.—The authorities bearing on the question in this case are, to my mind, very unsatisfactory. I can deduce no principle from them. Cases have been decided differently where the facts were the same, because different words had been used. This, in my opinion, can never or very rarely be right. There seems to have been a confused notion that undivided profits at some time and somehow became capital. The truth is, as said by the Court of Appeal, that a trader, whether sole or corporate, trades with all the money which he has got, let him have got it how he may. A sole trader with a capital of £10,000, who makes in a year a profit of £2,000, and spends £1,000 only, leaving the other £1,000 in his business, may well in the next year be said to have a capital of £11,000—not so where there is a partnership, whether an ordinary partnership or an incorporated partnership. There the undivided profits of any period, a year or shorter or longer time, continue to be undivided profits unless something in the articles of partnership, or some agreement by all the partners, makes them capital. They do not become capital by effluxion of time, or by their being used in the trading. For example, a company makes a profit of £10,500 in a year. Suppose its capital to be £200,000, it divides the £10,000 giving 5 per cent. to its shareholders, trading with the £500 as with its other funds. It does this for four years with the same result of profit and dividend. At the end of the fourth year its undivided profits, including those brought forward, are £12,000, and it can and does pay 6 per cent. to its shareholders. Can there be a doubt of its right to do so? Is it not the fair and just thing as between a tenant for life and remainderman? I say yes, and if true for four years, it is true for forty. A

I think the right rule would be that contended for by counsel for the respondent. Make the date of the division the date for considering the rights. All profits made up to that date, unless by the articles of partnership or subsequent agreement by the shareholders, are profits to which the tenant for life is entitled, though they have been used in the business. I think that is the opinion of the Court of Appeal. To apply such a principle to this case, had the company simply divided their profits and reserve fund to the extent they disposed of them, and created no new shares, Mrs. Bouch would have been entitled to £2 10s. on each of the 600 shares, that is £1,500. The 600 shares would have been less in value £2 10s. each, and would have been worth each £26, or in all £15,600 instead of £17,100 as they were at the time of the arrangement. By doing what they did, that is creating the new shares and paying the £7 10s. on each new share, every share new and old, became worth three-fourths only of what a share was worth before, and the total value of the 800 shares was the same as of the 600 before, viz., £17,100. But applying the above reasoning to the facts that took place, it seems to me impossible to say that in reason, or on any legal consideration, Mrs. Bouch could be entitled to the 200 new shares. For, if so, the remainderman's right would be only to the 600 shares remaining, which at three-fourths of the £28 10s. would make them worth only £12,825, the new 200 being worth £4,275. The tenant for life cannot have a right to the new shares. But it may be said that this reasoning shows she had a right to the £1,500. C

To this I think there are two answers, not that it would not have been a reasonable thing to have given the £1,500 to her, and to have made some different arrangement for the new shares, but there are, I say, two answers. First, the authorities are against her. But, secondly, I think it must be taken that there was an agreement by all parties, the company and its shareholders, and, if necessary, I should say by the tenant for life and the remainderman, certainly by those whose case we are considering, that new shares should be created, and that undivided profits should be applied to the payment of £7 10s. on each new share. If I am asked what Mrs. Bouch gained by consenting to this I cannot say. Perhaps her consent was no more than non-dissent. Perhaps, if she thought about it at all, she did not think she could help it. Perhaps she could not. For it was the offer made by the company to the shareholders, which was to be accepted or refused as a whole. I agree with the first answer of the Court of Appeal, "that the bonus of £2 10s. was income of the estate of William Bouch" to this extent, that in reason and in right it should have been so treated. But I differ from the second answer, which is a sort of conclusion from the first. It is an erroneous conclusion in my opinion. It assumes that £7 10s. bought a new share. It did not. For the price of the new share was that sum and the diminished value of the other shares. On these considerations, and agreeing with the noble and learned Lords who have already spoken in their reasoning and their view of the authorities, I am of opinion that this judgment should be reversed. F
H
I

LORD FITZGERALD.—I concur with my noble and learned friends, and am of opinion that, for the reasons given, the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed. At the close of the argument at your Lordships' Bar, I had

A arrived at the conclusion that the directors of the Consett Iron Co., acting within their powers, had so dealt with the extra allowance or bonus made to the shareholders out of accumulated profits and reserve fund as to make that "bonus" capital and not income. I differ from the Court of Appeal, not in its able exposition of the law, but as to the proper inferences to be deduced from the admitted facts. FRY, L.J., puts the question thus :

B "There remains another question, namely, whether the way in which the declaration of this bonus or dividend was coupled with the creation of new capital did or did not amount to a capitalisation of the bonus."

C Upon this question I have felt myself unable to follow the Court of Appeal, and I adopt the view of KAY, J. The reasoning and the decision of WOOD, V.-C. in Barton's Trusts (11) then directly apply. The proceedings at the ordinary general meeting of Sept. 4, 1880, and the documents which emanated from it, together with the resolutions of confirmation, have been so carefully and critically examined by KAY, J., and by your Lordships, that I can add nothing. I adopt the view of the facts already expressed and the proper inferences to be drawn from them. The opinion which I had formed at the close of the case, to which D I now adhere, renders it unnecessary for me to criticise any of the endless chain of decisions by which the argument was supposed to be illustrated.

Appeal allowed.

H Company—Director—Misfeasance—Purchase of property in which director interested—Need to prove excessive price, secret profit, and loss to company—Charges of breach of trust, deceit, fraud—Onus of proof—Charges to be made unequivocally—Need for plaintiff to have pecuniary interest in proceedings.

I In an action brought under s. 165 of the Companies Act, 1862 [see now Companies Act, 1948, s. 333] for a declaration that the director of a company had been guilty of misfeasance and breach of trust in connection with the purchase by the company of certain coal-yielding properties in which he was interested and for the repayment to the company by the director of the price paid for the properties,

Held: the essence of such an action was proof that the price at which the properties had been purchased by the company was in excess of their true value, that the director had made a secret profit from the transaction, and that in consequence the company had suffered pecuniary loss; where rescission was claimed in an action under the section and it was shown that a person taking part in the purchase was himself one of the vendors the onus was on him to show that he had made a full disclosure of his interest at the time of the sale, or, if he had failed to do so, that the interest became known to the purchaser at a subsequent date, and that the purchaser either expressly or by plain implication elected to uphold the transaction; but when the plaintiff charged a director with misfeasance, deceit, or fraudulent concealment of facts which led to a loss on the part of the purchasing company, the onus probandi was on the plaintiff; allegations of breach of duty, fraud or deceit must be unequivocally made in the summons or writ; a person who had no pecuniary interest in the result of the proceedings had no right of suit under the section. Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (COTTON and FRY, L.J.J., BOWEN, L.J., dissenting), reported 29 Ch.D. 795, sub nom. Re Cape Breton Coal Co., affirming a decision of PEARSON, J., reported 26 Ch.D. 221.

The appellant was a holder of fully paid-up shares in the Cape Breton Coal Co., Ltd., which was formed for the purpose of acquiring certain coal areas in Cape Breton. The respondent was a director of that company. In 1871 the respondent was a member of an association called the Coal Area Association, which had been formed for the purpose of acquiring land, mines, and mining rights in Nova Scotia, and to promote companies for the acquisition and working of such land, mines, and mining rights. In that year the Coal Area Association acquired the three areas in question for the sum of £5,500. In 1873 the Cape Breton Coal Co. was formed, of which the respondent was a director, and that company purchased the three coal areas in question for the sum of £42,000. In July, 1875, the Cape Breton company was ordered to be wound-up compulsorily. It was admitted that at the time of the original contract for the purchase of the coal areas in question the position of the respondent was not fully disclosed to the Cape Breton company, but after the facts had become fully known it was resolved at a meeting of the company to confirm the purchase, and to sell the property for what it would fetch. The property was ultimately sold for £15,000. The appellant, as a shareholder in the company, brought the present action, asking for a declaration that the respondent, as a director of the company, was guilty of misfeasance and breach of trust in being a party to the affixing of the seal of the company to the agreements for the purchase of the coal areas and in paying the sum of £42,000 for the properties, and for a declaration that the respondent should repay to the company the sum of £42,000. PEARSON, J., held that the only remedy which the plaintiff could have against the respondent was a rescission of the contract which had been rendered impossible through the action of the company in having determined to adopt the purchase, and to sell the property for what it would fetch. This decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, and the plaintiff appealed.

LORD HERSCHELL.—This case arises upon an application made in the winding-up of the Cape Breton Coal Co. under s. 165 of the Companies Act, 1862, the appellant claiming, under that section, that the respondent, who was a director of that company, should be held liable for misfeasance or breach of trust, he having been an agent of the company. The evidence before your Lordships is very meagre; and in the arguments of the learned counsel which have been addressed to your Lordships a great many suggestions have been made which receive but little support from the evidence which has been adduced.

It appears that in the year 1871 certain persons associated themselves together under the name of "the Coal Area Association," and acquired three areas of coal, known as the Haven, Lake, and Balmoral areas. There has been some controversy as to the price at which they acquired those areas, but I think we may take it that the price was £5,500. Among the persons associated under that title was the present respondent, Mr. Fenn. There were also his partner, Mr. Crosthwaite, an engineer named Baker, and a Mr. Gisborne. At the commencement of the year 1872 the persons who were thus associated as the Coal Area Association formed a limited company, bearing the same name with the addition of the word "Limited," and Mr. Gisborne, who resided in Nova Scotia, and by whom apparently these areas had been originally owned, or at all events in whose name they stood, assigned his interest in the coal areas to Coal Area Association, Ltd., giving them the right to use his name for all purposes necessary to give them the full benefit of that assignment. In 1873 negotiations were entered into for the amalgamation of three other coal companies—the Lorway Coal Co., the Glasgow and Cape Breton Coal Co., and the Schooner Pond Coal Co.—and an agreement was entered into for the amalgamation of those three companies and the transfer of their properties to a new company which was to be incorporated. The new company was to undertake all the liabilities, debenture and otherwise, of those three companies, and was to acquire all their property.

This amalgamation was made the subject of an agreement of Oct. 24, 1873, which was made between the three companies that I have named, and a Mr. Blunt on behalf of the intended new company, and by that agreement not only were the properties of the three existing companies to be acquired by the new company, but it was made a condition of the entire arrangement that the new company should also acquire by agreement of sale and purchase the three coal areas, the Haven, the Lake, and the Balmoral, which were the property of Coal Area Association, Ltd., at a price not exceeding £42,000, and on the terms that the vendors should take not less than two-thirds of the money in paid-up shares of the new company. The arrangement contemplated by that agreement was afterwards carried into effect; the new company, the Cape Breton Coal Co., Ltd., was incorporated in November of the same year, and of that new company Mr. Fenn, the present respondent, and Mr. Baker

A became directors. In the following month the purchase of the three coal areas, which was contemplated by the agreement of October, 1873, was carried into effect. The price given was the maximum price permitted by the agreement, namely, £42,000, but instead of a third of it being in cash and the remainder in shares, £12,000 only was paid in cash, and the remaining £30,000 was paid in shares of the new company. At the time when that agreement was
B come to by the directors of the new company and the owners of those three areas, Mr. Fenn and Mr. Baker were present; they were parties to the agreement and parties to putting the seal of the company to it.

It is in respect of that transaction that the present claim is advanced under s. 165 of the Companies Act, 1862. The question which your Lordships have to consider is whether there was a misfeasance in relation to that transaction within
C the meaning of the section. There can be no doubt that, inasmuch as Mr. Fenn was interested with his partner, Mr. Crosthwaite, to the extent of three-tenths of the value of these three coal areas, holding three-tenths of the shares in Coal Area Association, Ltd., he was bound to disclose that interest to the other directors of the new company, who were entering into a contract for the purchase of them, and his failure to make that disclosure would entitle the company, D upon discovering his interest, to rescind the sale. About that there can be no manner of doubt. But at the present time rescission has become impossible. It is said, however, on the part of the appellant: "Although rescission has become impossible and that remedy is no longer available, I am nevertheless entitled to claim against the respondent that he shall make good to the company the loss they have sustained owing to his misfeasance in failing to make that

The case has been put on behalf of the appellant in various ways. First, it is said to be a case of a secret profit made by an agent, which profit he is, therefore, bound to hand over to his principal. It cannot be doubted that Mr. Fenn, as a director of the company, was in the position of an agent, and,
F undoubtedly, if he filled any fiduciary position towards the company at the time when he purchased this property, he would be bound to pay to the company the difference between the price at which he purchased it and the price at which it was sold to the company. But here it is beyond question that, at the time when the purchase was made, Mr. Fenn and his co-adventurers were none of them in any sort of fiduciary relation to the company, the existence of which was at
G that time not even contemplated. Again, there probably is little doubt that, if an agent of a company is employed by that company to make a purchase for them in the market of goods of any description, and if instead of making that purchase in the market at the market price he sells to his company goods of the required description, which he happens to own, at a price in excess of the market price, he can be made to pay to the company that excess, so as to leave
H their purchase, as it ought to have been, at the market price, according to the obligations which he is under to them. But in the present case the purchase that was made was a purchase of a specific property; it was that specific property alone which the agent, the director, was authorised to purchase. It was not left to him to purchase, at the best price at which they could be obtained, goods or land of a particular description; but his agency, so far as it existed
I at all, was an agency to purchase this specific property in which it is proved he had an interest.

I am by no means prepared to say that the argument of the appellant is well founded, that such a case as this is a parallel to the cases to which I have alluded, where an agent employed to go into the market and buy at the market price sells his own goods to the company at something above the market price. But I do not think it necessary to come to any absolute determination upon that point, because it is of the very essence of such a case as this to show that the price at which the property was sold to the company was in excess of what has been called the real price or the true value. What evidence is there here, upon which your Lordships would be entitled to act, that the property in question was sold to the company at a price in excess of its real value, or market value, or true value, or whichever way you put it? I admit that there may be considerable ground for suspicion that the price was excessive, but obviously for such a case as the appellant seeks to make out here much more than that is necessary. It is of the very essence of the case, which rests upon his proving a secret profit improperly made. A

What are the only facts before us? The appellant relies upon the fact that this property, purchased in 1871, at £5,500, was sold in the autumn of 1873 at the price of £12,000 in cash, with an addition of £30,000 in shares in this new company. No doubt that is a fact of importance. But that is not the only fact, and it is impossible for us to shut our eyes to information, which is matter of common knowledge, that subsequently to 1871 coal properties did rise very considerably in value, whether to this extent or not to this extent it matters not; that fact at all events prevents our coming to the conclusion that the price given in the early part of 1871 is any real guide to the value of the same property in 1873. But that is not all, because in October, 1873, an agreement was entered into between the representatives of the three companies as well as a person acting on behalf of the intended new company. The representatives of the companies, the Glasgow, the Schooner Pond, and the Lorway, considered it worth their while to give up to £42,000, £14,000 of that sum to be in cash, for the purchase of this very property. These three companies were entirely independent, as far as appears, of the persons who owned the coal areas in question. It is said that these three companies had originally been promoted by the same persons, but it is impossible to shut one's eyes to the fact that such an agreement was come to as affording evidence that this was considered in October, 1873, as the value of the property. C

It is not necessary to inquire what the real value of the property exactly was, or for your Lordships to come to any determination upon it. As I have said, you may have reason to suspect that the price given was excessive; but how is it possible, in the face of the evidence to which I have called attention, for your Lordships to come to the conclusion that any such case is established as is alleged on behalf of the appellant, namely, that a sum in excess of the real value was, in 1873, agreed to be given by the directors of the Cape Breton Coal Co. for these three coal areas? I think it is impossible to arrive at any such conclusion and to say that, therefore, there has been misfeasance on the part of Mr. Fenn, the respondent, which would warrant your Lordships coming to the conclusion that he should be compelled to return a part of the money received in respect of this purchase, on the ground that he was making improperly a considerable profit. I entertain very great doubt whether there is any evidence establishing that there was a misfeasance on the part of the respondent in concealing his interest in the property. No doubt, where rescission is claimed, if it is shown that a person taking part in the transaction of purchase was himself one of the vendors, the onus would be on him of showing that he made full disclosure. But when an applicant seeks under s. 165 to establish a case of misfeasance, I think it is necessary for him to give evidence of all the elements that go to make up that misfeasance. There is no misfeasance in a person, who has an interest in property by being a shareholder in the company which is selling it, nevertheless acting as a director of another company in the purchase of that property. The misfeasance, if it exists at all, must be because he enters into such a transaction without communicating to his co-directors the fact that he has such an interest. It seems to me that it must rest with those who allege the misfeasance to prove that element, which is an essential element in proving the offence. F
H
I

What is the evidence here? I cannot see the slightest evidence to show that disclosure was not made in the present case, or that the other directors were not perfectly well aware of Mr. Fenn's position. One may speculate about it, one may imagine that they were not; but, as I have said, those who undertake to make out a case of misfeasance must establish that case before they can claim the relief to which it is suggested they are entitled.

It is said that the case may be put in another way, that there was here, at all events, a breach of duty, and that in respect of that breach of duty a claim may be made under s. 165, the breach of duty being the omission to make full disclosure. There, again, I have only to repeat that I fail to see the evidence that there was any such breach of duty committed. I think that, in order to establish a claim of relief, it would be necessary, not only to show a breach of duty, but to show a breach of duty which resulted in pecuniary loss to the company. It may be perfectly true that where there is a duty, whether arising out of a contract or otherwise, by one person to another, an action will lie in respect of a breach of that duty, although no substantial damage has been suffered. In an action nominal damages may be recovered wherever a breach of duty is shown. But I certainly do not think that any such doctrine can be applied to s. 165. The right which that section gives is not given to the company or the representative of the company with whom there is a contract, or towards whom there is a duty, or against whom there is a breach of duty; the right under s. 165 is given to "any liquidator or any creditor or contributory of the company." A creditor or contributory has no duty owing to him; there is no duty or breach of duty in respect of which he can maintain an action; but he has a right to the extent that if, owing to a misfeasance or breach of duty, the funds of the company in which he is interested have been diminished, those funds shall be made good, and the assets of the company shall be recouped the loss which they have sustained. Therefore, I think that, assuming that a breach of duty such as is suggested would be a misfeasance, giving rise to an application under s. 165 such an application could only succeed where it could be shown that the breach of duty had resulted in loss to the funds and assets of the company.

The only other way in which the case has been put is that there has been deceit or fraud, which would give ground for this application. With reference to the last two claims to which I have alluded, namely, the claim for breach of duty and the claim in respect of deceit or fraud, I think that it would be a very grave question whether it would be proper to give the relief applied for upon a summons such as we find in the present case. I think that, where it is intended to allege such a breach of duty, and where it is intended to allege fraud or deceit, these allegations should be clearly, satisfactorily, unequivocally made in the summons, so that those against whom they are made should have their attention directed to them, and should have an opportunity of meeting them. In the present case I entertain a strong impression that it never was intended, at the time when the summons was issued, to make any such allegations. In my opinion, there was an idea that the respondent Mr. Fenn could be made responsible for the difference between what he gave for the property and the price at which he sold it, and the claim was based on his having been a party to putting the seals on the two purchase agreements, but I do not find anywhere an allegation either that there was misfeasance in respect of a breach of duty to disclose, or that there was misfeasance in respect of fraud or deceit in making a false representation to the company or to his co-directors. I see no ground whatsoever for alleging fraud. I have come to the conclusion that the appellant has not established, on any of the grounds suggested, that there has been misfeasance on the part of the respondent resulting in loss to the company in respect of which compensation can be claimed.

One other point remains, namely, the question whether the appellant has a right, though having no interest, to invoke the assistance of the court under sec. 165. Of course, in the view which I take, it is not necessary to pronounce an opinion upon that point; but, the point having been raised and argued before your Lordships, it may be expedient that it should not be passed over without some expression of opinion upon it. I cannot help entertaining the gravest doubt whether the appellant has any locus standi. I think it clear that he is not a creditor. His only claim, therefore, to the assistance of the court must be on the grounds that he is a contributory. He is a contributory whose shares are fully paid up. He would be interested, therefore, as a contributory, if any funds could be brought into the coffers of the company out of which it would be possible that any return could be made to him. But I cannot think that in passing this section it was contemplated by the legislature that a contributory who could have no possible interest in the result of the application, and could obtain no benefit whatsoever as a contributory, even if to the fullest extent to which the claim was advanced it proved good, should have a right to apply under this section. True, "contributory" is mentioned without any sort of limitation, but so it is in s. 82 of the Act, which allows a contributory to petition for winding-up [see now Companies Act, 1948, s. 224], and it has been held that, a shareholder with fully paid-up shares of the company, although a contributory within the words of the section, may, nevertheless, not be entitled to invoke the assistance of the court if he be a person having no real interest in the company. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs, and the judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed, and I so move your Lordships.

LORD WATSON.—I am of the same opinion. I do not desire to rest my judgment in this case upon the reasons which were assigned for the decision of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal. It is not, to my mind, at all clear that, because rescission has become impossible through the impossibility of giving restitutio in integrum to the seller, a claim under either of the two heads embraced in s. 165 of the Companies Act, 1862, is thereby excluded. I think it is very material, in considering this case, to attend to the specific nature of the claims which are sanctioned by that section. They are of a twofold character. They sanction the recovery, at the instance of a liquidator, a creditor, or a contributory of the company in liquidation, first, of moneys for which the defendant has become accountable to the company, the company's moneys; and the second head of claim is for pecuniary loss sustained by the company and its funds through the misfeasance or breach of duty of the defendant. It does not include any claim against a seller to the company, such as would be comprised in the remedy of offering back the property and seeking restitution of the price.

In the present case, I think the appellant, if he had a title under the section (a matter to which I shall shortly allude hereafter), was entitled to have an action against the respondent Mr. Fenn under s. 165 upon two grounds. In the first place, he might show, as he has endeavoured to show, that Mr. Fenn, by the transaction in question, and his concealment of his true position in reference to it, has made a secret profit when acting as agent for the company. The second ground is that, having originally concealed his true position, he, by deliberate acts, prevented the knowledge of that position reaching the company. The latter, I need hardly say, is a case of deliberate and intentional deceit: in other words, it is fraud. But the very basis upon which each of these claims rests is that the company have, through his conduct, whether in making a profit or in fraudulently acting, suffered pecuniary loss. In a case where rescission is asked and it is not denied that at the time when the sale was made the seller failed, through breach of duty, to disclose his interest,

A the onus rests upon him to show, if he desires to maintain the transaction, that that interest became known to the purchaser at a subsequent period, and that the purchaser by his acts either expressly or by plain implication elected to uphold the transaction. But the case is very different when you come to charge a defendant with making undue profits in the dark at the expense of the purchaser, or with fraudulent concealment of facts which has led to loss on the part of the purchaser. The onus probandi there is upon the plaintiff; the usual rule of law must apply. I know of no case where by implication of law the duty of clearing himself from a fraud imputed rests wholly on the defendant without any obligation on the plaintiff to prove fraud.

I do not intend to enter into the facts of this case, which have been fully, and to my mind most satisfactorily, criticised by LORD HERSCHELL. I can only say that the proof in this case seems to fail at the very outset. There is no trustworthy evidence, upon which a court can act, of pecuniary loss to the company, whatever may have been the conduct or the character of the actings of this respondent Mr. Fenn. But I am bound to go further, and to say that for the imputation of fraud, which is not necessarily expressly made upon the first of the suggested grounds of action but which certainly is involved in the second, I can see no foundation whatever. While concurring in all that LORD HERSCHELL has said, I do very strongly concur in his concluding observations. It appears to me that it was not the intention of the legislature to give a right of suit under s. 165 of the Companies Act to any person who had not a pecuniary interest in the result. I think the inference of law is that the legislature always expects that there shall be an interest, and intends to confine the leave and licence which it gives to those who are possessed of it. In this case, although it appears to be otherwise upon the face of these papers, it has been explained at the Bar that the appellant is not a creditor of this company, but a creditor of another company which has a claim of indemnity against the Cape Breton Coal Co. He is a contributory, not in the sense of being liable if called upon to pay money into the coffers of the company at the instance of the liquidator, but he simply stands in the position of a possible recipient of a share in the balance of the assets after payment of the debts. There is no suggestion that any such fund will ever exist, or that that it would be called into existence by his success in that action. It is not necessary to rest the judgment upon that ground, because, on the merits of the case, I am of opinion that he has entirely failed. But, even if he had made out a case which would involve a right, I should have thought it my duty, as a member of this House, to support a judgment to the effect that he could not recover, not having an interest which would entitle him to sue.

LORD FITZGERALD.—Concurring as I do in the motion proposed by LORD HERSCHELL, and in the reasons of LORD WATSON, it will be sufficient for me to say that it appears clearly to me that the appellant here has not a particle of interest in the litigation which he has instituted, and could never possibly derive any benefit from it. The Court of Appeal, as well as PEARSON, J., in the court below, dismissed the claim of the appellant upon the ground that the company had put itself in a position in which this contract could not be rescinded. There is no doubt that Mr. Fenn, who had become a director of the Cape Breton company, was guilty of a breach of duty if he did not disclose the fact that he himself had a large pecuniary interest in the purchase by that company at the stipulated price of these three coal areas to those with whom he was dealing. But I am not by any means satisfied that that serious proposition has been made out. Moreover, there is not, to my mind, a shred of proof as to what, at the time when that purchase was made, was the real value of these three coal areas. It is true that they had been purchased some years before at a much less sum; but have we any element of proof before us upon which we can come to the conclusion at the present moment that the true value, if means had been taken to ascertain the true value, of the coal areas was not equal to the price that was later put upon them? There is no such evidence, and the inference is the other way, for you have three independent companies, converted into one by the amalgamation, agreeing by the amalgamation agreement to purchase these three coal areas at a sum not exceeding £12,000 in cash and £30,000 in shares, and you have that same company, when formed into a new company, ratifying and adopting that agreement. The inference, to my mind, would be that the price was not an unreasonable one, but, without drawing such an inference, it is only necessary to say that we have no proof that the sum stipulated for exceeded a fair and reasonable price for the coal areas at that time. For these reasons I concur in the judgment which has been announced.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I agree. When the case was first opened I was under the impression that the appellant had an interest in the result of the application apart from any question of costs, and I was also inclined to think that, although the evidence was meagre in the extreme, and the case was presented in a fragmentary and unsatisfactory manner, yet there was something which the respondent ought to be called upon to answer. But I am bound to say that, after the discussion which the case has received, and after the very able argument of counsel for the respondent, I am convinced that there is no ground for disturbing the order of the court below.

The application which has given rise to this appeal is made under s. 165 of the Companies Act, 1862. Mr. Cavendish-Bentinck, describing himself as a creditor and contributory of the company, charges Mr. Fenn with misfeasance, or breach of trust. The act complained of is the affixing the seal of the company, or causing the seal of the company to be affixed, to two agreements, by which certain coal areas in which Mr. Fenn was interested were conveyed to the company, they paying a stipulated price for those coal areas. The remedy which was asked for by the summons was payment to the official liquidator of the whole of the purchase money, or at any rate of that portion of the purchase money which went into Mr. Fenn's pocket. At your Lordships' Bar, and, as I understand it, in the court below, the remedy was put on somewhat different grounds, and it was suggested that Mr. Fenn was liable for the difference, whatever it might be, between the sum of money which was given for the property and that which the appellant called the real value of the property.

Section 165 of the Companies Act, 1862, has often come under discussion, and it has been settled, and I think rightly settled, that that section creates no new offence and gives no new rights, but that it only provides a summary and efficient remedy for rights which, apart from that section, might have been vindicated either at law or in equity. It has also been settled that the misfeasance spoken of in that section is not a misfeasance in the abstract, but a misfeasance in the nature of a breach of trust resulting in a loss to the company. Apparently it has not been hitherto judicially determined that the appellant is bound to show that he is interested in the result of the application, but I certainly think that it must be so. I cannot think that Parliament intended that a person coming under the description of a creditor, or a contributory, should take upon himself the novel position and the important functions of a public prosecutor in a matter in which he had no concern. It was, therefore, in my opinion, necessary for the appellant to show first that Mr. Fenn had committed a breach of trust, or a misfeasance in the nature of a breach of trust, as a director of the Cape Breton company; secondly, it was necessary for him to show that by reason of that misfeasance the company had sustained loss; and it was also necessary for him to show that he had an interest in the result of the application. I am of

A opinion that the appellant has failed to establish any one of those propositions. [His LORDSHIP referred to the evidence.] He has really no interest in the subject-matter of the application. I do not think that he is a creditor, and as a contributory it appears to me that it is utterly impossible, upon the facts as stated by himself, that he could ever derive any benefit from this litigation.

B I, therefore, entirely concur in the motion which has been proposed.

Appeal dismissed.

Will—Omission—Omission of gift clearly intended by testator on construction of will—Implication of intended gift—"Surviving"—Survival of one person by another—Survival of specified point of time.

Where it is clear from the language of a will that words creating an interest which the testator intended to give have been omitted, the court will imply in the will the words necessary to give effect to the intention of the testator.

The word "surviving" in a will may refer to one person surviving another, but it may also be used as surviving a specified point of time.

E. B. who should attain the age of twenty-one years. Then the testator declared that all his real estate other than the said Needingworth and Colne estates and the other moiety of his residuary personal estate should be held upon trusts in favour of Alfred Daintree, which were expressed in almost exactly the same words as those above set out, but omitting all the words in brackets, so that Alfred Daintree would in effect take no interest after he was twenty-five. The will contained some other obvious verbal inaccuracies, and also a power of maintenance of infants, commencing only after A. Daintree's death, and a power for the trustees to apply the Petition presented in an administration action.

By his will, dated Sept. 27, 1871, the testator Simon Alfred Daintree, after giving certain legacies, devised and bequeathed all his real and residuary personal estate to trustees upon trust to pay an annuity of £400 a year to his wife and an annuity of £100 to an uncle, and subject thereto upon trusts declared in the following words:

"And upon further trust, as to my Needingworth and Colne estates, and a moiety or equal half part of my residuary personal estate, to accumulate the rents and profits, income and dividends thereof, by way of compound interest, by means of any one or more of the modes of investment herein authorised, until Alfred Ernest Bagley (the son of Harriet Bagley, now or late of Eye, near Peterborough, in the county of Northampton, spinster, and which said Harriet Bagley is the daughter of James Bagley, deceased, and Mary his wife, of Eye, aforesaid) shall attain the age of twenty-five years or die, which shall first happen, in case either of such events shall happen within the period of twenty-one years from my death, but in case that period shall expire before either of such events shall happen, upon trust to pay to or permit the said Alfred Ernest Bagley, if living, to receive the income and dividends of my said Needingworth and Colne estates, and a moiety or equal half part of my residual personal estate, from the expiration of such period until he attain the age of twenty-five years or die, whichever shall first happen; and subject as aforesaid, I direct my said Needingworth and Colne estates, and a moiety or equal half part of my said residuary personal estate, shall be held in trust for the said Alfred Ernest Bagley absolutely, in case he shall attain the age of

A twenty-five years. And in case the said Alfred Ernest Bagley shall die under the age of twenty-five years leaving a son or sons him surviving, or who or any one of whom shall attain the age of twenty-one years, my said Needingworth and Colne estates and a moiety or equal half part of my said residuary personal estates shall, subject as aforesaid, be held in trust for the only or, if more than one, the first surviving son of the said Alfred Ernest Bagley who shall B attain the age of twenty-one years. And I declare that my Bluntisham estates, and all other my real estate (other than my Needingworth and Colne estates), and the remaining moiety or half part of my residuary personal estate also subject in like manner aforesaid, shall be held upon trust to accumulate the rents, profits, income, and dividends thereof by way of compound interest, by means of any one or more of the modes of investment herein authorised,
 C until Alfred Daintree, the son of my brother the said Richard Daintree, shall attain the age of twenty-five years or die, whichever shall first happen within the period of twenty-one years from my death, and in case that period shall expire before either of such events shall happen, then upon trust to pay to or permit the said Alfred Daintree, if living, to receive the income and dividends of my said estates from the expiration of such period until he attain the age
 D of twenty-five years or die, whichever shall first happen, and subject as aforesaid all my said real estates and my said residuary personal estate shall be held in trust for such only surviving son or, if more than one surviving son, for the eldest of such surviving sons absolutely, but in case the said Alfred Daintree shall leave no son him surviving, then all my said real estate and residuary personal estate shall be held in trust for, but nevertheless subject to E and on failure of the trusts hereinbefore declared concerning the same, my brother Richard Daintree, his heirs and assigns for ever."

The will further contained a bequest of £2,000 to the trustees upon trust to apply the income for the maintenance and education of the said A. E. Bagley "until he attained twenty-one, whichever should first happen," and the testator

F empowered his trustees or trustee, after the respective deaths of the said A. E. Bagley and A. Daintree during the suspense of the indefeasibly vesting of his residuary personal estate, to apply the income of such estate for the maintenance and education of the person presumptively entitled thereto, and he directed his trustees or trustee, until some person should, under the trusts of his will, become entitled to his said real estate respectively, and also during the G minority of any son of the said A. Daintree who should become entitled to his real estate, or any part thereof, out of the rents and profits of such portion thereof as might be incumbered, to keep down the interest of all charges affecting the same respectively.

The testator died on April 27, 1872, his widow died on Oct. 13, 1874, and an action was commenced for the administration of his estate on Mar. 8, 1875.
 H Alfred Ernest Bagley and Alfred Daintree, named in the will, both survived the testator, and attained the age of twenty-five years. This was a petition presented in the administration action by Alfred Daintree, his wife, and the trustees of his marriage settlement, asking for a declaration that, on attaining twenty-five, Alfred Daintree became absolutely entitled to a moiety of the testator's personal estate, and to all his real estate other than his Needingworth and Colne estates, and for
 I consequential directions.

Higgins, Q.C., and Rashleigh for the petitioners: It is clear from the whole scheme of the will that the testator, when practically dividing his property between Alfred Ernest Bagley and his nephew, Alfred Daintree, intended to provide for them both and their families in the same way. Where such an intention is clear, and the court can gather from the rest of the will what was the way in which the testator intended to carry it out, omitted words will be supplied: Re Redfern (4); Re Daniels' Settlement Trusts; Sweeting v. Prideaux (1); Greenwood v. Greenwood:

Re Northern's Estate. Here the power of maintenance and education is only given after the death of Alfred Daintree. Unless, therefore, some words are supplied, neither Alfred Daintree nor his children can get any benefit under the testator's will from the time he attains twenty-five until his death. Looking at the words of the will, no one can doubt that the two sets of trusts were intended to be the same, and that words giving A. Daintree an absolute interest on attaining twenty-five, similar to those giving an absolute interest to A. E. Bagley, were omitted.

Abraham for the infant son of Alfred Daintree.

Wilkinson for the trustees of the will.

NORTH, J.—I have formed an opinion upon the construction of the will, and the conclusion I have come to is that the will must be read as if it had contained expressly the terms which it is suggested by counsel for the petitioners it ought to contain. I come to that conclusion upon the ground that, in my opinion, I find it in the will itself—not in so many words, but according to the meaning of the words which I find there, and I decline altogether to decide this case on the ground of any mere conjecture of what the testator probably intended. It is unnecessary for me to refer to further authorities than two which have been mentioned. The first is Sweeting v. Prideaux (1), which contains a full citation of the authority to which I refer. HALL, V.-C., says (2 Ch.D. at pp. 415, 416):

“Several cases have been referred to, but the principle which will guide me is to be found in the case of Key v. Key (2), where KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., said:

‘In common with all men I must acknowledge that there are many cases upon the construction of documents in which the spirit is strong enough to overcome the letter; cases in which it is impossible for a reasonable being upon a careful perusal of an instrument not to be satisfied from its contents that a literal, a strict, or an ordinary interpretation given to particular passages would disappoint and defeat the intention with which the instrument, read as a whole, persuades and convinces him that it was framed. A man so convinced is authorised and bound to construe the writing accordingly.’

And the same principle is to be found in the case of Towns v. Wentworth (3), where the Right Hon. PEMBERTON LEIGH, afterwards LORD KINGSDOWN, said:

‘Where the main purpose and intention of the testator are ascertained to the satisfaction of the court, if particular expressions are found in the will which are inconsistent with such intention, though not sufficient to control it, or which indicate an intention which the law will not permit to take effect, such expressions must be discarded or modified; and on the other hand, if the will shows that the testator must necessarily have intended an interest to be given which there are no words in the will expressly to devise, the court is to supply the defect by implication, and thus to mould the language of the testator so as to carry into effect, so far as possible, the intention which it is of opinion that the testator has on the whole will sufficiently declared’.

Those are the principles which I conceive to be the law of the court, and upon which HALL, V.-C., acted then, and upon which I propose to act now. In addition to that, I refer to the observations of BACON, V.-C., in Re Redfern (4). Towards the end of his judgment he says, in speaking of the construction which he put upon the document in that case, into which I do not go, as it is not material now (6 Ch.D. at p. 137):

"I think, upon a reasonable construction of the words which the testator has used, the words which are suggested by the statement of claim ought to be used as if they were inserted in the will. If I were to do otherwise I should be going against the course of construction that I am to gather the meaning of the testator from the words in which he has expressed his meaning. I am not to be deterred by any accidental expression from putting the true signification on the will, and I am not to substitute what some blundering attorney's clerk or law stationer has written in this will, and treat that blunder as if it was the intention of the testator."

Before referring to the particular portions of this will which are material, I have to remark upon the will as a whole that it is very clumsily and incorrectly expressed. In the gift of £2,000 upon trust, there is a direction that the income is to be applied for the maintenance of Alfred Ernest Bagley till he attained twenty-one years "whichever shall first happen." It is quite clear there that there were two alternatives referred to and only one is mentioned. Then again in the same gift there is another point which may some day call for serious consideration. The testator gives a power to the trustees to advance certain sums in favour of Alfred, and then come these words,

"Subject, as aforesaid, the said trust fund, or so much thereof as shall not have been applied by way of advancement, shall be held upon trust for the said A. E. Bagley in case he shall attain the age of twenty-five years; but in case the said A. E. Bagley shall die under the age of twenty-five years without leaving a son him surviving who shall attain the age of twenty-one years, then the said trust fund shall sink into the residuary estate."

Those two gifts clearly do not correspond, and whatever the true construction may be, I see clearly that the will does not express in terms everything intended to be provided for. Therefore, I have two obvious blunders in the way in which the will has been framed. That being so, I approach the consideration of the will without being at all sure of finding in it what the testator intended to express, expressed in the accurate terms one would desire to find.

Look at the disposition made in this particular case. The general scheme of the will I take to be this: there are two persons whom the testator intends to provide for substantially equally. He does not divide the whole estate into moieties and give exactly half to each, but he gives certain estates to one, to Alfred Ernest and his other real estate to Alfred Daintree, and he gives each a moiety of the personal estate. He sets apart—I think, because the estates specifically given to Alfred Ernest were somewhat less than the other—a trust fund of £2,000, which he appropriates for the benefit of Alfred Ernest, though not in precisely the same words as the other gifts. It seems to me that he was doing here what was substantially dividing his property into moieties, or something like moieties, between Alfred Ernest and his nephew Alfred Daintree. That being the general scheme of the will, I find the provisions as expressed are substantially identical; but there is the omission in the case of the gifts in favour of Alfred Daintree which has led to the argument before me. Looking at the words used, we find first of all, as regards the first moiety of the real estate, as I will call it for brevity, and the first moiety of the residuary personal estate, it is to be accumulated until Alfred Ernest attains twenty-five, or dies, whichever first happens; if either of those events happen, then upon trust during the interval—the expiration of the twenty-one years and the happening of the first event—to pay to him, if living, or permit him to receive, the income of the first moiety of the real and residuary personal estate until he attains twenty-five or dies; and, subject as aforesaid, then the devise is, in case he attains twenty-five, that those estates and the moiety of the personal estate are to be held in trust for him absolutely. But, in case he dies under twenty-five, leaving a son or sons him surviving, who or any one of whom shall attain twenty-one then the same estates are given in trust for the only, and, if more than one, the first surviving son of Alfred Ernest who shall attain twenty-one. That is the complete disposition made down to that time of the first moiety of the real and personal estate. It is not exhaustive. It does not provide for every event which could possibly happen, but it deals with the case of either Alfred Ernest taking absolutely by attaining twenty-five or his son taking absolutely if Alfred Ernest dies under twenty-five leaving a son who attains twenty-one. In case Alfred Ernest died under twenty-five without leaving any son who attained twenty-one, there is not as yet any disposition of those estates. A B

Then the testator takes up the rest of the real estate, and the rest of the personal estate; and he gives that in words which correspond. There are one or two very slight differences, but they correspond substantially with the previous gift of the first moiety of each in favour of Alfred Ernest. The gift of the second moiety is to accumulate till Alfred Daintree, the nephew, attains twenty-five, or dies, whichever first happens. If that period expires before either of those events shall happen, then to pay Alfred Daintree till he attains twenty-one all the income, and subject as aforesaid (and now we reach the point at which there is the serious divergence in terms from what is found in the first gift), "all my said real estates and my said residuary personal estate shall be held," not for Albert Daintree absolutely if he attains twenty-five, or, if he dies under twenty-five leaving a son who attains twenty-one for that son; but C D

"for such only surviving son, or, if more than one surviving son, for the eldest of such surviving sons absolutely." E

Then we come to a full stop. Pausing there we have got an absolute entire and final gift, if there is a person who takes under it. But at that point it is impossible to attach any meaning to the will. There is nothing from which one can say who such only surviving son, or if more than one surviving son, the eldest of such surviving sons is. There is nothing to which the word "such" can be referred. In my opinion, the word "such," as used there, clearly points to something having been omitted, or something being wanting before to which that word is intended to refer. F

Then we have also the word "surviving." That word may be used either as surviving a particular person, or as surviving a specified point of time, e.g., the time at which the person referred to, or someone else, attains the age of twenty-one. Therefore, the word "survive" does not seem to me in itself as strong as the word "such." But, in the next line, the gift over to Richard Daintree is, "in case Alfred shall leave no son him surviving." Looking at the whole passage it seems to me that the word "survive" can only have one meaning throughout, and "such only surviving son" must mean such son of Alfred Daintree as shall survive him. That being so, we have not only the word "such," but the word "survive" referring to something which has gone before, while there is nothing in the will to which either can refer. It seems to me clear from these words that something is omitted, and the first branch of the subject one has to consider, namely, whether there is any omission or not, is answered by saying that these words of reference clearly show something is omitted. Then the question is: What is omitted? I do not say that is all in the will which shows something is omitted, because there are other passages which point the same way. On this point it is convenient to consider the question what is omitted. The gift over is in case Alfred Daintree shall leave no son him surviving. Then the estates (real and personal estate) are to be held in trust for Richard. I do not think it necessary to consider at present whether that refers to the whole estate or the last-mentioned moiety of the estate. For present purposes it seems to me that, if it is held to be the whole estate, and not the last-mentioned G H I

A moiety only, and that consequently the words "all my said real estate and my residuary personal estate" mean the whole also, there is nothing inconsistent in that with the construction I put upon the will. There is the gift over in case Alfred Daintree leaves no son surviving him; it is clear, therefore, that the gift over is not to take effect until after Alfred's death. Why is it not to take effect until after that time? Who is to take it in the meantime? Either it must go to whoever is meant by the phrase "a surviving son of Alfred," or there must be an intestacy. In my opinion, it would not go to the person meant by the words "surviving son," and there would be an intestacy. That fact is a reason, not a conclusive reason by any means, but a reason why, if it can be reasonably avoided, one should not put that construction upon the will. The fact that the estate is only given over in favour of Richard in case no son of Alfred is left surviving at his death seems to me to point very strongly to the gift being postponed in order to give Alfred some interest before Richard can take anything. Then the question is: What interest? and as far as the gift over at the time of Alfred's death throws a light upon it, it would not be necessary to say that what he took by implication was more than a life estate.

I think there are two other passages which seem to me very important. There is a provision giving the trustees a power of maintenance and education. Here again there is a provision in favour of the person who was to take after Alfred's death postponed until the death of Alfred, and here again it is very hard to believe that that can be done for any reason excepting for the purpose of giving Alfred a previous interest. Again, this does not show conclusively whether it need be more than an estate for his life, or what the extent of Alfred Daintree's immediate interest is to be; but it does show very strongly that he was to take something, and is deemed to have taken something under the will, and that the provision is only made for the maintenance of his son after his death because he himself was intended to take in the meantime. That I say would leave it open to question whether the interest Alfred took was a life estate or some other estate. But then we go to the final words which seem to me conclusive in the matter. In considering what the words which are introduced ought to be, the mere fact that the testator has given one moiety of the estate in favour of one person is not conclusive to show that he meant to give the other moiety in favour of another person in the same way. But looking at the similarity of the clauses throughout in every respect except in the omission of these words, we would expect to find the same limitation as to the second moiety as one finds with respect to the first. Whether that would be enough to act upon would certainly be open to question, but I think that is a circumstance not to be overlooked.

Looking at the clause now before me, it seems to me conclusive to show that the testator considered there were certain events contemplated by him and referred to in his will, in which Alfred Daintree on attaining twenty-five would take an absolute indefeasible interest. He says:

"I direct my trustees, until some person shall under the trusts of my will become absolutely and indefeasibly entitled to my said real estates respectively, and also during the minority of any son of Alfred who shall become entitled to my said real estate or any part thereof . . . to pay the rents and income as therein mentioned,"

I and interest and charges are to be kept down. The only persons whom he could contemplate as taking any interest in the second moiety are, first of all, Alfred Daintree, the nephew; after him any son of the nephew, any great-nephew who might attain twenty-one; and, thirdly, if neither of those two persons take, then the only person contemplated as taking is Richard. Therefore, the nephew takes some interest first, the great-nephew second, and Richard the third. The testator first of all provides for what, in my opinion, is the first of those persons, namely, Alfred Daintree. He says, interest is to be payable "until some person shall under the trusts of my will become absolutely and indefeasibly entitled to my real estate." In my opinion, as regards this moiety, he there referred to Alfred Daintree and nobody else. It is said he might have referred also to the persons who took second and third. In my opinion, he clearly did not refer to the person who took second, because he immediately afterwards goes on to provide for him in the words, "and also during the minority of any son of Alfred Daintree."

Therefore the first alternative does not deal with the case of the son of Alfred. In my opinion, it does not deal with Richard Daintree either, because there was nothing whatever to postpone the absolute and indefeasible vesting of Richard's share at all if the other two persons were out of the way. It seems to me, therefore, that under this clause he clearly is dealing with the payment of interest, first of all until, as regards this moiety, Alfred attains twenty-five. If he attains twenty-five he contemplates he will be absolutely and indefeasibly entitled. If, on the other hand, he does not attain such interest, but dies under that age leaving a son, then the second part of the clause provides for payment of interest during that time. In case they both disappear, then Richard comes in and takes absolutely; his share is finally vested, and there is nothing whatever for this clause to apply to. The clause appears to me to point out to demonstration that Alfred was in a given event to take an interest under the will, and that in the given event of his attaining twenty-five, what was intended was that he should take absolutely. Looking, therefore, to the whole will, I come to the conclusion that the words which it is said are omitted by mistake are in reality to be gathered from the terms of the will as expressed.

Water Supply—Duties and liabilities of undertakers—Duty to provide supply of pure and wholesome water—Water in mains pure and wholesome—Contamination in consumer's service pipes.

By the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, s. 35, it was provided: "The undertakers shall provide and keep in the pipes to be laid down by them a supply of pure and wholesome water sufficient for the domestic use of all the inhabitants of the town or district within the limits of the special Act. . . ." Water undertakers supplied to the plaintiff water which, while in their mains, was pure and wholesome, but, while passing through lead service pipes, the property of the plaintiff, connecting the mains with the plaintiff's house, became contaminated with lead, with the result that the plaintiff contracted lead poisoning. In an action by the plaintiff against the undertakers for damages for breach of their statutory duty,

Held: the "pipes" mentioned in s. 35 were the undertakers' mains and did not include the plaintiff's service pipes; the duty imposed by the section on the undertakers was to take all reasonable care to ensure that the water in those mains was pure and wholesome; in the circumstances they had discharged that obligation; and, therefore, the plaintiff's action failed.

Notes. The Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, was repealed by the Water Act, 1945 (see Sched. 5). The duty of undertakers to provide a water supply to houses and schools is now to be found in s. 111 of the Public Health Act, 1936, as substituted by s. 28 of the Water Act, 1945: see particularly para. (b) of the substituted s. 111 (1).

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

July 16, 1886. The following opinions were read.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE.—After the first argument of this important, and, to my mind, difficult, case, I had formed an opinion different from that which is, I believe, entertained by a majority of those who heard the second argument. But I thought it desirable that the case should be further argued before a greater number of your Lordships, and I am very glad that this has been done. Four very learned judges had concurred in the view taken by both the courts below; and the questions raised might concern, on the one hand, all consumers of water supplied in the usual way by public bodies to inhabitants of large towns where lead pipes are used and the water may be of a quality likely to take up lead, and, on the other hand, all the public bodies supplying such water. It is not often that it can be matter of satisfaction to a judge that a case should be determined against his opinion; but, in the present case, I should not have wished my opinion to prevail against so considerable a preponderance of judicial authority. I nevertheless think it my duty (especially as the subject is one which may deserve and receive attention from the legislature) to state the view which I have taken, and which (if it depended on my judgment) I should still take of this case; but I do not consider it necessary to do so in that detail or with that particular examination of all the clauses of the Acts of Parliament and other documents, or of the state of the evidence, which might under other circumstances have been proper. A

By the general Waterworks Clauses Acts, and the special Act relating to Huddersfield, the respondents, being undertakers for the supply of the town of Huddersfield with water, are bound (on certain conditions) to cause pipes to be laid down and water to be brought to every part of the town, and to provide and keep in the pipes to be laid down by them—that is, as I agree, in their mains—B “a supply of pure and wholesome water, sufficient for the domestic use of all the inhabitants,” and to furnish to every inhabitant demanding it on the terms of the Act “a sufficient supply of water for his domestic purposes.” For this they are to receive payment; and if their surveyor or officer of health reports any house within the borough to be without a proper supply of water they may compel the owner to take and pay for such a supply. C
The cause of action stated in his pleadings by the appellant against the respondents was that the water supplied to him [from the Blackmoorfoot reservoir] was “impure and unwholesome,” “contaminated with deleterious substances,” which in his particulars he explained to be “lead, or some poisonous compounds of lead and acids, which acted upon the surface of the lead pipes through which the water was conveyed to him” and rendered the water “unfit for drinking and other domestic uses,” and that his health had suffered thereby. D
That his health did suffer, and that seriously, by lead poisoning through the use of the water supplied to him by the respondents from their Blackmoorfoot reservoir was not contested; and the jury at the trial found £2,000 as the proper amount of damages, if he was entitled to damages at all.

Some embarrassment has arisen out of the manner in which the questions of fact were withdrawn from the jury; but (except on one point which the plaintiff's counsel treated as immaterial, waiving his right to have the opinion of the jury taken upon it) it must have been the intention and understanding of both parties that the court, when deciding the questions of law, should also look at the whole evidence in order to see upon what state of facts those questions arose. E
The only substantial difference, as it appears to me, between the witnesses for the plaintiff and those for the defendants was as to the exact chemical cause of effects which were really not in dispute, and particularly as to the exact chemical operation of the sulphuric acid, which was proved, beyond controversy, to be present in the water as supplied by the defendants. F
The question treated as immaterial, and, therefore, withdrawn from the jury by the plaintiff's counsel, was this only—not whether there was or was not present in the water supplied by the defendants some peculiar and special solvent of lead, but whether it was or was not of the particular nature and character deposed to by the plaintiff's witnesses. C
It is, perhaps, to be regretted that this latter question should not have been put to the jury, because there appears to be, even among your Lordships, some difference of opinion about it, and it was certainly a question not of law, but of fact. I cannot, for my part, regard the plaintiff's counsel as having done anything at the trial at all equivalent to an admission that there was no such special or peculiar solvent of lead in the water as brought from the reservoir into the respondents' mains; and, feeling obliged to consider for myself what is the true result of the evidence on that point, I do not hesitate to say that I take it to be one of the facts of the case which were (to my mind without much, if any, controversy) made out at the trial. D
If there had been no mixture of any foreign or adventitious matter whatever in the water, making its effects upon lead different from those which would necessarily and always be produced by rain water or other quite pure soft water, the case would be different. I do not believe that in that case the plaintiff and others who suffered in like manner would have been poisoned.

But there seems to me to be clear, and indeed uncontradicted, evidence (i) that, although all soft waters do for a time take up some lead, they do not all take it up to an extent or in a manner which is noxious to health in the way in which the water drunk by the plaintiff is proved to have been; (ii) that they usually

(and especially when they contain some proportion of sulphuric acid added to pure water) produce a protective coating in the interior of lead pipes, which in this case was not produced; (iii) that in this case the quantity of lead taken up and held in solution went on continually increasing so as to become more and more dangerous, which would not have happened in the same way without the presence in the water of some peculiar and unusually powerful solvent of lead; and (iv) that although the persons proved to have actually suffered as the plaintiff did were but few out of a large population (lead being what is called an "elective" poison, and not affecting all persons alike), they were sufficient to prove the existence in the water of some special and increasingly noxious quality. Nor can I regard as unimportant the uncontradicted evidence of the report, made to the respondents some time before the plaintiff began to suffer, by their own public analyst, that the water supplied, under similar natural conditions, from another of their reservoirs (Deerhill) had in 1880 got into such a condition as to make its continued use dangerous, which was not yet (at that time) the case with the Blackmoorfoot reservoir, and that in the analyst's opinion the Blackmoorfoot water also would be liable eventually to get into the same condition unless certain ochrey springs and coalpit waters were kept out of it, which was not done.

I have thought it necessary to state at the outset my view of these facts, because the questions in the case are two: the first one of law: What was the statutory obligation of the respondents in respect of the supply of water to the inhabitants of Huddersfield; the second one of the fact: Whether the statutory obligation was duly performed? Upon the question of law I cannot for a moment doubt that the object with which the general and special Acts were passed ought throughout to be borne in mind. That object was that the consumers should be supplied with water—a prime necessity of life—for drinking, not indeed the only purpose, but a primary one, which must be and which alone need be here regarded. To be fit for drinking, the water must be wholesome and not poisonous to those who drink it. It is a paradox little short of absurdity to suppose that water not fulfilling that condition could be such as the legislature intended to be supplied. Next, it appears plainly from many provisions of the Acts (even if it were not self-evident) that the legislature contemplated the introduction and supply of water into the houses of the consumers by the usual and indeed necessary means—that is, by mains bringing the water into the streets from the sources of supply by communication pipes conducting it from those mains into the consumers' houses, and by service pipes carrying it to those places within each house from which it was ultimately to be drawn. The water to be drunk must pass through all those means of supply before it could practically reach any consumer. Whatever could not so reach him without becoming poisonous could not safely be drunk, and would, therefore, not fulfil the primary objects for which the whole supply was required.

I Whatever else the legislature may have intended, it certainly did not intend the water to be drunk directly out of the undertakers' mains; and when the obligation was imposed upon them to keep in their mains "a supply of pure and wholesome water sufficient for the domestic use of all the inhabitants," and to give to every inhabitant demanding and paying for it "a sufficient supply of water for his domestic purposes," I cannot think it reasonable to understand this in any abstract unpractical sense irrelevant to the consumer and independent of the proper means and necessary conditions of his consumption. If the legislature had expressly required all communication and service pipes to be of lead, it is inconceivable to me that the fitness of the water for drinking while in the undertakers' mains (from which it never could or would be drunk) could have been held to satisfy the respondents' obligation if it were unfit to pass through lead and to be afterwards drunk; by reason of the presence in it of a special solvent of lead, although that solvent might be absolutely inoperative and innoxious to any one who might drink the water before it came in contact with lead. It is true that this is a case of statutory obligation, not properly of contract; although LORD ELDON and other great judges regarded Acts of Parliament of this class, giving powers to promoters or undertakers who solicit them and are to receive remuneration in money for what under these powers they supply, as Parliamentary contracts with the public, or at least with that portion of the public which might be directly interested in them. But I fail to see why it should be less necessary or reasonable (unless the words of the statutes exclude it) to regard the fitness of the things supplied for the purpose of the statutory obligation as an element of that obligation itself than it is to do so when the obligation results properly from contract. I can, indeed, conceive a possible, though most improbable case, in which the legislature might have absolved the undertakers from all responsibility for the quality of the water supplied by them; not only authorising them (as here) to collect the springs within a certain area for the purposes of the supply, but requiring or authorising them to supply those particular waters in their actual state and condition, as they might be collected in certain reservoirs, without any obligation either to reject or to find the means of purifying them, if they should become contaminated with adventitious matter rendering them unfit for their intended purpose. In that case, however improvident such legislation might be, the consumer would have to take care of himself as best he could; the undertakers would have a statutory indemnity, whatever might happen.

But it seems to me that there is no ground for so construing those Acts of Parliament with which we have here to deal. Another case might have been possible; and, indeed, unless I misunderstand the opinions from which I differ, the learned judges in the Court of Appeal, and some of your Lordships also, think that the present is really such a case. A clear line of separation might have been drawn between the works of the undertakers, beginning with their conduits and reservoirs, and ending in their mains; and everything else—the choice of material for the communication and service pipes, and the whole system and means of supply from the mains to the consumer's premises—might have been placed entirely within the power and under the control of the consumer, at his sole risk, and on his sole responsibility. In that case, I should have agreed that, if the water was pure and wholesome at the point where all the duties, powers, and responsibilities of the undertakers terminated, the consumer, and not the undertakers, might be solely answerable for whatever might afterwards happen to it while passing through pipes constructed at his own option, and in his own way, of a material chosen by himself.

I cannot agree with those who think that your Lordships have here to deal with anything like that state of things, and the reason why you have not is obvious. It would be quite inconsistent with the interest of the undertakers, and would place in great hazard the profits of their undertaking, if the powers of interference and control were to terminate at the mains. The hypothesis is an unreal one, inconsistent with the nature and the indispensable conditions of such an undertaking. It is of very little importance, in my judgment, to this question, that the legal property in the communication and service pipes may be (as, indeed, I think it is) in the consumer, after he has paid for them, unless he was free to determine for himself of what material they should be made, and to exercise, both when they were laid down and afterwards, the substantial control over them, independent of the undertakers; and this (as I read and understood the Acts and the byelaws made by the respondents) he was not. Under the general Act of 1847 the communication pipes might, indeed, be laid down by the consumer, but they were to be of a strength and material approved by the undertakers, and to be laid down under the superintendence of their officers, with an appeal, in case of difference, to justices. Such restricted powers differ widely from that freedom which may involve sole responsibility.

By s. 19 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1863, these restrictions were largely extended. Every consumer was prohibited, under penalties, from affixing, or

A causing or permitting to be affixed, any pipe or apparatus to a pipe belonging to the undertakers, or to a communication or service pipe belonging to the consumer, and from making any alteration in any such communication or service pipe, or in any apparatus connected therewith, "without the consent in every such case, of the undertakers." By the special Act for Huddersfield, absolute B power was given to the respondents to make byelaws, directing the use, and prescribing the size, nature, strength, and materials, and the mode of arrangement, alteration, and repair of (among other things) all the consumer's pipes.
The respondents exercised that power by prescribing lead as the necessary material for every consumer's pipe, "not being of cast iron." That a practical option was given to the consumer to use cast iron for all his pipes does not appear to me to be the true effect of this byelaw, having regard to the immediately C antecedent context; but on this I do not dwell, because the respondents, by another byelaw, took upon themselves (as under s. 70 of their special Act they certainly might, with the consumer's assent) the office of providing and executing, in all cases, the whole service pipes and works for the supply of water from the mains into the houses of the consumers; and they also reserved to themselves D the sole and exclusive control and management over the "connecting pipes and works from the street main to the consumer's premises." All the leaden communication and service pipes were in the present case (and, as I recollect, from the evidence, in Huddersfield generally), laid down by the respondents themselves under these byelaws, pursuant to written applications founded upon them, which were signed by the consumers.

E I cannot be persuaded, under these circumstances, that any such line has been drawn by the legislature between that part of the means of supply which ends in the mains belonging to the respondents and that which is continued from those mains into the consumer's house by pipes, of which the legal property is in the consumer, as to throw upon the consumer the sole responsibility for all contamination which may occur in those pipes by reason of the action of anything F contained in the water upon the material of which they are composed. I cannot be persuaded that the statutory obligation of the respondents is fulfilled if they deliver from their mains into those pipes water containing foreign or adventitious matter (whatever may be its exact nature, or the exact chemical conditions under which it has such a noxious effect) which, in passing through those pipes, will cause the water to take up lead, and so become poisonous, in a way G which otherwise would not have happened, although the water containing that matter might have been absolutely innocuous, if it could have been drunk from the mains without passing through lead.

Taking this view, I should have arrived at a conclusion in the appellant's favour, not on the ground of negligence (as to which no question was open upon the pleadings), but on that of non-fulfilment of the statutory obligation. Not only H was no question of negligence raised, but I think it right to say that I am unable to see how it could possibly have been raised (consistently with the views of the statutory obligation on which I understand the opinions from which I differ to be founded), even if the potency of the special solvent of lead contained in this water (continuing to be innocuous until brought into contact with lead) had increased and accumulated to such a degree as to poison the whole population I of Huddersfield. This, happily (as lead is an "elective" poison, and as the respondents may be expected to use the best means in their power to counteract the mischief, whether legally obliged to do so or not, and I am not convinced that no such means are possible), is not likely to happen; but, if it did happen, the logical result of the views from which I differ seems to me to be that the legislature only would be to blame. Although I do not myself think so, I recognise, as I have already said, the weight of the authority opposed to my opinion, in accordance with which your Lordships' judgment will now settle the law.

LORD BLACKBURN.—This case was heard before the House, consisting on A that occasion of the EARL OF SELBORNE, LORD WATSON, and LORD FITZGERALD, and those noble and learned Lords, when considering the case, did not altogether agree in their views, and it was, therefore, directed that there should be a second argument. I have had the advantage, besides hearing the second argument, of being furnished with opinions of the EARL OF SELBORNE and LORD WATSON, printed confidentially, and circulated while the case was under con- B sideration after the former argument.

Since the conclusion of this argument, I have read again these opinions with great care. I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of MATHEW, J., which has been affirmed by the Court of Appeal, ought to be affirmed. But I feel that it is a hard case that the appellant should, without any fault even imputed to him, suffer a damage so great without redress. And I also feel that not only C the inhabitants of Huddersfield, but also the inhabitants of many other districts who are supplied with water from such sources as produce what is commonly called "soft" water may be in a similar position. There was evidence which, I think, would have justified the conclusion that the quantity of lead which could be taken up by this water from so short a length of lead pipe as that which led from the mains to the tap which supplied the appellant with drinking water would D not have produced any noxious effect on most people. The appellant's family, consisting of his wife and servants and six children, the eldest of whom was ten years old, all drank it with impunity. I do not think it would have been a fatal objection to his right to recover, if in other respects made out, that he was a person of a very peculiar constitution, and that none but persons of that very peculiar constitution would suffer. But it was also proved that other persons had suffered E from the same water passing through similar lead pipes. The general mischief from the use of lead pipes is much less serious if the percentage of those who suffer from it is small. It may be important to ascertain how that is on some other occasion, but no question as to that was raised in this case.

I take it to be a matter of general knowledge that water collected from the fall of rain on a particular district derives its character from the nature of the strata F over which it flows when collected on the surface or through which it filters when flowing out in springs, which are generally in the superficial strata. There are sometimes springs so deep-seated as to derive their character from other strata. To take an extreme instance, no one, I think, can doubt that the hot mineral waters at Bath derive their peculiar qualities, which certainly render them very unfit for domestic use, from passing through deep-seated strata very different G from those adjoining Bath. I have no doubt that those hot springs are ultimately fed by rain which has fallen somewhere and filtered down into those hot strata; but I think it probable that the rainfall which feeds them has fallen at a distance, and has been filtering far, perhaps for hundreds of miles, and for a long time, perhaps for years, before it comes to the surface at Bath. But there is no evidence H here of there being any such deep-seated springs in this district. I think that the evidence shows that the Blackmoorfoot district is one of those, the water collected from which is what is commonly called soft, the nature of the strata with which it comes in contact being such as to contain but little of those minerals, the absorption of which gives water the character of "hardness." There is, however, in the district found some iron pyrites—an ore of sulphur and iron, which, I when exposed to air and water, undergoes a chemical change, resulting in the production of sulphuric acid. And the evidence is that there was some (not very much) sulphuric acid in the water collected in the Blackmoorfoot reservoir. I do not think we need embarrass ourselves by thinking of the other reservoirs, for the water from the drinking of which the appellant has suffered came exclusively from Blackmoorfoot reservoir. I think it must, for the purposes of this case, be considered as established that the water as brought down to and in the mains was soft water, with some sulphuric acid in it—excellent in that state for drinking. I

A But I think it must also be considered as established that this water was such as, when brought in contact with lead, was capable of dissolving it, and producing some salt of lead, which, if taken in sufficient quantity for a sufficient length of time, is noxious.

B HIS LORDSHIP referred to the expert evidence given at the trial, and continued : I think that the question, what remedy there is, must depend on the true construction of the Act in each case. It may well be that, on the true construction of one Act, it would appear that the legislature intended to allow the use of water of such a degree of softness as will produce some injurious corrosion of lead pipes, and to allow it to be supplied through lead pipes, thinking that the quantity of lead taken up would be so small that, though it might injure a few persons, it was better on the balance that this should be, rather than that the district should be C deprived of water altogether, or put to the expense and inconvenience which would be caused by preventing the use of lead pipes, which are certainly very generally used; and yet that may not be the intention appearing on the construction of another Act.

D The Act in the present case is the Huddersfield Water Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict., c. cx). It provides that the corporation of Huddersfield may take over the old waterworks erected by commissioners under a private Act of 1827 (7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. lxxxiv). With those waterworks we are not in the present case concerned. But the Act also provides for getting a further supply of water and making a further reservoir, and, when that supply is obtained, enlarging the districts within which the corporation may supply water. The appellant's house is in that new district. The Act of 1869 incorporates the Waterworks Clauses Acts, 1847 and E 1863, except the provisions with respect to the amount of profit to be received by the undertakers when the waterworks are carried on for their own profit. Section 17 of the Act of 1869 defines the district from which the new supply is to be derived. The reservoir from which the water is brought down to the main to which the service pipes supplying the appellant's house is attached is Blackmoor-foot, and with that only are your Lordships now concerned.

F It was, not very strongly, argued that the undertakers were in the position of persons selling water to the inhabitants of the district, and, therefore, that they were under an obligation to supply water fit to be used in lead supply pipes, that being the ordinary mode in which water is used. But I think that the duty imposed on the corporation does not extend so far. It may be that it imposes on G them a duty to take all reasonable care and skill, and, if there had been a claim for damages on the ground that they had been guilty of neglect of that duty, it would have been necessary to consider this. The judge, in the exercise of his very wide powers of amendment, might have allowed an amendment raising this question; but after the objection of the defendants' counsel that he was not prepared with evidence to meet such a case, he would not have made such an H amendment, except on the terms that the trial should be postponed, and he was not asked to make it. I do not think this a mere technical objection. Both MATHEW, J., on further consideration, and the Court of Appeal, treated the case as if it depended exclusively on the Act, and, viewing it in that light, held, I think correctly, that the only absolute duty imposed on the corporation was to provide and keep, in the pipes to be laid down by them, which I think is I rectly construed as the mains, "a supply of pure and wholesome water sufficient for the domestic use" of the inhabitants. The supply kept in the mains was pure and wholesome, if it was taken as it there was.

The only doubt I have had as to this is whether (as it was known that the supply pipes were likely to be made to some extent of lead, and after the making of the byelaws it was known that they would certainly be made of lead) the water which, when passed through the lead pipes, would take up some poisonous salts of lead can properly be said to be "pure and wholesome." I think, however, it was so, and that the fault, if there was any, was in having lead pipes at all. Section 66 of the Act of 1869 empowers the corporation, for the purpose of preventing waste, misuse, undue consumption, or contamination of the water, to make bye-laws. Under these actually made, they deprive the inhabitant, at whose expense they do the actual plumber's work, of all discretion as to the materials of which his service pipes are to be made. They prescribe that they shall be lead. I do not see that there is any reason to think that, if the discretion had been left to the inhabitants, there would have been any difference in the mode in or the material of which these service pipes would have been constructed. Even now the only change which can be suggested is that the half-inch pipe of the length of thirty-eight feet might be made of iron, which would no doubt diminish the chance of mischief by diminishing the quantity of lead. But while lead is the material from which internal service pipes are made, that would only diminish it. I do not know what hope there may be of cheapening the cost of production of aluminium, or in some other way giving the consumers a practical mode of getting service pipes of a material as tough and flexible as lead, and not having this dangerous quality of poisoning water, or at least soft water when not so devoid of oxygen as to be exceedingly insipid. If there is such a discovery ever made, the byelaw which stands in the way of the use of it may be repealed. But now I am not able to see in what way any claim can be made against the corporation on account of these byelaws. I do not say none can, but I certainly think none has been made. And I think that, till such a claim is made in such a way as to give the corporation an opportunity to answer it, your Lordships cannot decide it.

LORD WATSON.—I concur in the opinion delivered by the EARL OF SELBORNE.

LORD BRAMWELL.—I am of opinion that this judgment should be affirmed. The plaintiff's charge in his statement of claim is that he, being entitled to a supply of pure and wholesome water from the defendants, they supplied him with water not pure and wholesome, but which was contaminated with deleterious ingredients. This complaint is not only unproved, but the contrary is proved. The supply of the defendants is from the main to the service pipes of the plaintiff. The water supplied at the point of supply was pure and wholesome, with no deleterious, foreign, or adventitious ingredient. In its passage along the plaintiff's service pipes it became otherwise. It is impossible to say that water is pure and wholesome, and free from deleterious ingredients if passed through iron pipes, but not if passed through lead pipes. The pipe is bad, but the water good. The plaintiff, therefore, has failed to make out his case. It was asked what would be the result if, under their powers of compelling persons to take a supply of water, the defendant corporation supplied it through service pipes of lead, with the injurious consequences that have followed in the plaintiff's case. I decline to give an opinion on this till I hear the case, and will content myself with saying that, if the defendants would be liable, it would be precisely for the reason which does not exist here—viz., that the water they supplied was not pure and wholesome. I will only add that, in the case put, they are not bound, only entitled, to force a supply.

This opinion is a short one. If that is a defect, I can only say I am sorry, for I cannot remedy it. I do not know which of the matters I affirm is denied. There is no doubt that, to recover, the plaintiff must prove the presence of deleterious matter in the water supplied. I can see no evidence that the water in the main had deleterious matter in it. The scientific witnesses seem to be, or to have been, in a state of some uncertainty as to the effect of pure water upon lead; or rather, perhaps, they seem to have once thought, but to have changed their opinion, that pure water did indeed corrode lead, but not so as to hold lead in solution. But I repeat, whatever may have been or may be their opinion or that of any of them on this, I cannot see any evidence that there were deleterious ingredients in the

A water in the mains. It is true that the water was not to be drunk there, but in the houses of the consumers. It was, however, to be conveyed to those houses in the pipes of those consumers. It was in them in the course of that conveyance, and by them that the water was made unwholesome. If, indeed, the defendants, having notice that lead pipes were unfit to convey such water, insisted on the consumer using no other, it may be that there would be a refusal to supply, and so B a cause of action. But that is not the cause of action here.

I repeat, first, the complaint is that the water supplied contained deleterious ingredients; secondly, the water was supplied to the plaintiff's pipes; and, thirdly, at the point of supply it contained no deleterious ingredient. I decline to consider any question of negligence or misfeasance in the use of lead pipes. No such C case is before us. So, also, I decline to consider what would be the result if the legislature had directed that lead pipes should be used, merely observing that if the water and the pipes were fixed by the statute it might plausibly be contended that the "pure and wholesome" supply meant as pure and wholesome as, under such circumstances, it could be. Therefore, in my opinion, the plaintiff fails.
It may be said this is deciding the case on technical grounds. WILLES, J., said that law without technicality was impossible. I content myself with saying that, D as long as our law says that a plaintiff to succeed must do so on the allegata et probata, the decision must be governed by them, and them alone.

LORD FITZGERALD.—Before reaching the conclusion at which I have finally arrived, I thought it essential to examine the pleadings and ascertain the exact issue. The action was preceded by a notice, the substance of which was that the E mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Huddersfield supplied, sold, and delivered to the said John Jessop Milnes certain water, which, according to the provisions of the Huddersfield Water Act, 1869, they were bound and required to supply of a pure and wholesome nature, and sufficient for his domestic use, whereas the same water was not of such pure and wholesome nature, but contained lead, free acid, and other substances likely to injure the health of the said John Jessop Milnes.
F Nothing now turns on the word "sold." The paragraph of the statement of claim which alleged a sale was struck out by amendment. The notice it will, however, be observed rests entirely on s. 35 of the general Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, and on the duty or obligation created by that section.

The statement of claim alleges, in conformity with that notice, that the G plaintiff

"was entitled as such inhabitant, by virtue of the said statutes, to demand and have a supply from the defendants of pure and wholesome water sufficient for his domestic use. In or about March, 1875, the defendants laid down their water mains near the plaintiff's house, and for reward then paid to them by the plaintiff put down leaden service pipes to conduct the water to the H plaintiff's said house, and connected such pipes with their said mains. From the time of making such connection of the said pipes with their mains, the defendants have for reward continuously supplied the plaintiff with water from such mains through the said service pipes for his domestic use. In or about August, 1881, and for many years previously thereto, the water which the defendants thus supplied to the plaintiff was impure and unwholesome.
I It was contaminated with deleterious substances. It has from that time been, from time to time or continuously, impure and unwholesome, and contaminated as above stated."

The statement of claim further alleges that

"the deleterious substances with which the said water as supplied by the defendants to the plaintiff was contaminated [were] lead or some poisonous compounds of lead and acids which acted upon the surface of the lead pipes through which the water was conveyed to the plaintiff."

The statement of defence is in substance :

“The defendants admit that, in or about October, 1874, they laid down their water mains near the said house now occupied by the plaintiff. The defendants put down leaden service pipes to conduct the water to the said house at the request of and for reward then paid to them by the plaintiff’s landlord, or other his predecessor in title. The said service pipes so put down were forthwith connected with their said mains. The defendants have continuously supplied the said house with water from the said mains through the said service pipes since October, 1874, and have thus supplied the plaintiff since he became an inhabitant as aforesaid. The water so supplied by the defendants to the plaintiff was pure and wholesome water, and was supplied in its natural condition, uncontaminated and pure, just as derived from the springs and sources authorised by the said special Acts in that behalf.”

And on that defence the plaintiff joined issue.

It will be perceived that the matter which the plaintiff undertook to establish was that the defendants, in violation of their duty under s. 35 of the Act of 1847,

“supplied the plaintiff with water from such mains through the service pipes which was impure, being contaminated with deleterious substances.”

The requisition on which the water was supplied to the plaintiff’s premises was as follows :

“To the corporation of the borough of Huddersfield, Oct. 19, 1874, Gentlemen,—Please supply with water the under-mentioned property in accordance with your rules and regulations. Description and situation of property : 1, House, Grove-place, Dalton, occupied by J. J. Milnes. I hereby agree to pay for the pipe to supply water in accordance with the above description.—I am, gentlemen, yours respectfully, WILLIAM MARSDEN.”

I understand by “the pipe,” the 39 feet of $\frac{1}{2}$ -inch pipe from the defendants’ main to the plaintiff’s premises, to which at a subsequent period 53 feet of $\frac{3}{8}$ -inch pipe was added at the plaintiff’s request, to conduct the water to a tap at the rear. In the view which I take of this case, it is not necessary for me to examine minutely or to criticise the evidence of the professional experts which, as was to be anticipated, exhibits considerable divergences of opinion. There is a statement in the appellant’s case that “it was admitted at the trial that the water supplied to the appellant was wholesome if drunk at the mains,” and MATHEW, J., in his judgment states, and no doubt with entire correctness, that it was not contended that there had been any want of care or skill on the part of the defendants or their agents, and it was admitted that the water, while in the mains from which the plaintiff’s supply was taken, was pure and wholesome, and in its natural condition as it was drawn from the sources specified in the Act of 1869. It was further admitted that the material used for the service pipes was that which was best adapted for the purpose, and that it had been used with perfect safety for the supply of a great number of large towns.

At the close of the trial, after some skirmishing as to whether some and what questions should be sent for the decision of the jury as to the alleged impurity of the water, and whether or not it was due to sulphuric acid, the judge finally says : “The only question as it seems to me for the jury, is the question of the amount of damages.” Counsel for the plaintiff : “I think so. I think the specific nature of the impurity, if I am right in the general result of the evidence, is proved.” MATHEW, J. : “That this water became unwholesome on being delivered from the service pipe, and the defendants are responsible for the delivery from the service pipe—that is your position.” Counsel : “Yes; I think the particular cause seems to be immaterial. That has been my view throughout.” Damages were thereupon assessed by the jury, all questions being reserved for argument.

The practice of this House now is to eliminate the case from mere technicalities, and let the decision rest on principle, and on the substantial merits. The final object of our system of pleading, so far as it has been suffered to continue, is to develop a certain and material issue on which the rights and liabilities of the parties may be determined; and, should your Lordships confine the plaintiff to the issue which he has tendered to his adversary, you will decide on the reality and substance of this case. The plaintiff has alleged the nature and extent of the defendants' obligation and assigned a breach of it. The onus lies on the plaintiff. The obligation of s. 35 of the general Act of 1847 is that which we have first to deal with. It is not disputed that the word "pipes" in that section is to be interpreted as meaning "the mains to be laid down by the company," and the obligation cast on the defendants by that section is who, as thereafter provided, "shall be entitled to demand a supply." The water should be pure and wholesome in the mains, but the statute does not add that it shall continue to be pure and wholesome under all circumstances. I have been unable to find in the Act of 1847 any provision that would add to or increase that obligation in any point material in the present action. The special Act by its s. 27 incorporates the provisions of the Act of 1847, and enacts that it "shall apply to the whole of the waterworks undertaking of the corporation;" but it does not increase the obligation of s. 35. I have come to the same conclusion as LORDS BLACKBURN and BRAMWELL, but with some and not inconsiderable hesitation—that the plaintiff has failed to establish any breach of the statutory duty or obligation on which alone he rests his action, and that judgment should, therefore, be given for the respondents.

It is sometimes very desirable that your Lordships, dealing with cases where several questions fairly arise, any one of which may be sufficient in itself to dispose of the action, should nevertheless proceed to express the decision of this House on all or more than one of the questions in the cause. As, for example, in Colonial Bank v. Whinney (1), where two questions arose on the interpretation of a section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the decision of either of those questions against the respondent rendered it necessary to reverse the decision of the courts below, and give judgment for the appellant. Your Lordships, however, decided both questions, and adversely to the respondent. Those questions, though distinct, were fairly and properly raised on the pleadings, there was an issue on each, the courts below dealt with and expressed their decision on each, and it was expedient for the public good that your Lordships should do likewise. In the case now before the House, it seems to me to be inexpedient to express an opinion on the several other questions which have been raised only in argument, and which affect the interests of undertakers for supply of water, and of water companies as well as consumers throughout the United Kingdom. The EARL OF SELBORNE refers principally to one view of the case, which is by far the most important of all, but which it seems to me can be properly settled on a firm and just basis by legislation only. The Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, became law on April 23 of that year, and in the thirty-nine years which have since elapsed, experience has taught many lessons, and among others the necessity of binding water undertakers and water companies with strict and rigid fetters, and of defining very clearly their liabilities towards the public. The provisions of that Act are scarcely adequate to the exigencies of the present day, and it may be desirable to reconsider them. It has been already observed that there is no count for negligence, nor any allegation of want of due and reasonable care on the part of the corporation, and a large question has been raised whether an action lies against the undertaking corporation in the absence of these averments, and on that question I refrain from indicating any opinion. Referring now to the Act of 1869, and to the byelaws framed under s. 66 of that Act, though entertaining the opinion that the entire length of lead pipe from the main to the tap at the rear of the plaintiff's house, with the exception of the stop-tap by which the corporation regulates the supply, is the property of the plaintiff, though under the control and management of the corporation, yet I forbear to express any opinion whether the material was, on the whole, improper to be used, or whether the byelaws which prescribed its use were ultra vires, or whether an action lies against the corporation in any shape for the consequences of thus prescribing "lead" or for the mode of supply after the water leaves the mains. It will be seen thus that the conclusion which I have arrived at is that the water to be so supplied was to be supplied from the mains. As it came from the mains it was pure and wholesome. It was conducted from the mains through the pipes of the consumer to the consumer for his use, and it was in those pipes that it took up lead. In my opinion, the plaintiff has failed to sustain this action, and as to whether he can maintain any other and what action I offer no opinion.

LORD HALSBURY.—The plaintiff must, in order to succeed in this case, show a breach of the duty created by s. 35 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. None of your Lordships has entertained any doubt that, upon the mere construction of the words of the section, the pipes referred to therein are the main pipes, and it is not suggested as a matter of fact that the water in the pipes was not pure and wholesome, but it must be admitted that the section does imply that the water is to be there collected for domestic use, and to be distributed for domestic use according to the process and ordinary method by which water is and was distributed for domestic use at the time of the passing of the Act. I think it is proved that the water was rendered otherwise than pure and wholesome by its passage along the supply pipes, which, with the assent, if not the direction, of the defendants, were connected with the defendants' main pipes. I think it was found that the plaintiff has suffered grievously from the effect of drinking water thus rendered unwholesome, but I am unable to see that the section intended to deal with any such condition of things. It may be that the legislature erroneously assumed that, if the water was pure in the main pipes, it would either continue to be pure for domestic use, or that the contract relations between the company or corporation to supply and the customer to receive might safely be left to themselves; or, what is, I think, still more likely, the idea of impurity resulting in the act of supply to the houses by the chemical quality of the water never occurred to the legislature at all. At all events, I am unable so to construe the section that it shall impose an obligation that, after the water has left their mains, it shall be of such a chemical quality that it shall be incapable of acquiring any unwholesome quality, whatever may be the medium through which it may be conveyed. This, it appears to me, disposes of the plaintiff's cause of action, as set forth in his statement of claim, and as sought to be found at the trial. I decline to consider any other form of action, or any other liability, under which the defendants might be sued.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—Everyone who has heard this case must sympathise with the plaintiff, and anyone who holds the view opposed to his claim must do so with some hesitation after the very powerful reasoning of the EARL OF SELBORNE. After the best consideration that I can possibly give to this case, I have arrived at the conclusion that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, and for the reasons which have already been given by such of my noble and learned friends as have arrived at the same conclusion.

Appeal dismissed.

SCOTT (FALSELY CALLED SEBRIGHT) v. SEBRIGHT

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Butt, J.), November 12, 13, 16, 1886]

[Reported 12 P.D. 21; 56 L.J.P. 11; 57 L.T. 421;

Marriage — Avoidance — Consent of spouse obtained by fraud or duress — Evidence—Mental incompetence to resist improper pressure.

Courts of law have always refused to recognise as binding contracts to which the consent of either party has been obtained by fraud or duress. The validity of a contract of marriage must be tested and determined in precisely the same manner as that of any other contract although in contracts of marriage there is an interest involved above and beyond that of the immediate parties. Public policy requires that marriages should not be lightly set aside, and there is in some cases the strongest temptation to the parties to act in collusion in obtaining a dissolution of the marriage tie. These reasons necessitate great care and circumspection on the part of the tribunal, but they in no wise alter the principle or the grounds on which a marriage contract, like any other contract, may be avoided.

It has sometimes been said that to avoid a contract on the ground that it was entered into through fear, the fear must be such as would impel a person of ordinary courage and resolution to yield to it. That is not an accurate statement of the law. Whenever, from natural weakness of intellect or from fear—whether reasonably entertained or not—either party is actually in a state of mental incompetence to resist pressure improperly brought to bear, there is no more consent than in the case of a person of stronger intellect and more robust courage yielding to a more serious danger.

Circumstances in which a decree of nullity granted on the ground that the petitioner had been reduced by mental and bodily suffering to a state in which she was incapable of resisting the coercion and threats of the respondent as a result of which she consented to enter into the marriage.

Petition by the wife for nullity of the marriage on the ground that it was procured A by fraud and duress, and Cross-Petition by the husband for a decree of restitution of conjugal rights.

Cur. adv. vult. B

Nov. 16, 1886. BUTT, J., read the following judgment.—The petitioner seeks a declaration of the nullity of her marriage alleged to have been solemnised at the registry office in South Audley Street, London, on Jan. 30, 1886, on the ground of fraud and duress. The petitioner also alleges that the marriage was never consummated. The respondent in his answer denies the charges made in the petition, C and, by way of counterclaim, asks for a decree for the enforcement of his conjugal rights.

The claim of the petitioner to the relief prayed is based on the allegation that, owing to the circumstances in which she was placed by the conduct and acts of the respondent, by the deceit practised upon her, and by the fear with which she was inspired, the petitioner was not a free agent when she went through the ceremony in question, and there was consequently, no valid consent on her part to the contract of marriage. The courts of law have always refused to recognise as binding contracts to which the consent of either party has been obtained by fraud or duress, and the validity of a contract of marriage must be tested and determined in precisely the same manner as that of any other contract. True it is, that in contracts of marriage there is an interest involved above and beyond that of the immediate parties. Public policy requires that marriages should not be lightly set aside, and there is, in some cases, the strongest temptation to the parties more immediately interested to act in collusion in obtaining a dissolution of the marriage tie. These reasons necessitate great care and circumspection on the part of the tribunal, but they in no wise alter the principle or the grounds on which this, like any other contract, may be avoided. It has sometimes been said that, in order to avoid a contract entered into through fear, the fear must be such as would impel a person of ordinary courage and resolution to yield to it. I do not think that is an accurate statement of the law. Whenever from natural weakness of intellect or from fear—whether reasonably entertained or not—either party is actually in a state of mental incompetence to resist pressure improperly brought to bear, there is no more consent than in the case of a person of stronger intellect and more robust courage yielding to a more serious danger. The difficulty consists, not in any uncertainty of the law on the subject, but in its application to the facts of each individual case. D E F G

The question here is whether the facts disclosed in evidence bring this case within the rule. The petitioner is a young lady, who attained the age of twenty-one in February, 1885. It is not suggested that she is what is called a person of weak mind, H but it is alleged that circumstances to which I am about to advert had, in the latter end of 1885 and the beginning of 1886, so affected her health as to produce a mental condition wholly abnormal. Five or six years ago she made the acquaintance of the respondent, a man some few years older than herself. Soon after the acquaintance began he made her a proposal of marriage, which was refused. Subsequently, however, they did become engaged, and although there were periods I during which there was an interruption of the relations which her acceptance of his offer had created, the engagement was never actually broken off. The young lady, on coming of age, was entitled to a sum of £26,000, and she had a reversionary interest in a considerable sum beyond that amount. Acting on her mother's advice, in the month of June, 1885, she made a settlement of her property upon trustees for her own benefit. In March, 1885, a month after the petitioner came of age, the respondent, who was in pecuniary difficulties, induced her to put her name to a bill of exchange for £500 for his accommodation. Needless to say this was con-

A cealed from her mother and her friends. Other transactions of a similar nature followed in the summer and autumn of the same year, until, in the month of December, she had incurred liabilities on the respondent's behalf, and entirely for his accommodation, to the amount of £3,325. The bills of exchange appear to have been discounted for the respondent by two persons of the names of Williams and Lee. As is commonly the case with men in the respondent's circumstances, he was profuse in his assurances that these transactions were little more than matters of form, and that the petitioner would never hear more of the matter. As is also common in such cases, he never provided one sixpence to meet his liability on the bills, and in the result the petitioner was pressed for payment by Lee and Williams, by one or both of whom writs were issued against her and bankruptcy proceedings threatened. It is not matter of surprise that a young and inexperienced girl so situated should undergo mental suffering sufficiently acute to impair her bodily health. To such a person writs and bankruptcy summonses may well appear endued with unknown terrors.

In the present instance, it is alleged that the worry and distress to which the petitioner was subjected resulted in such a degree of prostration, bodily and mental, as to render her, if not incapable of exercising her reason, at all events unable to resist constraint and pressure brought to bear on her by others for their own ends. There is certainly abundant testimony to the condition to which the petitioner had gradually been brought by the end of the year 1885. Nurses, friends, doctors, concur in describing the marked alteration that had taken place, and Dr. Izod, the medical adviser of the family, appears to have entertained the most serious apprehensions, for he told her mother that unless the petitioner's condition improved melancholia would ensue. Probably the most conclusive evidence of this young lady's condition is furnished by three letters, which she wrote to a friend—Mr. Guedalla, a solicitor. [His LORDSHIP read passages from the letters.] No one, I think, could hear those letters read without asking himself whether there was not something weighing on the mind of the writer beyond the mere pecuniary difficulty. On turning to the particulars delivered in this action, I find the following allegation :

“That the respondent frequently threatened the petitioner that unless she would marry him he would accuse her to her mother, and in every drawing-room in London, of having been seduced by him.”

On this part of the case, by an arrangement, as I understand, between counsel, no evidence had been offered. I do not complain of the course taken, but it appeared to me that to decide the question of the validity of this marriage in ignorance of the real state of the case on this point would be to proceed in the dark, and I felt it my duty to call for some explanation. The respondent thereupon went into the witness-box and stated, on his oath, that no impropriety between himself and Miss Scott had ever occurred. That is the only evidence he has given in this case. Assuming this to be true, he is entitled to the credit of having exhibited one solitary spark of good feeling in the course of a long series of misdeeds perpetrated upon a defenceless girl—misconduct for which it would not be easy to find language of adequate reprobation.

The matter is set at rest by other evidence. At the end of March, when Lady Scott first knew of the marriage, she insisted on an examination of the petitioner by Dr. Izod, who found her to be virgo intacta. Eliminate this matter from the case, and the contents of the letters, parts of which I have read, become all the more inexplicable on any theory other than that they were the production of a mind enfeebled by disease. Whether the cause assigned for this condition of the petitioner is adequate or not, is immaterial. The fact exists. The mental and bodily prostration is clearly established, and it is all important when we come to consider the events which followed. It appears that the holder of one of the bills, amounting to £1,000, had agreed to give the petitioner until Jan. 30 to pay it, intimating that he would wait no longer, but would make her a bankrupt if she did not pay then. The respondent had told her that the only way out of her difficulty was to marry him; that the marriage would enable him to make arrangements with Lee and Williams which would free her from further molestation; but that, if she refused to marry him, he would not even try to make such an arrangement. He added that, if she did so refuse, he would ruin her. On one of the last days of January, and, therefore, very shortly before the day the marriage ceremony was performed, the respondent sent the petitioner to the office of one Arthur Burr, who is described as an insurance agent. Burr told her that he would "settle the bills" if she would marry Sebright, but, unless she did so, he would not help her. On Jan. 29 the petitioner, at the respondent's request, visited him at his office in Great George Street on the subject of the bills. In the course of that interview, Williams came in and told the petitioner that, unless the bills were paid, he would make her a bankrupt the next week. That same evening the respondent wrote to the petitioner, asking her to meet him next day at the corner of Mount Street, about the bills. She went, accompanied as far as Bond Street by Mrs. Butler, who had been engaged to nurse her mother in her illness.

The following is the petitioner's evidence of what occurred on that occasion :

"I met him at the corner of Mount Street next morning. Emma Butler was with me. I left her in a shop in Bond Street, and met respondent there. I went in a cab. Respondent stopped the cab and got in. He asked me to shake hands with him, and I would not. He had told the cabman where to go, when he got in. The cab stopped in South Audley Street at the registry-office. He took me upstairs by the arm. He grasped my arm. I was nearly mad. I had no notion I was going into a marriage office. Count Valhermay was there. I had seen him before. I did not like him. Respondent said to me he had brought me there to marry me that morning. I said I wished to go out of the room. Count Valhermay stood at the door, and said I should not leave. Respondent said, if I did anything to show that I was not acting of my own free will, he would shoot me. He had pointed a pistol at me before, in May, 1885. Some people then came into the room. They spoke to me, but I don't know what they said. I was standing with my back to respondent. The ring was put on my finger by respondent, and I threw it away. It never was over my knuckle. They asked me to take off my glove. I refused. They ordered me to, and I did. I was going out of the room. Respondent called me back, and said I was to sign my name. He said if I did not come back and behave properly, he would ruin me. I think he took hold of my arm and brought me back. I would not speak to Count Valhermay. I was afraid of respondent; he used to threaten me dreadfully. It was certainly not my wish to go through the ceremony of marriage with respondent. I would not have done so but for what he said. I signed the book. He was knocking my arm the whole time to make me sign. I went downstairs. Respondent accompanied me. At the bottom of the stairs he told me to go, he had got all he wanted out of me. I got into a cab, and went back to the nurse. I don't know what state I was in. I have only seen the respondent twice since. I have never lived with him. The marriage has never been consummated."

The superintendent registrar of marriages was next called. It appears that he did not enter the room until after they were all there, and, of course, he heard no threats uttered; but his evidence, which is not in entire accord with that of the petitioner, is strongly corroborative of her statement on some material points. With regard to the petitioner's appearance and demeanour, he says :

"She undoubtedly showed that she had some difference with the respondent. She seemed rather excited. She was tapping her foot in a temper, or as if she was annoyed. . . . She had her head half averted from the respondent all the time, like a lady who was annoyed. She took the ring off, and threw it on the ground in a violent manner."

Mrs. Butler was afterwards called, and stated as follows :

“On Jan. 29 the petitioner asked me to go for a walk with her. I went, and in Bond Street she told me she had to see a man about money just at the corner of the street, that she would not be absent more than five minutes. She was absent about twenty minutes or half-an-hour. She came back very excited, and crying very much. She refused to tell me what was the matter, but said : ‘If you hear of my doing anything dreadful, you will know I was not in my right mind.’ ”

These are the facts of the case as sworn to by the petitioner and the witnesses on her behalf, and no evidence was offered in contradiction. The respondent's counsel explained the non-appearance of the respondent in the witness-box (except for the purpose of making the one statement I have mentioned) by saying that, whatever his desire to establish the validity of the marriage and to retain this lady as his wife may at one time have been, her evidence in court and the dislike she has manifested for him, have naturally made the respondent indifferent on the subject now. No doubt there is force in these observations. On the other hand, there is much in the evidence which no man possessed of one particle of self-respect would allow to pass uncontradicted, if he were able to contradict it. He is charged with conspiring with others to force this young lady into a marriage with himself, which he knew to be repugnant to her feelings, for the sole purpose of enabling him to raise money. He is charged, in furtherance of that scheme, with allowing her to be harassed and persecuted to the verge of despair to the serious palpable injury to her health, with inveigling her into the registry-office, and with having in that office threatened her life if she showed the least sign of opposition to his wishes. Yet, in answer to this, he offers not one word of contradiction, of explanation, or of excuse.

This, in the course of an ordinary contention between the two parties to a suit, would be conclusive. In the present instance I feel that it places me in some difficulty. Of the existence of collusion between the parties to this suit—collusion to obtain the annulling of their marriage by misleading the court—I have no suspicion; but I am in some doubt whether I am in possession of all the facts which should be made known to me before I am asked to decide the question of the validity of that marriage. Nevertheless, I must act on the evidence before me. On that evidence I have come to a clear conclusion. It is that, long before the ceremony of marriage was gone through, the feelings of this young lady towards the respondent were such that, of her free and unconstrained will, she never would have married him; that she had been reduced by mental and bodily suffering to a state in which she was incapable of offering resistance to coercion and threats, which, in her normal condition, she would have treated with the contempt she must have felt for the man who made use of them; and that, therefore, there never was any such consent on her part as the law requires for the making of a contract of marriage. Such being the case, I know of no consideration consistent with justice, or with common sense, which should induce me to hold this marriage binding. I declare the ceremony performed at the registry-office null. I pronounce in favour of the prayer of the petition. I dismiss the respondent's counterclaim for the enforcement of conjugal rights, and I order him to pay the costs of the suit.

Pleading—Striking out—Statement of claim—Court satisfied that case disclosed will not succeed—R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4.

By R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4: "The court or a judge may order any pleading to be struck out on the ground that it discloses no reasonable cause of action or answer, and in any such case or in case of the action or defence being shown by the pleadings to be frivolous or vexatious, the court or a judge may order the action to be stayed or dismissed, or judgment to be entered accordingly, as may be just."

Under this rule a pleading should not be struck out unless it is demurrable and something worse than demurrable. If, notwithstanding defects in the pleading which would have been fatal on a demurrer, the court sees that a substantial case is presented, the court should decline to strike out the pleading, but where the pleading discloses a case which the court is satisfied will not succeed, then it should strike it out and put a summary end to the litigation.

Circumstances in which a statement of claim struck out and an action dismissed.

Pleading—Striking out—Statement of claim—Evidence in support of application—Admissibility.

On an application to strike out a pleading under R.S.C. 25, r. 4, evidence in support of the application is not admissible. Under the second branch of the rule relating to the stay of frivolous or vexatious actions, however, the inherent jurisdiction of the court remains unaffected, and on an application to stay a frivolous or vexatious action affidavits are admissible by virtue of the general jurisdiction of the court.

Action to have set aside an agreement for the compromise of a dispute between the parties, and for an account and injunctions.

A By a contract dated June 7, 1876, between the Republic of Peru and the defendants, the Peruvian Guano Co., Ltd., it was agreed that the Republic should consign to the company 1,900,000 English tons of guano, and that the company as consignees should, without prejudice to the existing contracts between the Republic and Messrs. Dreyfus Bros. & Co., and others, having during the continuance of the contract the exclusive right and privilege of selling in European markets

B Peruvian guano. On Nov. 4, 1879, in consequence of the alleged breaches of the contract by the company, the Republic declined further to carry out and be bound by the contract. In November, 1879, one Pierola assumed dictatorial power in Peru, and he, and subsequently a person named Iglesias, on the resignation and flight of Pierola, acted as de facto rulers of the Republic, and between November, 1879, and

C June, 1886, no de jure government existed in Peru, but at the latter date a de jure government was duly constituted according to the laws and usage of Peru. In May, 1883, the defendant company went into voluntary liquidation, and Rodrick Mackay, as liquidator, was authorised, in conjunction with a consultative committee, to compromise all claims by or against the company. In January, 1884, Iglesias sent to London, as special financial commissioner, Señor Don G. Bogardus, to make inquiries and claim balances due from the company under the contract. Negotia-

D tions for settlements of claims ensued, and Bogardus, being replaced by one De Izcue as financial agent, on May 29, 1885, an agreement of compromise was entered into between the Republic and the company, being executed by De Izcue on behalf of the Republic, by the terms of which agreement De Izcue, on behalf of the Republic, acknowledged the receipt of £260,000 from Mackay as liquidator of the company, and released the company from all claims on behalf of the Republic.

E He further agreed, on behalf of and in the name of the Republic, to uphold the company in litigation instituted against it by Messrs. Dreyfus and others in respect of claims to guano, and to cede to the company all the rights and interests of the Republic in respect to the subject-matters of such litigation. It was also agreed that neither the payment of the £260,000 nor anything contained in the agreement

F was to be deemed to imply the inaccuracy or insufficiency of any accounts rendered by the defendants or any right on the part of the Republic to further or better accounts or any acknowledgement of indebtedness on the part of the company to the Republic, but was to be deemed, in the first place, as the price of perpetual peace between the Republic and the company, and, in the second place, as the price of the rights and interests of the Republic in the subject-matters of the litigation

G against the company and of the engagement of the Republic to endeavour to induce the settlement of such litigations in favour of the company. In June, 1886, the de facto government of Iglesias came to an end, and a de jure government of the Republic, according to the laws and constitution of Peru, was instituted. Shortly before the constitution of such de jure government investigations were made by the direction of a provisional government into the circumstances under which the agree-

H ment of compromise had been entered into, and a de jure government for the first time ascertained the facts stated and charged in the statement of claim. Upon making such discoveries De Izcue was removed from office and Don Jose A. M. Quesada was appointed Financial Agent-General for Peru in Europe in his stead. In further consequence of the discoveries a resolution of the duly constituted government of the Republic was passed in July, 1886, declaring (i) that the government

I did not accept the payment of the £260,000, except as part payment, and on account of the moneys owing by the company to the government; and, (ii) that the government accepted the agreement of compromise only in that sense, and that in the event of an attempt to give it the meaning of a final settlement, in full payment or final liquidation, the government declared such agreement of compromise void and without any effect whatever according to the laws of Peru. On October 24, 1886, an Act of Congress of the Republic of Peru was passed declaring all the internal acts of the de facto governments of Pierola and Iglesias null and void.

The Republic alleged that under and by virtue of the provisions of the contract of 1876 the company became and were agents and consignees of the Republic for the guano, and became and were in a fiduciary capacity; that upon an examination of the accounts rendered by the company to Bogardus there appeared grave errors and inaccuracies, and fraudulent overcharges to the extent of nearly £2,000,000; that the agreement of compromise was to the knowledge of the company an improper and improvident one, and was, with the like knowledge, entered into by De Izcue negligently and in breach of his duty to the Republic; that the company did not furnish De Izcue with information relative to the litigation, and the Republic's interest therein, although it was the company's duty so to do, and that De Izcue entered into the compromise upon insufficient materials and with inadequate information to the knowledge and with the connivance of the company; that the agreement of compromise required confirmation by the Republic before the same acquired any binding effect, and that the same had not been duly confirmed or ratified by any de jure government of the Republic, and that although the £260,000, or the greater part thereof, was paid to Iglesias, the de facto governor of Peru, and, although a resolution of the council of the de facto government was passed on Aug. 6, 1885, approving the compromise, yet such resolution, even if valid and binding (which, however, was denied), was passed upon insufficient materials and without any knowledge or information as to the actual mode in which the compromise was arrived at, or of other material facts. The Republic claimed to have the agreement of compromise set aside; an account of all the company's dealings and transactions under the contract of 1876; payment of the amount found due, less the £260,000; and injunctions restraining the company from distributing its assets until the claims of the Republic should be provided for. The defendants moved, under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4, that the statement of claim might be struck out on the ground that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action and was embarrassing and tending to prejudice, embarrass, and delay the fair trial of the action.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 10, 1887. CHITTY, J., read the following judgment.—This motion is made under the first branch of R.S.C. Ord. 25, r. 4. There is some difficulty in affixing a precise meaning to the term "reasonable cause of action;" in point of law, and consequently in the view of a court of justice, every cause of action is a reasonable cause. But obviously some meaning must be assigned to "reasonable." By r. 1 of the Order demurrers are abolished. It could not be intended to abolish demurrers by the right hand and to restore them by the left. So far as method of procedure was concerned, demurrers, certainly in the Court of Chancery and in the Chancery Division, at the time when these Orders came into operation were a cheap and expeditious mode of obtaining a decision. The mere substitution of a motion or summons for the demurrer would not be an adequate explanation of Ord. 25. Having regard to the terms of r. 4, and to the decisions on it, I think that the rule is more favourable to the pleading objected to than the old procedure by demurrer. Under the new rule, the pleading will not be struck out unless it is demurrable and something worse than demurrable. If, notwithstanding defects in the pleading which would have been fatal on a demurrer, the court sees that a substantial case is presented, the court should, I think, decline to strike out the pleading. But where the pleading discloses a case which the court is satisfied will not succeed, then it should strike it out and put a summary end to the litigation. What I have just stated is not intended to be an exhaustive explanation of the rule, but merely an indication in the general way of the limits of its meaning. It was contended for the plaintiffs that the rule applies only to plain and simple cases, and that it does not embrace cases which are sus-

A ceptible of serious argument on points of law or otherwise, and reliance was placed on the length of time which was taken up by the statement and discussion of this case at the Bar. But I decline to accede to this contention so far as it was founded on the length of time occupied. By far the greater portion of it was consumed in reading the plaintiffs' statement of claim, which is a lengthy document occupying some sixteen pages of closely printed matter. The application of the rule cannot depend on the length of the pleadings. To hold that it does would be to hold out an encouragement to lengthy pleadings and prolixity of statement.

B With these preliminary observations I proceed to consider the plaintiffs' case as disclosed by their pleading. The object of the action is to set aside the agreement of May 29, 1885, which purports to be made on behalf of the Republic of Peru, of the one part, and by the defendants, of the other part. It is an agreement for the compromise of a dispute which had arisen between the Republic and the defendants in reference to matters of account under the contract of 1876. The first, and one of the principal, grounds relied on by the plaintiffs is that the agreement of compromise was made on behalf of the de facto government of the Republic which was not the de jure government. But the court is bound to take cognisance of the recognition of a de facto government by the government of this country, and it was admitted by the plaintiffs' counsel at the Bar that the de facto government was duly recognised by the Queen. So soon as it is shown that a de facto government of a foreign State has been recognised by the government of this country, no further inquiry is permitted in a court of justice here. The court declines to investigate, and indeed has no proper means of investigating, the title of the actual government of a foreign State which has been thus recognised. This attempted distinction between the de facto and the de jure government which runs through the statement of claim is untenable.

E The next point relied on by the plaintiffs relates to the circumstances under which the agreement was entered into. Without reading through the allegations in the statement of claim, I will shortly state the substance of them. The defendants, it is said, were fiduciary agents, and were bound to give information with regard to the accounts. There were several points on the accounts known to the agent which were in dispute, and with reference to these points information was asked for by him, and was evidently refused on the part of the defendants. It was said that this was contrary to their duty, being agents in a fiduciary capacity; and that may be accepted. But the parties here were at arm's length and this was one of the matters in dispute, and consequently it was one of the matters covered by the compromise. There is no imputation of fraud made against the defendants in inducing the agents of the government to enter into the agreement. No collusion is alleged between these defendants and the agent. There are some other circumstances alleged which, to my mind, are wholly immaterial. For instance, it is said that the agreement is inequitable, that the agreement is improvident. Those are matters, as between such parties as these, that are altogether immaterial. Then there are other immaterial allegations to the effect that the agent was ignorant of the English language, that he did not consult professional advisers, and that he acted negligently. Possibly those would be grounds for the Republic taking some proceedings against their agent, but it would be no ground for setting aside the agreement if it was honestly and properly entered into. I All these allegations, and indeed others to the like effect, have no bearing on such a case as that which is presented by the statement of claim.

The next point is that De Izcue, who entered into the compromise on behalf of the Republic, exceeded his authority. On this point the defendants tendered an affidavit to show what his authority was, and that it had not been exceeded. But under Ord. 25, r. 4, no affidavit is admissible. That is plain from the terms of the rule itself. In regard to the second branch of the rule relating to the stay of frivolous or vexatious actions, the inherent jurisdiction of the court over those actions remains unaffected, and on an application to stay a frivolous or vexatious action affidavits are admissible, not by virtue of the rule, but by virtue of the general jurisdiction of the court. A

The claim also alleges that the agreement of compromise required confirmation by the Republic. That may mean that confirmation was required by the terms of the instrument conferring the authority or by the general law on the subject, which the plaintiffs' counsel urged required a ratification by the government itself. I must, I think, give the pleader the benefit of the first of these propositions, and consequently it is unnecessary for me to express any opinion on the second. But the want of authority on the part of the agent, and the necessity for ratification, are immaterial circumstances if the contract was in fact ratified by the Republic. The defendants say that on the facts stated there was such a ratification. It appears that the sum of £260,000, the consideration paid by the defendants for the compromise, was paid to the agent of the government on or about the date of the agreement, namely, May 29, 1885, and that this sum, or the greater part of it, was received by the government on or before Aug. 6 of the same year. On that day a resolution was passed by the government approving the agreement; but it is alleged that this resolution was passed in ignorance of the facts. Being bound to accept this allegation as true, I cannot hold that this resolution was a ratification. B C D

The statement of claim proceeds to allege that the de facto government came to an end in June, 1886, and that it was succeeded by a de jure Government, and that the de jure government ascertained the true facts, and that in consequence of the discovery of the facts the government of the Republic on July 31, 1886, passed the resolution which is thus stated in the statement of claim :

"First, that the government did not accept or admit as received the said sum of £260,000 paid as aforesaid except as part payment and on account of the moneys owing by the defendants to the government; secondly, that the government accepted the said agreement only in that sense, and that, in the event of an attempt to give to it the meaning of a final settlement in full payment or final liquidation, the government declared such agreement of compromise void, and without any effect whatsoever according to the laws of Peru." E F

The effect of this resolution is plain. It is an attempt to affirm in part and disaffirm in part. A principal must act consistently; he cannot, as stated by LORD KENYON, blow hot and cold; or, to use LORD CAIRNS' expression, derived from the Scottish legal phraseology, he cannot approbate and reprobate at the same time. He must adopt entirely or repudiate entirely. It is scarcely necessary to cite any authority for these propositions. I refer to Wilson v. Poulter (1), where the court were all clearly of opinion that the seizing of parts of certain bonds was an affirmance of the defendants' act in laying out the money, and the plaintiff could not avow the act as to part and disavow it as to the rest. I refer also to Smith v. Hodson (2), where LORD KENYON gave the judgment to which I have referred, and says (4 Term Rep. at p. 217) : G H

"Although the assignees may either affirm or disaffirm the contract of the bankrupt, yet, if they do affirm it, they must act consistently throughout; they cannot, as has been often observed in cases of this kind, blow hot and cold. As the assignees in this case treated the transaction as a contract of sale, it must be pursued through all its consequences." I

I refer also to Prince v. Clark (3), where ABBOTT, C.J., said it was the duty of the principal to notify his objection to the goods within a reasonable time after he received intelligence of the purchase which had been made not in accordance with the authority he had given the agent. The resolution in the present case is ambiguous, but the act of the Republic in retaining the £260,000 is plain and unambiguous. The resolution admits the receipt of the money by the government which passed it, although this is of no importance, because the

A previous government, which I am bound to accept as the de jure government, had already received it. The Republic, then, with full knowledge of the facts, deliberately insists on retaining the money paid as the consideration for the release. A merchant who instructs his agent to buy goods cannot retain the goods where the goods are bought not in accordance with the authority. He must return them, or, at all events, offer to return them, within a reasonable time. If he does not, he adopts the transaction. Here the £260,000 would not have been paid had it not been for the agreement. In the expressive and emphatic language of the agreement itself, it was paid "as the price of perpetual peace between the Republic and the defendants." The Republic retained the price with knowledge of the facts, at least, from July 31, 1886, to Oct. 7 following, when the writ was issued. By their statement of claim, delivered on Feb. 7 of this year, they, having the money still in their treasury, or having spent it, do not even then offer to return it or even to bring it into court; all they do is to offer to bring it into account. Quite apart from the question of ratification by reason of their having retained the price for what appears to me to be an unreasonable period of time, they could not, it is plain, obtain any judgment except upon the terms of refunding or at least paying the money into court. Even upon the argument in the case at the Bar the Republic did not offer by their counsel to bring the £260,000, or any part, into court.

The result, in my opinion, is they are within the meaning of Ord. 25, r. 4. The plaintiffs do not show any reasonable cause of action, and the statement of claim ought to be struck out. Then comes the question whether the action should be dismissed. The notice of motion does not ask in terms the dismissal of the action, but it does ask for such other order as may be proper, and there seem to me to be two reasons why I should dismiss the action. The first is that the pleader, evidently after hearing the argument on the part of the plaintiffs at the Bar, has made the best of his case. I am satisfied he could not state it better than he has stated it. That is the first reason; and the other is that the plaintiffs still deliberately retain the price. It is one thing to offer to bring this large sum into account, to keep it in their treasury, or spend it for the purpose of the Republic, and it is a very different one to refund it or pay it into court. There is no offer even now made, as I am informed. I think, so far as I may draw any inference, that it is very unlikely that any such offer would be made. It is quite sufficient for me to say that there is no such offer and it is now deliberately refused. The result, therefore, I think is that no good can come of this lengthy litigation; and that, in accordance with the jurisdiction conferred upon me by the rule, I ought now summarily to put an end to the matter. I, therefore, strike out the claim, and dismiss the action with costs, including the costs of this motion.

Appeal by the defendant from an order made by the learned county court judge sitting in the county court of Staffordshire awarding £120 to the plaintiff in an action brought by the widow of a collier under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, s. 1 (2) [repealed], against the owner of the colliery for compensation for the death of her husband which, she alleged, was due to the negligence or breach of statutory duty of the defendant or his servants.

At the colliery there were special rules made in accordance with the provisions of s. 52 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872 [repealed], and by r. 27 of these rules it was provided, inter alia, that "banksmen shall not leave the pit's mouth while men are going up or down." The deceased met with the accident which caused his death at about midnight, at which time there was no banksman at the pit's mouth, in accordance with r. 27, but only a boy, and it was by his carelessness that the accident happened. It appeared that, according to the usual practice of the mine, as the deceased knew, the banksman was never present during the night. The learned county court judge having, under these circumstances, given judgment for the plaintiff, the defendant appealed.

Aspland, Q.C. (G. E. Tyrrell with him) for the defendant.

C. A. Russell for the plaintiff.

WILLS, J.—In this case, which is one of considerable importance, it appears to me that, both on authority and on principle, the objections raised on behalf of the defendant must fail.

A It has been first of all contended that there has been no breach of any statutory duty on the part of the owner of the mine. The enactment under which the special rules regulating this mine are made is s. 52 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872 [repealed]. That section enacts that

B “there shall be established in every mine to which this Act applies, such rules . . . as . . . may appear best calculated to prevent dangerous accidents, and to provide for the safety and proper discipline of the persons employed in or about the mine, and such special rules, when established, . . . shall be observed in and about every such mine, in the same manner as if they were enacted in this Act.”

C The section then goes on to state the penalty of failure to comply with these special rules. Therefore, whatever special rules there are have the force of a statute, and impose duties equivalent in measure of obligation to statutory duties. Under that section the special rules applicable to this mine were framed and founded. We must, therefore, first of all see whether there has been a breach of any of these special rules, and whether any of them have been violated.

D Rule 27 of the special rules applicable to the mine in question says (inter alia), that a banksman must be present whenever anyone goes up or down the mine. This is a pit at which there habitually is a banksman. It is true that he appears to leave the pit's mouth while a certain portion of the work is being done, but it seems to me that, whenever he is absent while the cage is being raised or lowered, on each such occasion there is a violation of the special rule. It is obvious that it can make no difference whether the particular journey performed by the cage is in the night or by day, or whether it is at the beginning or at the end of the day. The duties of the banksman are the same in the one case as in the other, the intention being to provide for the safety of the workmen. There was, therefore, in this case a breach of r. 27, which constituted negligence on the part of the person having superintendence, and therefore there has been a breach of a statutory duty. This case is, therefore, brought within the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, s. 1 (2) [repealed], establishing the liability of the defendant unless there is some other ground to absolve him. It cannot be maintained that the boy's carelessness was the primary cause of the death of the deceased, and that it was not caused by the absence of the banksman. I think that, if the banksman had been at his post, and if the mine had been properly managed by the observance of r. 27, the result of the boy's negligence would not have happened.

The more important question, however, and the more difficult one, is upon the question as to the application of the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in Thomas v. Quartermaine (1). That case has established the doctrine that, where an action lies prima facie under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880 [repealed], an answer is supplied if the servant has voluntarily undertaken the risks which proved fatal. It is a case which in all probability will give rise to much discussion, from the frequency with which similar questions arise in these courts, and, therefore, I shall not attempt to lay down any general rule, as it is desirable to confine oneself to the particular facts of the case under discussion. I do not propose to discuss the general meaning or limitations of the maxim volenti non fit injuria, the application of which is to be watched with great care in each individual case. But, assuming its general applicability in the widest sense, it is sufficient for the purposes of the present case that both the lords justices who in Thomas v. Quartermaine (1) formed the majority of the court thought that the maxim did not apply at all when the injury complained of arises from a direct breach of a statutory obligation. I agree with counsel for the plaintiff that the remarks of BOWEN, L.J., were not made in a casual manner. It is true that LORD ESHER, M.R., expressed a different opinion, and that all the observations made were not necessary for the decision of the particular case, and, therefore, are not a binding authority on us. But we have the deliberately expressed opinions of BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ., in a case in which, as it is well known, the judgment was long in suspense. Therefore, I have there an expression of opinion which I should follow.

But I think, further, that there is a great deal to be said on public grounds in favour of that view. In the first place an obligation imposed by statute ought to be capable of enforcement with respect to all future dealings affected by it. As far as the future is concerned, statutory obligations should be incapable of being got rid of. In respect of past breaches persons may come to what agreement they please. But there ought not to be any encouragement to a deliberate engagement between A. and B. that B. shall take no action for the breach of a law for the protection of A. I do not know whether that would be an illegal agreement, as being against public policy. But it seems to me that it would be contrary to public policy where the supposed agreement, in consequence of which the principle volenti non fit injuria arises and has to be applied, comes to anything like this, that the master agrees to employ the servant on the terms that the servant will waive breaches by the master of a statutory obligation, and will in that sense and to that extent connive at and encourage the breach of a statute, the obligations of which are imposed for the benefit of others as well as of the parties to the agreement. I am inclined to think that such an agreement would be in violation of public policy, and one which ought not to be countenanced. There is certainly much that could be said in favour of the proposition, that where an accident arises from the breach of a statutory obligation the maxim volenti non fit injuria ought not to apply.

In the present case I follow that proposition, and hold that, there being a breach of a statutory obligation, the maxim volenti non fit injuria does not apply, and, therefore, this case is taken out of the rule laid down in Thomas v. Quartermaine (1). Therefore, this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the defendant is precluded by the peculiar character of the decision in Thomas v. Quartermaine (1) from arguing that, in consequence of the deceased being aware of the danger of going up and down the pit when he knew that the banksman was away, the plaintiff cannot recover. The learned lords justices who decided Thomas v. Quartermaine (1) expressly say that their decision in that case is not to apply where, as here, there is a statutory liability. If that is so, I agree with LORD ESHER, M.R., that in such a case as this the defendant would be liable. Blamires v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Rail. Co. (2) seems to me to be an important authority, and much in point. Here there has been a distinct breach of a statutory obligation, and I think that the plaintiff is entitled to the judgment she has obtained.

Appeal dismissed.

Husband and Wife—Summary proceedings—Desertion—Parties living apart under separation agreement—Failure of husband to pay allowance under agreement.

A husband and wife entered into a separation agreement, by the terms of which they agreed to live separately, the husband undertaking to allow his wife a weekly allowance for her support as long as she lived chastely and did not molest him. After making weekly payments for a period, the husband refused to make further payments on the grounds that his wife had committed adultery and had molested him contrary to the terms of the agreement. The wife took out a summons alleging desertion by the husband. At the hearing of the complaint, the justices found that the allegation of adultery had not been proved, but that the husband had deserted the wife by reason of his refusal to make his wife the weekly allowance under the agreement, and they made a maintenance order against him.

Held: as the husband and wife were not living together when the alleged desertion took place, the husband's refusal to pay to his wife the weekly allowance under the separation agreement did not constitute desertion, and the order would be quashed.

Case Stated by justices.

On April 20, 1887, justices for the borough of Middlesborough on the hearing of a complaint by Mary Pape against her husband William Pape under the Married Women (Maintenance in case of Desertion) Act, 1886 [repealed], ordered the husband to pay a weekly sum of seven shillings towards the maintenance of his wife. At the hearing of the complaint it was proved that the parties had entered into a separation agreement, the material parts of which were as follows:

"Whereas unhappy differences have arisen and still exist between the said parties hereto, and in consequence thereof it has been agreed between them that they shall live separate and apart from each other upon the conditions and in manner herein contained. Now it is hereby agreed between the said parties that the said Mary Pape shall and may henceforth live separate and apart from the said William Pape as if she were a feme sole, and shall henceforth be freed from the authority and control of the said William Pape . . . and neither of the said parties will at any time hereafter molest or annoy the other of them or require or attempt to compel each other to live together or cohabit, or take proceedings for the restitution of conjugal rights . . . and that the said William Pape shall and will pay or cause to be paid to the said Mary Pape the sum of six shillings weekly for her maintenance and support, lodging and clothing, so long as she shall live chastely and shall not molest or annoy the said William Pape."

It was proved that since June, 1886, the parties had not lived together, and that the husband had paid the weekly sum mentioned in the agreement up to about Mar. 15, 1887, when the payments were discontinued through the wife (as the husband alleged) having molested or annoyed him. This she admitted, alleging that she so acted because he had broken the agreement by refusing and neglecting to pay her the agreed amount. The husband alleged adultery against the wife, and for these reasons refused to support her. Witnesses were called by the husband to prove the adultery of the wife, which she denied, and the justices were of opinion and found, as a fact, that the adultery was not proved.

It was contended on behalf of the husband that, the parties having separated by mutual arrangement under the agreement, there could not be any desertion by the appellant and, therefore, the court had no jurisdiction to make an order upon him under the statute. The justices were of opinion that the agreement had been put to an end by the appellant refusing to continue to make the agreed weekly payments, and that such refusal by the appellant to perform the agreement was a desertion of the respondent by the appellant within the meaning of the statute, and gave their determination against the appellant.

The questions for the opinion of the court were (i) whether the husband had deserted the wife within the meaning of the statute by ceasing to make the payments required by the agreement of separation, and so leaving his wife wholly unprovided for; (ii) whether, the husband and wife having parted by mutual consent, there had been any desertion by the husband within the meaning of the said Act under the above circumstances.

By s. 1 of the Married Women (Maintenance in case of Desertion) Act, 1886 [repealed] :

"It shall be lawful for any married woman who shall have been deserted by her husband to summon her husband before any two justices in petty sessions or any stipendiary magistrate, and thereupon such justices or magistrate, if satisfied that the husband, being able wholly or in part to maintain his wife, or his wife and family, has wilfully refused or neglected so to do, and has deserted his wife, may order : (1.) That the husband shall pay to his wife such weekly sum not exceeding two pounds as the justices or magistrate may consider to be in accordance with his means and with any means the wife may have for her support and the support of her family, and the payment of any sum so ordered shall be enforceable and enforced against the husband in the same manner as the payment of money is enforced under an order of affiliation. (2.) Provided always, that no order for payment of any such sum shall be made in favour of a wife who shall be proved to have committed adultery, unless such adultery has been condoned, and that any order for payment of any such sum may be discharged by the justices or magistrate . . . upon proof that the wife has since the making thereof been guilty of adultery."

McClymont for the husband.

No counsel appeared for the wife.

STEPHEN, J.—I am of opinion that the argument of counsel for the husband is well founded; and I think it sufficient here to say that “desertion” has not taken place in the case before us. The interpretation of what is legal “desertion” has always required that the parties must be living together at the time when the desertion takes place, and not after they have come to any voluntary agreement to live apart. Here the husband and wife had agreed to live apart, and during their separation the husband, for reasons good or bad, ceased to pay the money in consideration for which they had so separated, but that is not desertion. The real complaint of the wife is that her husband has ceased to pay her the weekly allowance in consideration for which she agreed to live apart from him. The Married Women (Maintenance in case of Desertion) Act, 1886 [repealed], is one to facilitate the rights of those women who have been deserted by their husbands. Those rights existed before the Act and exist now. Here the husband may or may not take the wife back, or she may or may not obtain parish relief, through which process an order for contribution to her maintenance could be obtained. But at present there has been no such legal desertion as to enable the justices to deal with the case; and the order must therefore be quashed.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I concur.

Rates—Rateable occupation—School premises—Occupation by London School Board—Hypothetical yearly tenant—Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict., c. 67), s. 4.

In calculating the rateable value of schools occupied by a School Board, the School Board itself ought to be considered as a possible hypothetical yearly tenant of the premises, and the rateable value calculated by the rent which the board would be willing to pay for the premises for use as schools.

Appeal by the London School Board from a decision of CAVE and WILLS, JJ., in favour of the respondents, the Assessment Committee of the parish of Saint Leonard's Shoreditch, on a Special Case stated by justices assembled in general assessment sessions.

The question on which the decision of the Court of Appeal turned was whether, in calculating the rateable value of the schools occupied by the School Board, the School Board itself ought to be treated as a possible hypothetical yearly tenant of the premises, and the rateable value calculated by the rent which the board would be willing to pay for the premises for use as schools.

Charles, Q.C., and Marriott, Q.C. (Ram with them) for the appellants.
Jelf, Q.C., and Castle for the respondents.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The real question to be decided here is, whether in calculating the rateable value of the schools in question, the School Board itself ought to be taken into account as one of the possible hypothetical yearly tenants. The contention being that the School Board is not rateable was not seriously pressed. The building is not placed in such a position by statute that it could not profitably be occupied or owned by anyone; it is not what has been called struck with sterility; it is, therefore, rateable, and the School Board are liable to be rated in respect of it.

The real question for decision is how the value is to be ascertained. The inquiry is not as to what rent is paid by the actual occupier. The mode of ascertaining the value is laid down in the statute. It is to ascertain the rent which a tenant (not the tenant), taking one year with another, might reasonably be expected to pay, and where the owner occupies he is to be considered as if he were a tenant. The directions given by the Act are equivalent to saying that all possible tenants must be taken into account, and the phraseology does not exclude an owner who himself occupies the premises. Therefore, an owner who is in occupation of a premises is not excluded from consideration as a possible tenant. If by the terms of any statute the School Board could not legally be tenant, it would be excluded from the calculation.

It is contended that the School Board ought to be excluded because it can never obtain any beneficial interest from its tenancy; but it can be a tenant, for it has a duty to perform which may induce or force it to be a tenant. It follows, therefore, that it would be wrong to exclude the School Board from the list of possible hypothetical tenants, whether it is in the position of owner or that of occupier. That is the real question of principle in this case, and it is the question which was intended to be argued. The calculation is founded on this, that the court took the School Board as a possible tenant, and calculated the rent which could be expected from any tenant, including the School Board. That, in my opinion, is the correct view, and if this is so it follows that the judgment of the Divisional Court must be affirmed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am satisfied that the real, and indeed the only, question for our decision is whether the School Board is to be excluded from the list of possible hypothetical yearly tenants. In order to decide this it is necessary to refer to the Act of Parliament, and when the Act is looked at it seems to me that there is no difficulty. By the Parochial Assessments Act, 1836 [repealed], s. 1, the rate is to be made upon an estimate of the net annual value of the hereditaments, "that is to say, of the rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year," and the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, s. 4, contains a similar provision. The meaning must be that the rate is to be made upon an estimate of the rent at which the premises might reasonably be expected to be let to someone who wanted to hire them. The question is whether, in making this calculation, the School Board itself is to be excluded from the list of possible occupiers. To an inquiry whether it might reasonably be expected that the premises would be let to the School Board, the answer must be in the affirmative, and, therefore, it seems impossible to exclude the School Board from the list of hypothetical tenants. Therefore, the language of the Act answers the question. The case cannot fairly be decided on the hypothesis that the one person that requires the premises most would not take them. It does not matter whether the School Board wants the premises for the purposes of profit, or will make any profit out of them, for the question is only whether the School Board wants and would take them. I am perfectly satisfied that the principle on which the value has been estimated is sound, and I, therefore, agree that the judgment of the Divisional Court ought to be affirmed.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the difficulty A arises from referring, not to the Act itself, but to certain expressions which occur in the decisions. The Valuation Metropolis Act, 1869, in s. 4, defines “gross value” as meaning

“the annual rent which a tenant might reasonably be expected, taking one year with another, to pay for an hereditament, . . . ”[repealed]. B

These words refer to the annual rent which any person might reasonably be expected to pay to any landlord, and the actual owner and occupier are not excluded. The question has been asked, why the actual occupier is not to be treated as a possible tenant, and no answer has been given except that the School Board is not to be considered as a possible tenant, because, though it occupies the premises, it can make no profit out of them. It seems to me that a man who occupies a house for his own comfort might as well be excluded. The term “sterility” has been introduced into the cases, because, as a general rule, a profit is produced; but it does not, by any means, follow that because there is no profit there is no value. It would be impossible to find a better illustration of this than the present case. The only question is whether the person who is to be considered as a tenant could reasonably be expected to take the premises from any motive. It seems to me that the very words of the section answer the question, and that the argument for the appellants is founded upon a misapprehension of what has been said in the cases. I am of opinion that the right mode of calculating the value has been adopted, and that the judgment of the Divisional Court ought to be affirmed. C D E

Solicitor—Lien—Priority—Set-off of costs ordered in judgment between some parties in two actions. H

The plaintiffs brought two separate actions against the defendants, the first in respect of a trade mark and the second in respect of an infringement of a patent. In the first action judgment was given for the plaintiffs with costs, but in the second action judgment was given for the defendants with costs. On the plaintiffs' motion in the second action an order was made restraining the defendants and each of them, their solicitor, and the former solicitor of one of the defendants, from issuing any execution or taking other proceedings to enforce payment of costs payable by the plaintiffs to them in the second action without setting off the amount of the costs payable by them to the plaintiffs in the first action in respect of the trial and appeal in that action. The plaintiffs appealed in the second action, but the appeal was dismissed with costs. The plaintiffs having brought a further motion in the second action to enforce a set-off of the costs incurred in the first action against those in the Court of I

Appeal, the defendants' solicitor contended that he had a lien on those costs which intercepted the right of set-off.

Held: the right of set-off was not intercepted as to all costs in the second action, but as to costs in the first action the right of set-off was not to prevail so as to interfere with any lien which the defendant's solicitor in the first action might be able to prove.

Lee v. Pain (1844), 4 Hare, 201; 8 Jur. 705; 67 E.R. 619; 24 Digest (Repl.) 826, 8172.

Motion by the plaintiffs to restrain the defendants and their solicitor from enforcing the payment of costs ordered against the plaintiffs and in favour of the defendants in respect of an action and appeal which was the second of two actions between the parties, without setting-off the cost due to them in an earlier action by the plaintiffs against the defendants.

In February, 1888, in an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants in respect of a trade mark, judgment was given by CHITTY, J., in favour of the plaintiffs with costs. Subsequently, in April, 1888, in a second action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants in respect of a patent, judgment was given by KAY, J., in favour of the defendants with costs. A subsequent motion by the plaintiffs to vary minutes of the order was also dismissed with costs. On Nov. 10, 1888, KAY, J., upon the plaintiffs' motion in the patent action, made an order restraining the defendants and each of them and their solicitor and the former solicitor of one of the defendants from issuing any execution or taking other proceedings to enforce payment of costs, payable under the order of April, 1888, without setting off the amount of the cost payable by them to the plaintiffs under the orders of CHITTY, J., and the Appeal Court in the trade mark action. The plaintiffs appealed in the patent action, but the appeal was dismissed with costs, which were taxed at £271 14s. 8d. On April 13, 1889, the defendants' solicitor issued execution for the amount of those costs, and on April 16, 1889, the plaintiffs paid the money to the sheriff, and at the same time gave him notice not to part with it. The defendants issued a writ against the sheriff, and the plaintiffs gave notice of the present motion. It was argued that the right to such set-off was intercepted by the lien of the defendants' solicitors for costs. It was admitted that the court could order a set-off of the costs in the same action, but the defendants urged that they could not be ordered to set off the costs in one action against those in the other, if by so doing the lien for costs of the defendants' solicitor would be prejudiced.

KAY, J.—The rule is now settled by one of the general orders R.S.C. Ord. 65, r. 14, that

“a set-off for damages or costs between parties may be allowed, notwithstanding the solicitor's lien for costs in the particular cause or matter in which the set-off is sought.”

That gives the court a complete discretion; but the doubt seems to have been whether that applied to costs in different actions. I do not know why it should not apply to costs in different actions. The set-off for damages must apply to different actions, because the damages cannot be given to the plaintiff and the defendant in the same action, and therefore that prima facie means different actions, and why in the case of costs it should not mean in different actions I do not know.

If this case were absolutely free from authority, I confess it seems to me difficult to see why the solicitor's lien should intercept the right. Take the simplest case you can imagine. A. brings an action against B. and it is dismissed with costs. B. brings another action against A., and that is dismissed with costs. The order is B. to pay A. his costs in one action, A. to pay B. his costs in the other action. Well, when those costs are taxed and the master's allocatur is issued there is a judgment in each for a definite amount, and there is no doubt whatever that those judgments could be set off one against the other. That being so, just suppose the case (which is the only case in which the matter becomes the least material), that one of those parties (A.) was insolvent and unable to pay anything, then why B. should pay costs to A. for the sake of A.'s solicitor is what I cannot understand. I cannot see how there can be any equity for that. There is no connection whatever between A.'s solicitor and B. A.'s solicitor, by his diligence, has obtained this order for costs as against B. Very well, but suppose it is so, I turn to the language of COCKBURN, C.J., in his judgment in Mercer v. Graves (1) (L.R. 7 Q.B. at pp. 503, 504).

“The attorney has no such lien for costs as to be able to compel the plaintiff to bring the action on his behalf as trustee for him. In truth, Mr. Brown pointed out, there is no such thing as a lien except upon something of which you have possession. The matter is thoroughly well explained in CHITTY'S ARCHIBOLD'S PRACTICE (12th Edn.), pp. 139, 140, that although we talk of an attorney having a lien upon a judgment, it is in fact only a claim or right to ask for the intervention of the court for his protection, when, having obtained judgment for his client, he finds there is a probability of the client depriving him off his costs. But this is always on notice to the debtor. The judgment creditor may arrange with his debtor; and the obligation is not between the debtor and the attorney, but between the judgment creditor and the attorney whose client he is; but this does not make an action, brought to recover the amount of the judgment, an action brought on behalf of the attorney. It is an action brought by the client, by which he seeks to obtain funds with which he may satisfy his attorney; but he cannot, on that account, prevent the defendant meeting his claim with a legal set-off.”

That is reasonable enough, and that is an equity against his own client; but how can he have an equity against B. to make B. pay the costs which B. is ordered to pay A. when B. cannot recover from A. the costs which A. is ordered to pay B.? How can A.'s solicitor have an equity to make B. pay instead of setting them off? I confess at present—I dare say it is my own ignorance—that if this matter were free from authority, I should say that that is the most extraordinary equity I have ever heard of. However, I confess that the cases have made it very difficult to act upon that view, which seems to me the prima facie view of the justice of the case. There is the decision in Re Harrald, Wilde v. Walford (2), which was before R.S.C. Ord. 65, r. 14, came into operation, and, therefore, is not absolutely binding upon me. There, there was distinctly, according to the statement of the facts, an order to pay certain costs to one Walford, and then in another action Walford was ordered to pay other costs to the persons who were directed to pay him. Then the question was whether those costs could be set-off, and the objection was that the solicitor had a lien, and that his lien intercepted the right of set-off, and it was so decided by the Court of Appeal. In the Court of Appeal it was decided, without calling upon the other side, that the set-off was intercepted by the lien of the solicitor. That seems to me to be the only ground upon which that point was decided in the court below, and the counsel for the respondent was only called upon as to the right of set-off against B.; he was not called upon as to the other set-off. So that, before this rule, which gives the court discretion, there was a right acknowledged in the Court of Chancery that the solicitor who has a lien upon the costs recovered against the other side could by that lien intercept the costs ordered to be paid to the other party.

Has that been followed or not since these new rules came into operation? Edwards v. Hope (3) is directly in point. There the court held that if the new rules did apply to the costs of a different action the old equitable doctrine still prevailed that the lien of the solicitor intercepted the right. I am bound to follow that decision, and I must do so. It would be idle for an individual judge to set up his own opinion against a course of decisions which seems to have settled the matter. Therefore, the order in this case will be that there is the right of set-off which is not intercepted as to all costs in this action; but as to costs in the other action—which is in the court of CHITTY, J.—the right of set-off is not to prevail so as to interfere with any lien which the defendants' solicitor in that action may be able to prove, any right of lien I ought to say in this case. The costs in respect of which the set-off is claimed are the costs which have been ordered to be paid by the Court of Appeal in dismissing the appeal in this action. There was a suggestion made that this court has no jurisdiction in respect of set-off as to those costs; but that I do not follow. They are costs in the action although they are not costs directed to be paid by the High Court, but by the Court of Appeal. I think the order I have pronounced will be the proper order. Then it was said that the right of set-off was affected by the fact that there had been an actual execution put into the hands of the sheriff, and that the costs of the appeal had been paid to the sheriff so as to prevent that execution being carried out. But that is putting the matter upon a very low and technical basis indeed—that this court has no right to direct a set-off to take place until the costs reach the hands of the other side; or, if it thinks fit to prevent the set-off by allowing the right of the lien of the solicitor to intervene. Therefore, I do not think that point ought to affect the order I have to make.

The sheriff must take his costs, after they have been properly taxed, out of the fund. Then, subject to that, the costs will extend to the solicitor's lien in this action. With regard to that there will be no set-off except, of course, the costs in this action. Then each party must pay the costs of that part of the case upon which he has failed, and those costs must again be set-off. Then the taxing master will have the means of solving a very interesting problem. The money must be paid into a joint account in the names of the two solicitors. A

[COURT FOR THE CONSIDERATION OF CROWN CASES RESERVED (Lord Coleridge, C.J., Lord Esher, M.R., Bowen, L.J., Field and Manisty, JJ.), May 15, 1886]

Criminal Law—Unlawful wounding—General malicious intent—Intention to wound one person, but accidentally wounding another—Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict., c. 100), s. 20.

The principle that, if a person has a malicious intent towards one person and in carrying into effect that malicious intent he injures another person, he is guilty of what the law considers malice against the person so injured because he is guilty of general malice, applies to the offence of unlawful wounding under s. 20 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861. E

The appellant maliciously aimed a blow with his belt at a man, but instead struck and wounded the prosecutrix who was standing next to the man. He was indicted for unlawful wounding contrary to s. 20 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861. The jury found, inter alia, that the striking of the prosecutrix was purely accidental. The appellant was convicted. F

Held: the case fell within the principle stated above and the conviction should be affirmed.

Case Stated by the recorder for the borough of Devonport.

At the quarter sessions for the borough of Devonport held on April 10, 1886, the prisoner was indicted for unlawfully and maliciously wounding Ellen Rolston. The evidence showed that the prosecutrix kept a public-house in Devonport; that on Sunday, Feb. 14, 1886, the prisoner, who was a soldier, and a man named

Horace Chapple were in the public-house, and a quarrel took place, and that eventually the prisoner was knocked down by the man Chapple. The prisoner subsequently went out into a yard at the back of the house. In about five minutes the prisoner came back hastily through the room in which Chapple was still sitting having in his hand his belt which he had taken off. As the prisoner passed he aimed a blow with his belt at Chapple and struck him slightly, but the belt bounded off and struck the prosecutrix, who was talking to Chapple, cutting her face open and wounding her severely. At the close of the case the recorder left these questions to the jury: (i) Was the blow struck at Chapple in self-defence to get through the room, or unlawfully and maliciously? (ii) Did the blow so struck, in fact wound Ellen Rolston? (iii) Was the striking Ellen Rolston purely accidental, or was it such a consequence as the prisoner should have expected to follow from the blow he aimed at Chapple? The jury found: (i) That the blow was unlawful and malicious. (ii) That the blow did in fact wound Ellen Rolston. (iii) That the striking of Ellen Rolston was purely accidental, and not such a consequence of the blow as the prisoner ought to have expected. Upon these findings the recorder directed a verdict of Guilty to be entered to the first count, but respited judgment and admitted the prisoner to bail to come up for judgment at the next sessions. The question for the consideration of the court was, whether upon the facts and the findings of the jury the prisoner was rightly convicted of the offence for which he was indicted.

E

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this conviction must be sustained. In the first place, it is common knowledge that, if a person has a malicious intent towards one person, and in carrying into effect that malicious intent he injures another man, he is guilty of what the law considers malice against the person so injured, because he is guilty of general malice, and is guilty if the result of his unlawful act be to injure a particular person. That would be the law if the case were res integra; but it is not res integra, because, in R. v. Hunt (2), a man in attempting to injure A., stabbed the wrong man. There, in point of fact, he had no more intention of injuring B. than a man has an intent to injure a particular person who fires down a street where a number of persons are collected, and injures a person he never heard of before. But he had an intent to do an unlawful act, and in carrying out that intent he did injure a person; and the law says that, under such circumstances, a man is guilty of maliciously wounding the person actually wounded. That would be the ordinary state of the law if it had not been for R. v. Pembliton (1). But I observe that, in such an indictment, as in that case, the words of the statute carry the case against the prisoner more clearly still, because, by s. 18 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, it is enacted that:

H

“Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously by any means whatsoever wound . . . any person . . . with intent . . . to maim, disfigure, or disable any person . . . shall be guilty of felony;”

and then s. 20 enacts that

I

“whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously wound . . . any other person . . . shall be guilty of a misdemeanour;”

and be liable to certain punishments. Therefore, the language of ss. 18 and 20 are perfectly different; and it must be remembered that this is a conviction for an offence under s. 20.

The Master of the Rolls has pointed out that these very sections are in substitution for and correction of the earlier statute of 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, where it was necessary that the act should have been done with intent to maim, disfigure, or disable "such person," showing that the intent must have been to injure the person actually injured. Those words are left out in the later statute, the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, and the words are "wound any other person." I cannot see that there could be any question, but for R. v. Pembliton (1). I think that that case was properly decided; but upon a ground which renders it clearly distinguishable from the present case. That is to say, the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, which was under discussion in R. v. Pembliton (1) makes an unlawful injury to property punishable in a certain way. In that case the jury and the facts expressly negatived that there was any intent to injure any property at all; and the court held that, in a statute which created it an offence to injure property, there must be an intention to injure property in order to support an indictment under that statute. But for that case counsel for the appellant is out of court, and I, therefore, think that this conviction should be sustained.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that R. v. Pembliton (1) is the only case which could be cited against a well-known principle of law. But that case shows that there was no intention to injure any property at all; therefore, there was no intent to commit the crime mentioned in the Act.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am also of opinion that this conviction should be affirmed. It is quite clear that this offence was committed without any malice in the mind of the prisoner, and that he had no intention of wounding Ellen Rolston. The only difficulty that arises is from R. v. Pembliton (1), which was a case under the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, which does not deal with all malice in general, but with malice towards property; and all that case holds is, that though the prisoner would have been guilty of acting maliciously within the common law meaning of the term, still he was not guilty of acting maliciously within the meaning of a statute which requires a malicious intent to injure property. Had the prisoner meant to strike a pane of glass, and without any reasonable expectation of doing so injured a person, it might be said that the malicious intent to injure property was not enough to sustain a prosecution under this statute. But, as the jury found that the prisoner intended to wound Chapple, I am of opinion that he acted maliciously within the meaning of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861.

FIELD, J.—I am also of opinion that this conviction must be affirmed. I think this a very important case and one of very wide application, and am very glad that it has come before this court, and has been carefully considered and decided so that there may be no doubt about the matter.

MANISTY, J.—I do not propose to add more than a few words. The facts in this case raise an exceedingly important question, because the man Chapple, who was intended to be struck, was standing close by the woman who was wounded, and who was talking to him; and the prisoner intending to strike Chapple with the belt did strike him, but the belt bounded off and struck Ellen Rolston. It seems to me that the first and second findings of the jury justify the conviction, because they are in these terms: "The jury found that the blow was unlawful and malicious, and that it did in fact wound Ellen Rolston;" and that being so, I think that the third finding does not entitle the prisoner to an acquittal. It is true he did not intend to strike Ellen Rolston, but he did intend to strike Chapple, and in doing so wounded Ellen Rolston; therefore, I think that the third finding is quite immaterial, and this conviction should be affirmed.

Conviction affirmed.

Soon after marriage the husband began to show great want of consideration towards his wife. His general course of conduct towards her was passionate, irritable, tyrannical and intemperate. His language was offensive and insulting and he used to abuse and scold her. He would turn off the gas lighting to prevent her from reading, writing or working, and he repeatedly shook his fists at her and threatened her, but he always refrained from using actual physical violence because he said that he knew the law. By reason of her husband's conduct the wife's health suffered and she left the matrimonial home. After a few months she agreed to return to cohabit with her husband on his promise to behave more kindly towards her, and thereafter the parties lived together for five years until the wife finally left the husband. During this period of five years the husband's conduct was not so bad as it had been before although he continued to be unkind to her and she remained unhappy. The day before the wife left the matrimonial home for good the husband pushed her on the stairs when she was carrying their child upstairs and she was only prevented by the presence of a wall from falling down on the stairs with the child. On the day the wife left the husband had been drunk and disorderly, and she left the matrimonial home in terror and the parties' servant girl also ran out into the garden and stayed there for half-an-hour, too frightened to come in by reason of the husband's behaviour.

Held: to revive cruelty committed before condonation it was not necessary that the subsequent acts of cruelty should be exactly of the same extent as those which were committed on the earlier occasions, and in the present case there was sufficient evidence of cruelty to justify the granting of a decree of judicial separation.

Petition by a wife, Annie Elizabeth Mytton, for a decree of judicial separation from her husband, Robert Purrier Mytton. The marriage had taken place on Aug. 26, 1876.

Bayford, Q.C., and Searle for the petitioner.

Torr for the respondent.

BUTT, J.—This is a painful case, and it is quite evident, to my mind, that there is very little hope that these two persons can ever live together peacefully and comfortably. That, however, is in itself no ground for a judicial separation. A

It is equally clear, from the facts of the case, and from the respondent's own letters, both in the years 1880 and 1885, that his conduct has been wholly unjustifiable. That, again, is not sufficient ground, in itself, for granting the prayer of the wife's petition. In order to entitle me to decree that which is asked by the petitioner, I must be satisfied of two things: first, that there was what the law recognises as cruelty perpetrated by the husband upon the wife; secondly, that, assuming such cruelty to have existed and been committed in the year 1880, inasmuch as the parties lived together for several years since that time, there must be such further acts of violence as to preclude the husband from setting up condonation from subsequent cohabitation. B

First, then, with regard to the incidents of 1880. It appears to me, from the evidence, that this lady was seriously ill in the months of February and March of that year. The medical gentleman who attended her has been called, and has said that, in addition to bodily illness, her nervous system was weak—that she was nervous and excited, and it was in these circumstances that certain conduct of her husband produced, according to the evidence of the petitioner, of her mother, and, above all, of the doctor—results which were serious. Dr. Lynch has said, in respect of that matter: C

“Among other causes rendering the illness of Mrs. Mytton serious, there was the difference between the husband and wife, which was clearly aggravating the case. After she got to her mother's house, I was compelled to give directions that the husband should not see her, because, after each of his visits, I found her condition much worse.” D

Dr. Lynch was then speaking of the year 1880. In February, 1882, he attended her in another confinement, and he says there was a nervousness and dread, when her husband was coming, that, to a certain extent, retarded her recovery. Having regard to the husband's conduct in 1880, to his own letters, and to the evidence of the medical man, I cannot help thinking that, if at that time or shortly thereafter an application had been made to this court, similar to that now made, it would have been granted. Although I am not aware that there were any blows, still, if the conduct of the husband be such as to endanger the life, or even the health, of his wife, that is cruelty in every sense of the word, whether we talk of “legal cruelty” or anything else. That is the state of things in 1880 and 1882. E

The wife had gone back to her husband, and she lived with him until Nov. 26, 1885. During a part of that time he had been away. He went to Canada in 1884, and returned in March, 1885, soon after the birth of another child. How did he treat his wife during that time? Until we come to one occasion in the month of August, 1885, and two occasions in the month of November, 1885, there is no specific charge of cruelty; there is general evidence of his unkindness, but there is a letter, produced by him, from his wife to himself, written soon after his departure for Canada, and I must say that that letter, coming out from where it did, speaks volumes. It is an affectionate letter, and it expresses a hope that there is a possibility of future happiness, and it ends thus: F

“Your loving wife,—always, if only you would behave as you did in the last three or four days, and renew that period of happiness, all would be well. For the sake of those few days of happiness, how much I could forget.” G

What does that mean? To my mind, it means that there was constant unhappiness, and one very small oasis of happiness. What have we further? There is the matter in August, 1885, as to which there seems some conflict of evidence. No doubt Mr. Mytton was somewhat excited on that occasion. But, when we H

A come to Nov. 25 and Nov. 26 (the latter being the day on which the petitioner finally left her husband) he admits that he was "drunk and disorderly" on the latter date; and, as to Nov. 25, the evidence is, that he pushed his wife in such a way, when she was carrying the child upstairs, that if the wall had not brought her up, she and the child would have fallen on the stairs. Whether that is an act which would warrant a decree such as is asked for, I am not
B prepared to say, and I do not care to inquire.

According to the authorities, it is not necessary that the acts of cruelty should be exactly of the same extent as those which have been committed on the earlier occasions. Taking into account on the following day he was, according to his own expression given here in the witness-box, "drunk and disorderly;" that the wife left the house in terror; that the servant girl ran out into the
C garden, and remained there, afraid to come in, for half-an-hour; and that the wife left her home in consequence of those acts of his, never to return again, I think, not only that she left her home in bodily fear, but that she was justified in leaving it. On the whole, I think there is sufficient to justify me in granting a judicial separation, with costs against the husband, the wife to have the custody of the surviving child of the marriage, with the usual order
D as to access in favour of the husband.

I

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (the EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C., SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., and LINDLEY, L.J.), reversing a decision of the Divisional Court (LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and STEPHEN, J.), ordering a new trial in an action in which the respondent was plaintiff and the appellants were defendants.

The action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries which the plaintiff had sustained in consequence of the alleged negligence of the defendants' servants in allowing a train, in which the plaintiff had been a passenger, to start from the station while she was in the act of alighting from it, whereby she fell and was injured. The defendants alleged that the accident was caused by the negligence of the plaintiff herself in attempting to alight from the train while it was in motion. The case was tried before HUDDLESTON, B., and a special jury, and they found a verdict for the plaintiff for £300, but the Divisional Court ordered this verdict to be set aside, on the ground that it was against the weight of the evidence. The Court of Appeal reversed this decision on the ground that the verdict was not perverse or unreasonable, and ordered the verdict to stand. The defendants appealed.

Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., and J. Lawson Walton for the appellants.

Vaughan Williams, for the respondent, was not called upon to address the House.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—This was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover damages from the Metropolitan Rail. Co. for the injuries sustained by her owing to an accident which occurred at the King's Cross station on the line of that company, whereby she suffered certain bodily harm. The case was tried before a jury, who found a verdict for the plaintiff for £300. Upon the motion of the defendants a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division granted a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. From that judgment there was an appeal to the Court of Appeal, who reversed the decision of the court below, holding that the verdict ought to stand.

The question which we have to determine is, not what verdict we should have found, but whether the Court of Appeal were wrong in holding, as they have done, that the verdict was not against the weight of evidence. The case was one unquestionably within the province of a jury; and in my opinion the verdict ought not to be disturbed unless it was one which a jury, viewing the whole of the evidence reasonably, could not properly find. [His LORDSHIP went through the details of the evidence, and concluded:] I am not prepared to say that a jury might not reasonably find that the accident was due to the negligence of the defendants' servants. I, therefore, move your Lordships that the judgment under appeal be affirmed, and that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD WATSON concurred.

LORD FITZGERALD.—I concur in the conclusion announced by the Lord Chancellor, and I should not add a word, but that it is very desirable that we should understand the grounds upon which the courts exercise a control over the verdict of a jury once found. In this case there was evidence given at the trial on both sides, and on all the issues proper to be submitted to and considered by the jury. Such appears to have been the opinion of the Divisional Court, and it was clearly that of the Court of Appeal. The judge who presided at the trial could not properly have withdrawn the case from the jury. The jury gave their verdict for the plaintiff. The judgment of the EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C., in the Court of Appeal, imports that a verdict once found is not to be set aside unless it appears to be a verdict perverse, or almost perverse. If my recollection does not mislead me, we have departed in this House, in several instances, from the old rule which introduced the element of "perversity," and have substituted for it that the verdict should not be disturbed unless it appeared to be not only unsatisfactory, but unreasonable and unjust. The question then for your Lordships' consideration is, whether the evidence so preponderates against the verdict as to show that it was unreasonable and unjust. I am of opinion that the appellants, upon whom the onus lies, have failed to establish that this verdict was unreasonable or unjust, and, therefore, I think that it ought not to be disturbed.

LORD HALSBURY.—The facts of this case may, of course, be differently viewed by different minds. I am content with the view of the facts as stated by the Lord Chancellor, and I am disposed to think that I should have found the same verdict. But what I take to be of supreme importance, as defining the functions of judges and juries, is the principle upon which a new trial can be granted upon the ground that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence. I think that the principle laid down in Solomon v. Bitton (1) is erroneous, as reported, in the use of the word "ought." If a court—not a court of appeal in which the facts are open for original judgment, but a court which is not a court to review facts at all—can grant a new trial whenever it thinks that reasonable men ought to have found another verdict, it seems to me that they must form and act upon their own view of what the evidence, in their judgment, proves. That, I think, is not the law. If reasonable men might find (not "ought to find," as was said in Solomon v. Bitton (1)) the verdict which has been found, I think no court has jurisdiction to disturb a decision of fact which the law has confided to juries, not to judges. The Lord Chancellor has put the proposition in a form which is not open to objection, but one which perhaps leaves open for definition in what sense the word "properly" is to be used. I think the test of reasonableness, in considering the verdict of a jury, is right enough, in order to understand whether the jury have really done their duty. If their finding is absolutely unreasonable a court may consider that that shows that they have not really performed the judicial duty cast upon them; but the principle must be, that the judgment upon the facts is to be the judgment of the jury and not the judgment of any other tribunal. If the word "might" were substituted for "ought to" in Solomon v. Bitton (1) I think the principle would be accurately stated. I concur in the motion of the Lord Chancellor that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Magistrates—Bias—Interest in subject-matter of dispute—Advice previously given to party to proceedings by magistrate as his doctor—Subpœna of magistrate as witness.

It is a primary principle of English law that no man shall be judge in his own cause. A magistrate will, therefore, be disqualified from sitting as a judge if he has the slightest pecuniary interest in the subject-matter of the dispute, or if he is interested otherwise than pecuniarily to such an extent as to bias his judgment. The fact that a magistrate is called as a witness does not, however, disqualify him from sitting.

A magistrate, who was also a doctor, attended a patient professionally for injuries received in an assault. He advised the patient not to take the matter to court, but to consent to a settlement, and conveyed to him a message from the person who had committed the assault tendering an apology and expressing a desire for an amicable settlement. However, a summons was later issued for assault, and the magistrate was subpœnaed to prove the nature of the injury. A rule absolute for a writ of prohibition having been obtained to prevent the magistrate from sitting on the Bench at the hearing of the summons, the magistrates applied to have the writ set aside.

Held: the evidence did not show that the magistrate had such a pecuniary or other interest in the case as to make it likely that he would be biased in his judgment, and so he was not disqualified from sitting, nor did the fact that he was subpœnaed as a witness disqualify him.

Application for a writ of supersedeas to set aside a rule absolute for a prohibition to restrain Dr. Farrant, the Mayor of Taunton, from sitting to hear and determine the matter of a certain summons against one Thomas Burch, for assaulting one Robert Mattock.

Two men named Mattock (the complainant) and Dyer had been assaulted by one Burch on leaving a public-house at Taunton, where they had all been drinking together. Dr. Farrant, the Mayor of Taunton, a medical practitioner, was the regular medical attendant of the two men who had been assaulted, and he knew Burch slightly. Dr. Farrant was sent for, and he professionally attended to Mattock's injuries caused by the assault. It was stated in an affidavit, sworn by Mattock, that Dr. Farrant had said to him, while they were discussing the matter, that he (Mattock) ought not to take proceedings

A against Burch, as, if the matter went to court, it would appear in all the papers; and that on the next day Dr. Farrant has said that he had seen Burch and had recommended him to apologise and to do what was right in the matter. It was also stated in an affidavit by Dyer that Dr. Farrant had begged him not to take legal proceedings, as Burch would throw himself in his and Mattock's hands. A man named Bradbeer also stated on affidavit that Dr. Farrant had told him that the complainants would not succeed before the justices, and had offered to lay him five to one that such would be the result. Dr. Farrant, in his affidavit, expressly denied having said that the complainants would not succeed before the justices, or that he had offered to lay any sum on the result, or that he had made any bet concerning it. Dr. Farrant, as Mayor of Taunton, was chairman of the bench of magistrates. Summonses for assault having been taken out by Mattock and Dyer against Burch, before the cases came on, Dr. Farrant was subpoenaed by the solicitor who appeared for the prosecution in both cases as a witness to prove the nature of the injury. When the case came on, he took his seat on the bench in the ordinary course, but the solicitor for the prosecution protested against his sitting to hear the case on the grounds that he was subpoenaed as a witness in it, and that he had tried to prevent the matter from being brought into court. Dr. Farrant insisted upon his right to sit, but the case was adjourned. Meanwhile, an order for a rule absolute for a prohibition had been granted by KEKEKWICH, J., upon an ex parte application to prevent Dr. Farrant from sitting and adjudicating upon the summons in question. Dr. Farrant then obtained a rule nisi for a writ of supersedeas to set aside the prohibition.

Wheeler, Q.C., and Bartley Denniss showed cause against the rule.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., and Blake Odgers in support of the rule.

STEPHEN, J.—The legal principles as to the right of magistrates to hear and adjudicate upon cases, as I understand them, are as follows.

F The first and most important legal principle is, that no one shall be judge in his own cause; that means, where he has the least pecuniary interest in the matter. That no one shall sit as a judge when he has the smallest pecuniary interest in the subject-matter of the dispute before him is a doctrine that has been carried to great, but not to undue length. For instance, in R. v. Recorder of Cambridge (1), it was held that an order for costs made by the deputy-recorder was vitiated on the ground that he had a personal interest in the result, because the costs would have to be levied out of the common fund to which the parish where he was an occupier would contribute. Again, in Dimes v. Proprietors of Grand Junction Canal (2), it was held that the Lord Chancellor was disqualified, on the ground of interest, from sitting as a judge in an action brought by a public company in which he had an interest as a shareholder. A person sitting in the capacity of judge certainly should not have any pecuniary interest in the proceedings. That is a well-known principle, but it has no bearing upon this case, because it is not suggested that Dr. Farrant had any such interest in this matter. But the law does not stop there. It goes on to say that, though the judge or magistrate has no pecuniary interest in a cause, he may have another kind of interest in it having substantially the same effect, though not of the same nature; he may be interested otherwise than pecuniarily to such an extent as to bias his judgment, and then he ought not to sit as a judge.

I I will read this further principle from three cases where the law is well and clearly laid down. In R. v. Rand (3), BLACKBURN, J., in giving judgment, says (L.R. 1 Q.B. at pp. 232, 233) :

“Wherever there is a real likelihood that the judge would, from kindred or any other cause, have a bias in favour of one of the parties, it would be very wrong in him to act; and we are not to be understood to say that where there is a real bias of this sort this court would not interfere; but in the present case there is no ground for doubting that the justices acted perfectly bona fide."

That principle is again found in R. v. Meyer (4) where BLACKBURN, J., in giving judgment, says (1 Q.B.D. at p. 177):

"In R. v. Rand (3), we held that there was no ground for quashing the certificate of the justices. The effect of our judgment in that case was, that though pecuniary interest in the subject-matter of dispute, however small disqualifies the justices, yet the mere possibility of bias did not ipso facto avoid the justices' decision; and we thought that, though there was a possibility of bias in that case, yet it was not real. But we expressly excepted a real bias, saying, 'that we must not be understood to say that where there is a real bias this court would not interfere.' In the present case there is such a real bias."

Again, in 1881, in R. v. Handsley (5), the same principle is expressed, though in somewhat different words. CAVE, J., there said (8 Q.B.D. at pp. 386, 387), after discussing the authorities:

"Feeling ourselves thus at liberty to exercise our own judgment in the matter, we are of opinion that in cases like the present . . . it is not enough to show merely that an adjudicating justice is a member of the town council, and, as such, has a pecuniary interest in the result of the complaint or information, or that he is a member of the corporation which is charged with the duty of prosecuting the offence which he sits to adjudicate upon, but that, in order to disqualify the justice, it must be established that he has such a substantial interest in the result of the hearing as to make it likely that he has a real bias in the matter."

We adopt the language of those cases, and say that, there being here no question of pecuniary interest, what we have to decide is, whether it has been proved that such a substantial interest exists that it is probable that if Dr. Farrant heard the charges of assault he would be likely to have a real bias in favour of one of the parties.

The substance of the case is shortly this: After the assault had been committed, Dr. Farrant was called in to attend one of the two men who were hurt. He was a patient of Dr. Farrant, who treated him for certain injuries, and Dr. Farrant appears to have advised him that the case had better not be brought into court, but that it should be settled quietly, as the parties were respectable men. That advice seems to have been given by him as a friend. Afterwards, Dr. Farrant received a message that Burch was willing to apologise for what had happened, and that he thought the matter could be arranged. Dr. Farrant advised the prosecutor that this course should be adopted. The other side, however, had by this time put the matter into the hands of a solicitor. That is the substance of the case.

Can it be said that that conduct showed real bias, or was such as would make it likely that Dr. Farrant would not do justice between the parties if the case came before him? I am bound to say that, after having carefully considered the facts as alleged, I cannot see anything of the kind. We cannot say that he is likely to have a bias merely because he suggested a settlement, and advised the complainant not to go into a criminal court. We judges suggested, when this case first came before us, that it ought not to be fought out. Dr. Farrant refused to adopt that suggestion and is determined to assert his rights. Can it be said that we were influenced by any bias in giving this advice? We thought a settlement would save public time. I do not think that Dr. Farrant has more than we have.

A But then it is said that it will be necessary to call Dr. Farrant as a witness to give evidence in the case, as to the nature of the injuries and Burch's admission. It may be that this might be a ground for Dr. Farrant to say, as a matter of grace, that he did not intend to sit upon the bench in the case; but it appears to me that to hold, as a matter of law, that because a magistrate or judge is to be called as a witness, that disqualifies him from doing his duty, B would be to create a precedent which, to say the least of it, would cause very great inconvenience; as, for instance, if a judge of assize were subpoenaed just before the trial, the effect might be to necessitate a postponement to the next assizes, and it would be in the power of either party, by so doing, to prevent any particular judge or magistrate from sitting. I feel that it would be a very serious thing to lay down that such objections against judges disqualified them C from sitting in a case, and it might cause the greatest public inconvenience. It has also been suggested that Dr. Farrant offered to make a bet as to the result of the case if it came to trial, but this was flatly contradicted on affidavit. If he had in fact made a bet, he would be disqualified from sitting by pecuniary interest. If he had seriously offered to bet, although I do not say that it would have disqualified him, I think it would have shown very D bad taste on his part; and even though he had not actually made the bet, it would have shown great levity most unbecoming to a person in his position. But that is not proved here. The writ of prohibition must, therefore, be superseded, and the rule nisi for a writ of supersedeas must be made absolute.

E CHARLES, J.—I fully concur in all that has fallen from my learned brother, both as regards the law and the facts of this case.

Rule absolute for supersedeas.

Bankruptcy — Property available for distribution — Compassionate allowance granted by Secretary of State—Officer of Indian government not entitled to pension—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict., c. 52), s. 53 (2).

I By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 53: "(1) Where a bankrupt is an officer of the army or navy, or an officer or clerk or otherwise employed or engaged in the civil service of the Crown, the trustee shall receive for distribution among the creditors so much of the bankrupt's pay or salary as the court . . . may direct . . . (2) Where a bankrupt is in the receipt of a salary or income other than as aforesaid, or is entitled to any half-pay, or pension, or to any compensation granted by the Treasury, the court on the application of the trustee, shall from time to time make such order as it thinks just for the payment of the salary, income, half-pay, pension or compensation, or of any part thereof, to the trustee to be applied by him in such manner as the court may direct."

A purely voluntary allowance granted by the Secretary of State for India to an officer of the Indian army who had been retired before he was entitled to a pension, held not to be "income" within the meaning of s. 53 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and no order could be made for the payment of any part of such allowance, when received by the officer, to his trustee in bankruptcy.

Notes. The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 53 (1), (2), has been repealed and replaced by s. 51 (1), (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914.

Appeal by the bankrupt from an order of the judge of Norwich County Court directing that a certain sum should be paid yearly to the trustee in bankruptcy.

The bankrupt, Captain Webber, had been in the service of the Indian government and had been compulsorily retired before he became entitled to a pension. The Secretary of State for India in Council, by virtue of the Government of India Act, 1858, s. 41, thereupon granted Captain Webber what is termed a compassionate allowance of 7s. a day, in all £127 a year. The allowance, according to an affidavit of the bankrupt, granted out of the general revenues of India, and was in no way charged on the English revenues or payable out of them. It was of a different nature to a pension, half-pay, or other payment of the kind; it was not provided for in the regulations of the service, and the granting of it did not form one of the terms upon which the recipient originally entered the service. The recipient had no claim or right to it; it was a mere voluntary act of grace, being, in fact, made in special cases where the recipient had no claim to a pension, and was a matter entirely within the discretion of the Secretary of State. It was intended for the personal subsistence of the recipient and his family. It was fixed according to the wants of the recipient, was revocable at pleasure, could not be commuted, charged, or anticipated, and if the recipient ceased to need it, it would be discontinued. Captain Webber had been adjudicated bankrupt, and on May 24, 1886, an order was made by the

A county court judge that a sum of £50 a year should be paid out of this allowance to his trustee in bankruptcy, under provisions of s. 53 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. From that order this appeal was brought.

Swinfen Eady for the bankrupt.

Gregson for the trustee.

3 CAVE, J.—The question here is, whether a compassionate allowance granted by the Secretary of State for India comes under the terms of s. 53 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. It is unnecessary for me to give an opinion upon the question whether or not half-pay or pension comes within the terms of this section. I shall confine myself to the question argued, and not go out of my course to decide another question.

C The evidence of the bankrupt, which is not contradicted by the trustee, is that this compassionate allowance is granted by the Secretary of State for India in Council by the powers of the Government of India Act, 1858, s. 41, it is not provided for in the regulations of service, it is a voluntary act, each case being dealt with on its own merits, and if the recipient ceases to need it it will be discontinued. It differs from anything like half-pay or pension in that it does not form part of the terms on which the recipient entered the service; it is made with reference to the special circumstances of each case.

D The true test to apply in cases of this kind is that laid down in Ex parte Wicks (1); e.g., is it a voluntary payment given of pure bounty? Take the case of a private individual. Suppose a man agrees with his servant that he shall serve him on the terms of so much a year, and then after a certain number of years of service he shall have a retiring allowance. The servant who fulfils the necessary conditions has a right to such retiring allowance, and he could enforce his claim to it in a court of law; but if there are no terms, and he makes voluntarily an allowance to a servant, this cannot be recovered at law. E The governing principle is, that he has no right to it; it is an act of pure bounty. It is said that the Secretary of State for India has stated that if an order is made by a court it will be obeyed. This does not affect the question. F It simply means, if the court comes to the conclusion that the Bankruptcy Act was intended to deal with this particular allowance, and to divert it from its intended course, he will obey the court. I am of opinion that this case is G covered by Ex parte Wicks (1), and I allow this appeal.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I cannot agree with the trustee's contention. This is an appeal from the county court judge of Norwich, who found that £50 a year must be paid to the trustee in bankruptcy out of an allowance of £127 a year belonging to the bankrupt. The point here is, does this compassionate allowance come within the provisions of s. 53 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883? It is not denied that the allowance is granted on retirement, that it is purely voluntary, and a mere bounty and gift. That being the case, does it come under the words of the section? It is conceded that it does not come within sub-s. (1), but it is urged that it is within sub-s. (2). [His LORDSHIP read the sub-section.] It is not half-pay or pension, or any compensation granted by the Treasury. I will decide the case of "half-pay or pension" when it comes before me. The only words then are "salary or income." It is not "salary," and Ex parte Wicks (1) says it is not "income," as it is merely voluntary. I The trustee has failed to show that it comes under the provisions of the section, and therefore the order is discharged.

Criminal Law—Larceny—Larceny by a trick—Absence of intention to part with property in thing stolen—Bet made with absconding bookmaker—Money obtained by fraud.

C

The prisoner, a bookmaker, was taking bets at a race-meeting. R. made two bets on a certain horse, the prisoner stating that if the horse won he would recover the money deposited as well as the winnings. The horse won, but the prisoner disappeared, later denying that he had made the bet. He was convicted of larceny and a Case was stated, the question being whether there was any evidence of larceny to go to the jury.

Held: as R. only intended to part with the money on the assumption that the prisoner intended to deal honestly with it and the prisoner had had no such intention, there was no consensus ad idem, the property did not pass, and there was abundant evidence that the prisoner was guilty of larceny by a trick.

PER MANISTY, J.: It is settled law that if a man parts with the possession of money, but does not intend to part with the property in it, and the person receiving the money intends at that time to steal the money in a certain event, there then is larceny.

E

Notes. The definition of larceny in s. 1 of the Larceny Act, 1916 (5 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 1012), includes obtaining possession by any trick.

H

Case Stated by the chairman of Berkshire Quarter Sessions.

At the general quarter sessions for the county of Berkshire, held on June 27, 1887, Walter Buckmaster was tried upon an indictment which charged that he did on June 9, 1887, feloniously steal, take, and carry away, certain money of the moneys of John Rymer. It was proved that the prisoner and another man, at about 3 p.m., on June 9, 1887, during the Ascot race meeting, were the only persons standing upon a platform or stand made to represent "safes," or iron safe chests. The words "Griffiths, the Safe Man," was printed upon it. The stand was outside the course, on a spot on Ascot Heath where carriages were placed, and was not within any betting enclosure or ring. The prisoner, with a book in his hand, was calling out "Two to one against the field," just before a race was about to be run. Rymer went up to him and asked: "What

I

A price 'Bird of Freedom'?" to which he replied: "Seven to one to win." Rymer then deposited five shillings with Buckmaster, who told him that if the horse won he (Rymer) would win thirty-five shillings, and get his own five shillings back. He also deposited another five shillings with Buckmaster, who told him that he would have fifteen shillings back including his own five shillings, if the horse was first or second. The man who was with Buckmaster, and was acting with him, received the money and the latter, with whom all the conversation took place, appeared to take down the bet in his book, and gave Rymer a card-ticket with the words "Griffiths, Safe Man" upon it. While the race was being run, the prisoner and the other man were seen by one of the witnesses to walk quietly away. They were followed for about twenty yards, and on the witness at once returning the stand had gone. The horse "Bird of Freedom" won the race, and thereupon Rymer went back to the place where the stand had been and he found that the prisoner and the other man had gone. He waited there for half-an-hour and then left. Much later in the afternoon Rymer saw the prisoner on another part of Ascot Heath, and said, "I want £2 15s. from you." The prisoner said he knew nothing about it. Upon being told by Rymer that he would be detained, he admitted the bet, and said he had not the money, but that he was only the clerk, and could take the prosecutor to the man who had it. He was then taken into custody, and upon him were found card tickets with the words "Griffiths the Safe Man" upon them. It was elicited from Rymer in cross-examination that he would have been satisfied if he did not receive back the same particular coins he had deposited. At the close of the case for the prosecution, on behalf of the prisoner it was submitted that Rymer having parted voluntarily with the money there was no evidence of larceny nor of any taking by prisoner, and none of obtaining by false pretence or trick. The learned chairman declined to withdraw the case from the jury, but assented to state a Case. No evidence at all was called on the part of the prisoner, and a verdict of Guilty was returned. The question for the opinion of the court was, whether there was any evidence to be left to the jury.

Keith Frith for the prisoner.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J. I am of opinion that in this case the conviction is right, and should be affirmed.

The only question left to us by the learned chairman is, whether there was any evidence that the prisoner had been guilty of larceny to be left to the jury. In my opinion, there was abundant evidence from which the jury might infer that the prisoner was guilty.

On behalf of the prisoner it has been argued that there is no doubt that the money was intended to be parted with, and that not only was the possession of the money parted with, but the property in it was also intended to be parted with; and that, therefore, as the property was intended to be parted with, there could be no larceny, but only the offence of obtaining money by false pretences; and that, although the prisoner, if he had been indicted for the false pretence, could have been convicted of larceny, the converse does not hold good, and he cannot, upon an indictment for larceny, be convicted of obtaining money by false pretences.

I To that there seems to me to be two answers: the first, that, supposing there was an intention on the part of the prosecutor to part with the property in the coin, in order to pass the property from him to the prisoner there must have been a contract under which it could pass; for a change of property could only have taken place by virtue of a contract of some sort; and a contract, by the very meaning of the word, must be the bringing together of two minds. Here there never was any bringing together of the minds of the prosecutor and the prisoner in the shape of a contract; for, supposing the prosecutor to have intended to have parted with his money, he only intended to do so on the assumption that the prisoner intended to deal honestly with the money; whereas, on the contrary, the prisoner never intended to do that, but, as the evidence shows clearly, intended to do that which the prosecutor never for a moment consented to. No contract ever existed, therefore; and there is high authority that, under such circumstances, the property in the article does not pass.

In R. v. Oliver (1), which was a case tried before Wood, B., the prosecutor there had a quantity of bank-notes, which he wanted to change, and the prisoner offered to change them for him. The prosecutor gave him the bank-notes, on which the prisoner decamped; and the prosecutor never got any money in return. It was argued that, as the prosecutor clearly intended to pass the property in the bank-notes to the prisoner, he could not be convicted of larceny. But Wood, B., held that the case clearly amounted to larceny if the jury believed that the intention of the prisoner was to run away with the notes and never to return with the gold, and that whether the prisoner had at the time the animus furandi was the sole point upon which the question turned, for, if the prisoner had at the time the animus furandi, all that had been said respecting the property having been parted with by the delivery was without foundation, as the property, in truth, had never been parted with at all. The learned judge further said that

“a parting with the property in goods could only be effected by contract, which required the assent of two minds; but that in this case there was not the assent of the mind, either of the prosecutor or of the prisoner, the prosecutor only meaning to part with his notes on the faith of having the gold in return, and the prisoner never meaning to barter, but to steal.”

It appears to me that that is not only good sense, but very sound law, and it is decisive of the point raised here. I am of opinion, therefore, that there is evidence of larceny here, and that the true view to take of the case is that the property did not pass.

The second answer appears to me to be found in R. v. Robson (2), which is even more like this case than the case I have already cited. In R. v. Robson (2) the prosecutor was induced by the prisoner's confederates to make a bet with one of them, and to part with a number of bank-notes to another of the confederates, who passed it on to the prisoner to hold as stakeholder. The prosecutor having apparently lost the bet, the money was given by the prisoner to the confederate with whom the bet was made, and he went away. Upon these facts it was held that, where there is a plan to cheat a man of his property under colour of a bet, and he parts with the possession only to deposit the property as a stake with one of the confederates, the taking by such confederates is felonious. The case was tried by BAYLEY, J., who told the jury that if they thought, when the notes were received, there was a plan and concert between the prisoners that the prosecutor should never have them back, but that they should keep them for themselves, under the false colour and pretence that the bet had been won, he was of opinion that in point of law it was a felonious taking by all. The jury convicted, but the learned judge thought proper, as the case came very near R. v. Nicholson (3), to submit it to the consideration of the judges, making the distinction between the cases that in R. v. Robson (2) at the time the prisoners took the prosecutor's notes, he parted with the possession only, and not the property; and that the property was only to pass eventually, if the confederate really won the wager; and that the prosecutor expected to have been paid had the confederate guessed wrongly. Ten of the judges considered the case, and held the conviction right, because, at the time of the taking, the prosecutor parted only with the possession of the money.

The true view of the case here is exactly like the view which the judges took in that case. In this case the prosecutor deposits money with the prisoner

A never intending to part with that money, but being told that in a certain event he was to have that money and something more added to it given back to him. The prisoner, on the other hand, took the money never intending to give it back, and decamped with it. It appears to me, therefore, that the possession only of the money was parted with, and that the prosecutor never intended to part with the property in it. No doubt had he had money given back to him, he would not have inquired into the question whether his own 5s. came back to him or not. But that does not affect the question whether, when he placed the coins in the prisoner's hands, he intended to pass the property in them to the prisoner. At all events there was plenty of evidence from which the jury could find that such was not his intention; and, in my opinion, the conviction should be affirmed.

POLLOCK, B.—I have nothing to add.

MANISTY, J.—I have very few words to say. I take it on the authorities cited by my Lord that it is settled law that if a man parts with the possession of money, but does not intend to part with the property in it, and the person receiving the money intends at that time to steal the money in a certain event, that there then is larceny. That is the ground on which I think that, as in this case the prosecutor never intended to part with his 5s. except in the event which did not occur, and the prisoner never intended to return the money, the prisoner was guilty of larceny.

HAWKINS, J.—The only question for our determination is, whether there was any evidence to go to the jury. I am of opinion that there was abundant evidence. I think the evidence pointed to this, that the whole of the prisoner's conduct pointed to an original and preconcerted plan of the prisoner to obtain possession of, and keep the money of, the prosecutor; and that the prosecutor never intended on such terms to part with the property in his 5s. I think, therefore, that there was abundant evidence of larceny in this case, and that the conviction should be affirmed.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I think that it is clear the prosecutor never intended to part with the property in the 5s. except on condition that a bona fide bet was made. I think also that there is evidence that at the time the prosecutor handed the 5s. to the prisoner, the prisoner intended to keep possession of the money, whether "Bird of Freedom" lost or won. He, therefore, obtained the possession of the prosecutor's money by means of a preconcerted and premeditated fraud; in other words, by a trick. There was, therefore, abundant evidence of larceny, and, in my opinion, the conviction should be affirmed.

Conviction affirmed.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Herschell, Lord Blackburn, Lord Monkswell and Lord Hobhouse), February 19, March 5, 1886]

Libel—Fair comment—Matter of public interest—Allegations of specific acts of misconduct committed by man in official capacity—Statements by public man published in newspaper.

The appellants published in their newspaper an article accusing the respondent of acts of misconduct committed in the exercise of his office as resident commissioner of a colonial territory. They vouched for the truth of the accusations, and stated that the closest investigation would prove them to be correct. The article was written from information supplied to their reporters. In an action for libel brought by the respondent, the appellants averred that the conduct of the respondent as resident commissioner was a matter of public interest, that the alleged libels constituted a fair and accurate report of the information given to their reporters and a fair and impartial comment upon the conduct of the respondent in his public capacity, published bona fide and without malice. They therefore claimed that the article was privileged.

Held: the qualified privilege attaching to fair comment on the acknowledged or proved acts of a public man did not extend to an assertion that he had been guilty of specific acts of misconduct; nor did that privilege extend to statements made by public persons to other public persons and communicated by the latter to a newspaper; and, therefore, the respondent was entitled to succeed in the action.

Per LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.: There is no doubt that the public acts of a public man may lawfully be made the subject of fair comment or criticism, not only by the Press, but also by all members of the public. But the distinction cannot be too clearly borne in mind between comment or criticism and allegations of fact, such as that disgraceful acts have been committed or discreditable language used. It is one thing to comment upon or criticise, even with severity, the acknowledged or proved acts of a public man, and quite another to assert that he has been guilty of particular acts of misconduct.

Appeal from a decision of the Supreme Court of the colony of Natal refusing an application made by the appellants for an order to set aside the verdict of the jury in an action for libel in which the respondent was plaintiff and the appellants defendants, and for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., and Arbuthnot for the respondent, were not called upon to address the Committee.

LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—This is an appeal from a decision of the Supreme Court of the colony of Natal refusing a new trial in an action brought against the appellants in which the respondent obtained a verdict for £500 damages. The action was brought to recover damages for alleged libels published by the appellants in the "Natal Witness" newspaper in the months of March and May, 1883. The respondent was, in December, 1882, appointed resident commissioner in Zululand, and proceeded in the discharge of his duties to the Zulu reserve territory. In the month of March, 1883, the appellants published in an issue of their newspaper serious allegations with reference to the conduct of the respondent while in the execution of his office in the reserve territory. They stated that he had not only himself violently assaulted a Zulu chief, but had set on his native policemen to assault others.

Upon the assumption that these statements were true, they commented upon his conduct in terms of great severity, observing :

"We have always regarded Mr. Shepstone as a most unfit man to send to Zululand, if for no other reason than this, that the Zulus entertain towards him neither respect nor confidence. To these disqualifications he has now, if our information is correct, added another which is far more damnatory. Such an act as he has now been guilty of cannot be passed over, if any kind of friendly relations are to be maintained between the colony and Zululand. There are difficulties enough in that direction without need for them to be increased by the headstrong and almost insane imprudence and want of self-respect of the official who unworthily represents the government of the Queen."

In the same issue, under the heading "Zululand," there appeared a statement that four messengers had come from Natal to Zululand, from whom details had been obtained of the respondent's treatment of certain chiefs of the reserve territory who had visited King Cetewayo, and what purported to be the account derived from these messengers of the assault and abusive language of which the respondent had been guilty was given in detail.

On May 16, 1883, the appellants published a further article, relating to the respondent, which commenced as follows :

"Some time ago we stated in these columns that Mr. John Shepstone, while in Zululand, had committed a most unprovoked and altogether incomprehensible assault upon certain Zulu chiefs. At the time the statement was made a good deal of doubt was thrown upon the truth of the story. We are now in a position to make public full details of the affair, which the closest investigation will prove to be correct. A representative of this journal, learning that a deputation had come to Natal to complain of the attack, met five of the number, and in the presence of the competent interpreters took down the stories of each man."

The article then gave at length the statements so taken down, which disclosed, if true, the grossest misconduct on the part of the respondent. It was in respect of these publications of the appellants that the action was brought by the respondent.

The appellants by their defence averred that the conduct of the respondent as resident commissioner was a matter of general public interest affecting the territory of Natal, and that the alleged libels constituted a fair and accurate report of the information brought to the governor of Natal and published in the colony by messengers from Zululand and its King as to the conduct of the plaintiff in the discharge of the duties of his office, and a fair and impartial comment upon the conduct of the respondent in his public capacity published bona fide and without malice. A B

The case came on for trial before WRAGG, J., and a jury on Sept. 4, 1883, when it was proved that the allegations of misconduct made against Mr. Shepstone were absolutely without foundation, and no attempt was made to support them by evidence. It appeared that the messengers from whom the statements contained in the issue in March were derived had come from Zululand to see the Bishop of Natal, and that their statements had been conveyed to the editor of the newspaper by a letter from the Bishop. The statements contained in the issue of May were communicated by a Mr. Watson, who was connected with the staff of the newspaper, and who had sought and obtained an interview with certain Zulus when on their way to convey a message from the King to the governor of Natal. C D

At the close of the evidence the learned judge summed up the case to the jury, who returned a verdict for the plaintiff, the present respondent, for £500. Application was afterwards made to the Supreme Court to grant a new trial, but this application was refused, and the present appeal was then brought. The appellants rested their appeal upon two grounds: first, that the learned judge misdirected the jury in leaving them the question of privilege and in not telling them that the occasion was a privileged one; the second ground insisted upon was that the damages were excessive. E

Their Lordships are of opinion that the contention that the learned judge ought to have told the jury that the occasion was a privileged one, and that the respondent could only succeed on proof of express malice, is not well founded. There is no doubt that the public acts of a public man may lawfully be made the subject of fair comment or criticism, not only by the press, but by all members of the public. But the distinction cannot be too clearly borne in mind between comment or criticism and allegations of fact, such as that disgraceful acts have been committed, or discreditable language used. It is one thing to comment upon or criticise, even with severity, the acknowledged or proved acts of a public man, and quite another to assert that he has been guilty of particular acts of misconduct. F G

In the present case, the appellants, in the passages which were complained of as libellous, charged the respondent, as now appears without foundation, with having been guilty of specific acts of misconduct, and then proceeded, on the assumption that the charges were true, to comment upon his proceedings in language in the highest degree offensive and injurious; not only so, but they themselves vouched for the statements by asserting that, though some doubt had been thrown upon the truth of the story, the closest investigation would prove it to be correct. In their Lordships' opinion there is no warrant for the doctrine that defamatory matter thus published is regarded by the law as the subject of any privilege. H I

It was insisted by the counsel for the appellants that the publications were privileged, as being a fair and accurate report of the statements made by certain messengers from King Cetewayo upon a subject of public importance. It has, indeed, been held that fair and accurate reports of proceedings in Parliament and in courts of justice are privileged, even though they contain defamatory matter affecting the character of individuals. But in Purcell v. Sowler (1), the Court of Appeal expressly refused to extend the privilege even to the report of a meeting of poor law guardians, at which accusations of

A misconduct were made against their medical officer. And in their Lordships' opinion it is clear that it cannot be extended to a report of statements made to the Bishop of Natal, and by him transmitted to the appellants, or to statements made to a reporter in the employ of the appellants who, for the purposes of the newspaper, sought an interview with messengers on their way to lay a complaint before the Governor. The language used by the learned
 B judge in summing up the present case to the jury is open to some criticism, and does not contain so clear and complete an exposition of the law as might be desired. But, in their Lordships' opinion, so far as it erred it erred in being too favourable to the appellants, and it is not open to any complaint on their part.

C The only question that remains is as to the amount of damages. The assessment of these is peculiarly the province of the jury in an action of libel. The damages in such an action are not limited to the amount of pecuniary loss which the plaintiff is able to prove. And their Lordships see no reason for saying that the damages awarded were excessive, or for interfering with the finding of the jury in this respect.

Appeal dismissed.

Gift—Donatio mortis causa—Delivery of subject-matter of gift—Deposit note with cheque endorsed—Sufficiency of delivery.

G Gift—Incomplete gift—Completion—Assistance of court of equity.

The donor held a deposit note upon a joint-stock bank for £580. There was a form of cheque on the back of the note, and on its face was a direction for filling up the cheque when the money or any of it was withdrawn. On Jan. 11, 1888, the donor, being very ill, expressed to the donee his intention of giving her the deposit note on condition that she should give it back if he recovered.
 H He stamped and filled in the cheque at the back of the note and handed the note to her. He died on Jan. 15.

I Held: the delivery of the deposit note with the cheque endorsed constituted a valid donatio mortis causa of the money deposited; the principle that a court of equity would not assist a volunteer to perfect an incomplete gift did not apply to a donatio mortis causa; and, therefore, the executors of the donor would be considered as trustees for the donee for the purpose of giving effect to the gift.

Appeal by the residuary legatee from a decision of KEREWICH, J., that a gift of a deposit note with cheque endorsed was a valid donatio mortis causa.

James Dillon had on deposit at the London and Westminster Bank a sum of £580. Being seriously ill, in January, 1888, he sent for his sister-in-law Miss Duffin, who came to him on Jan. 11, 1888. According to her evidence she found him in his bedroom. When she had been with him a short while he took the deposit note relating to the £580 deposit out of his cash-box, and told her to fetch him a pen, ink, and a stamp, and said:

"I am going to give you this deposit note. I am going to give it to you conditionally. If I get well you will give it me back; if not, you will be all right."

She brought him the stamp, and he filled up a form of cheque at the back of the deposit note and gave it to her. The note remained in her possession till Jan. 15, 1888, when Mr. Dillon died. The deposit note was in the following form:

"No. 374. London and Westminster Bank, Ltd. £580—91, Westminster Bridge Road, Lambeth, Aug. 25, 1886.—Received from Mr. James Dillon, five hundred and eighty pounds sterling, to the credit of his deposit account. For the London and Westminster Bank, Ltd.:—Entd.—George Bankes, Accountant, A. F. Esse, jun. manager. This deposit receipt is not transferable. The amount is repayable on demand, but will bear no interest unless it remains undisturbed for one month. The rate of interest is subject to alteration, of which notice will be given by advertisement in the 'Times' newspaper. When the money is withdrawn or the interest paid the depositor must sign the cheque on the back hereof, first affixing a penny draft stamp. If part only is withdrawn a new receipt will be given for the balance." I

A On the back of the deposit note was the following form of cheque :

“London, , 18 .—To the London and Westminster Bank, Ltd., Lambeth Branch.—Pay to self or bearer five hundred and eighty pounds and interest. £580.”

B Miss Duffin claimed the amount of the deposit as a donatio mortis causa. James Dillon by his will appointed Miss Duffin and her brother and a niece executors of his will. One of the residuary legatees raised the question whether under the above circumstances there was a good donatio mortis causa to Miss Duffin. KEKEWICH, J., decided in favour of Miss Duffin, and the residuary legatee appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Methold for the residuary legatee.

Warmington, Q.C., and Bramwell Davis for the donee.

C COTTON, L.J.—I will deal first with the point raised as to the evidence brought forward to substantiate the claim of the lady who claims to be entitled to this donatio mortis causa. The only witness who can speak to what took place when the deposit note was handed over is the lady herself, and if her story is correct there can be no doubt that the deceased did hand over to D her the deposit note. KEKEWICH, J., relied on the accuracy of her statement. It is said she made a mistake as to the exact time when the gift was made; but there is nothing more usual than for a person, speaking with general accuracy and on most points with complete accuracy, to make a slight mistake as to the time of some particular occurrence in a matter like this. In my opinion it would be wrong, when KEKEWICH, J., who saw the lady and heard her E evidence, believed her story, for us on the grounds put forward to treat her evidence as unreliable.

Then it is said that her evidence was not corroborated, and that the court will not establish a claim against the estate of a deceased person on the evidence of the claimant alone, unless it be corroborated. I do not think that this proposition is now law. Besides, in my opinion, there is corroboration here in the sense F that the document produced bears the signature of the deceased. For what possible reason should he have signed this just before his death unless he meant to give it to her? It was contended that she was his executrix, and that it was to enable her in that capacity to get the money more easily; but I think that could hardly have been the reason. In my opinion the circumstances strongly corroborate her evidence. If so, there was no doubt a donatio mortis I causa if this document was capable of being the subject of one.

In considering that question I will first deal with the difference between the present case and other cases cited in argument. I was surprised to find that no evidence was brought forward on either side to show what the practice of the London and Westminster Bank and other banks is which put a memorandum of this kind on their deposit notes, or why they put it there. In the absence I of such evidence, I come to the conclusion that, in order to preserve convenient evidence when the money is withdrawn, they put this form of cheque on the note, that when filled up and signed it may be preserved as a receipt, and not that they make it a part of the bargain that they will not pay back the money unless the cheque is signed and produced. I think they would have no power to withhold the money altogether in case from any cause the cheque is not I signed; but they rightly require some reasonable explanation to be given to justify them in paying without the production of this document filled up in due form as required. I do not think the insertion of this provision has the effect of placing the account in which this money stands in the same position as a balance on an ordinary drawing account, so as to prevent the fund from being given away as a donatio mortis causa.

It is said that this is the first time that this question whether a deposit note is a good subject of a donatio mortis causa has come before the Court of Appeal in England, and we are asked and have power to review the cases. There has, however, been a current of decisions in the courts of judicature in England in favour of the donation, and there is a decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland which takes the same view. But, to deal with the question on principle, why should not this document be a good subject of donatio mortis causa? It is true that the fact of the cheque having been filled in and signed does not give the donee a title at law to be paid, because it was not presented till after the death of the drawer. But why is there not a good donatio mortis causa apart from the cheque?

Duffield v. Elwes (1) is in point as to that. It shows that there may be a good donatio mortis causa of an instrument which does not pass by delivery, and that the executors of the drawer would be considered as trustees for the donee for the purpose of giving effect to the gift. The judgment of KNIGHT BRUCE, V.-C., in Moore v. Darton (2), is very instructive as showing what kind of instruments may be the subjects of donatio mortis causa. There a document was executed when a deposit of money was made. The mere fact of the deposit would create a debt, but the document, besides acknowledging the receipt of the money, expressed the terms on which it was held, and showed what the contract between the parties was. It was held that the delivery of that document was a good donatio mortis causa of the money deposited, and so, in my opinion, was the delivery of the deposit note in the present case. The delivery gives no legal title to the donee, nor did the delivery of the security in Duffield v. Elwes (1); but the House of Lords there laid it down that the executors become trustees for the donee, and that they are bound to do everything which may be necessary in order to enable the donee to get the money.

No doubt that is anomalous, and it would not be so in the case of a gift inter vivos. The court does not give any assistance to mere volunteers in such cases, and would not interfere to compel either the donor or his executors to perfect the gift. The doctrine is, therefore, anomalous, and peculiar to the case of a donatio mortis causa. It is true that here the assistance of the court might be dispensed with, the donee herself being one of the executors; but I do not rely on that. Had the executors all been strangers, they must, according to Duffield v. Elwes (1), lend their names to enable her to recover the money, she having an equitable title to it. The same view was taken in the Irish case, Cassidy v. Belfast Banking Co. (3), by the Court of Appeal in Ireland, though in that case the proceeding was irregular, and the executors, and not Cassidy, would have been the proper plaintiffs. In my opinion the appeal fails, and should be dismissed.

Re Mead, Austin v. Mead (4), was much relied on by the residuary legatee, but it is quite distinct from the present case, for there the donor did not intend to give the deposit note, but only to give by means of a cheque a part of the money deposited.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am also of opinion that the decision of KEKEWICH, J., was correct on both the points raised in this appeal before us. We were asked to overrule the judge's decision upon the evidence. It would be very difficult—I do not say impossible—for us to do so when he has seen and heard the witness, and we have not. I am bound to say that, having attended to the evidence which has been read, I fully believe the lady's story.

Then it is said that, even assuming the deceased intended to make a donatio mortis causa, this deposit note cannot be made the subject of donatio mortis causa. Why should it not? There is at first sight this difficulty, that the note is not a negotiable instrument, and cannot therefore be sued upon in the donee's own name, and the gift being voluntary, the court, according to its ordinary principles, will not compel either the donor or his executors to do anything to perfect it. But that difficulty was set at rest ages ago. SIR J. LEACH, V.-C., decided, in Duffield v. Elwes (1), that the court would not under circumstances like those of the present case assist the voluntary donee to obtain the benefit of the gift; but that decision was reversed on appeal, and the reasoning of the judge condemned, and LORD ELDON said that the principle that a court of equity will not assist a volunteer to perfect an incomplete gift does not apply to a donatio mortis causa. Why should not the court assist the donee in the present case?

It is said that there was no good donatio mortis causa because a man cannot make such a gift of his own cheque. I will assume that that proposition is correct, though I think it may some day require consideration. But assuming it was correct, I think that it does not dispose of the present case. There is indeed upon the deposit note a form of cheque payable to bearer which has been filled up, stamped, and signed. But that is a mere means of preserving evidence of the payment of the money deposited. The thing that is given is the deposit note, and not the cheque, and I am convinced that a perfectly valid donatio mortis causa can be made of this deposit note. The authorities are all in favour of that view, but we were asked to overrule them. It would be a strong thing to do so after they have been acted on for so many years; but, apart from that consideration, I think that on principle we ought to affirm them. I agree that this appeal fails.

LOPES, L.J.—The first point here is, whether this donatio mortis causa was proved. In my opinion the judge was quite right in believing the story told by this lady. It is true that there was a certain discrepancy in her statements; but the learned judge, having seen and heard her and considered the rest of the evidence, came to the conclusion that her story was to be believed, and I see no reason for thinking that conclusion erroneous. Her evidence was corroborated on almost every point on which under the circumstances any corroboration could be expected.

There is the further question to be considered, whether this deposit note was a good subject of donatio mortis causa. The law—though I am not so familiar with it as my learned brethren—seems to be well established. It seems that the cheque of another person than the donor, a promissory note, and an ordinary deposit note, are good subjects of donatio mortis causa. But exception is taken to the deposit note in this case on the ground of the form of cheque upon the back of it. In my opinion that does not in any way alter the case. It appears to me to have been merely an arrangement by the bankers to enable them more conveniently to preserve evidence of the money having been withdrawn. I think it was clearly the intention of the donor to give the donee not merely a cheque, but the deposit note. In my opinion, the decision of the learned judge was quite correct, and this appeal must be dismissed.

PENNY v. HANSON

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Denman and Mathew, JJ.), February 25, 1887]

Criminal Law—Vagrancy—Fortune-telling—Intent to deceive and impose—Statement of ability to forecast future—No person's fortune told—Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. 4, c. 83), s. 4.

By s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824: "Every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means or device, by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive and impose on any of His Majesty's subjects . . . and being subsequently convicted of the offence for which he or she shall have been so apprehended, shall be deemed a rogue and a vagabond . . ."

The appellant advertised in newspapers that he could cast nativities and answer astrological questions. The informant, a detective, wrote to the appellant asking for information and received a circular in which, after stating his views on astrology as a science, the appellant stated that, on being informed of the birth dates of the persons who consulted him, he would, on payment of certain sums of money, forecast their future. Nothing was told to the informant as being his fortune and there was no evidence whether or not the appellant believed implicitly in his science.

Held: the advertisements and circular amounted to a pretence or profession to tell fortunes under s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, notwithstanding the fact that the informant's fortune was not in fact told.

Notes. Section 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, has been repealed in so far as it extends to persons purporting to act as spiritualistic mediums or to exercise any powers of telepathy, clairvoyance or other similar powers, or to persons who, in purporting so to act or to exercise such powers, use fraudulent devices: see Fraudulent Mediums Act, 1951 (30 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 40), which makes new and express provision for the punishment of such fraudulent persons.

Case Stated by a metropolitan magistrate.

Upon the hearing of an information preferred by the respondent against the appellant under s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, charging that the appellant did unlawfully pretend to tell fortunes to deceive and impose on one Timm Khurt and others of Her Majesty's subjects, it was proved or admitted that the appellant had caused to be inserted in various newspapers advertisements to the following effect:

"Neptune, the astrologer's permanent address, is 12, Grenville Street, Brunswick Square, London, W.C. Terms sent on application.

Wanted everyone to have their own nativity cast yearly; advice given and astrological questions answered. For terms send stamps to "Neptune," 12, Grenville Street, Brunswick Square, W.C."

A Khurt, a detective, answered one of the advertisements by a letter under an assumed name and address as follows :

“Sir,—I have seen your advertisement and should like to know further particulars with a view to receive advice.—I am, Sir, yours truly, Timm Nicholans.”

B In reply he received a printed circular as follows :

“ASTROLOGY

C Is a science giving cause and effects; without this it could not be accurately termed a science. In all ages some of the most eminent men have been practical astrologers; even now it is the same. In ancient time astrologers occupied more prominent positions than any other class of prophets, being men of science and knowledge. We do not consult the spirits of the so-called dead, nor use any unlawful means; neither do we practise any of the black arts, or other mysteries, nor use enchantments (mystery is only a word that expresses our want of knowledge).

D “The works of the Great First Cause are all governed by immutable and perfectly natural laws, working in order and harmony. Every cause produces its own effects. Every planet in our solar system has its own orbit (course to run) round the sun, from which it cannot deviate. It is the same in the animal and vegetable kingdoms, and man is no exception to the Divine laws which govern all things. We all have our own orbit or sphere (sun) of usefulness, around which we revolve in this life. By our own mistakes

E in life we create clouds that sometimes obscure our path, and in the desire for betterment we have a divine right to consult the works of the Great First Cause, who has declared that the stars are for signs (of what? the past, present, or future) and for seasons.

F “By the positions of the planets in the nativity, and their aspects to each other, we are able to give the general descriptions of person, the diseases liable to, health, mental abilities and disposition, the occupation most suitable, where and when successful, marriage, travelling, friends, etc., and the events of everyday life. Interviews are unnecessary; all that is required is the time of birth as near as possible, day of week, day of month, year, sex, and birthplace. . . .

G “A stamped addressed envelope must accompany every communication where a reply is required.

H “All work done will be in accordance with the remuneration received, and will be executed as early as possible.—Address R. H. Neptune, 12, Grenville Street, Brunswick Square, London, W.C.”

I On the part of the appellant it was contended (i) that there was no evidence of pretence or profession to tell the fortune of Timm Khurt, the informant, inasmuch as there was nothing whatever told to him as being his fortune, and that by the Act such pretence or profession must consist of the actual telling and purporting to tell a fortune; (ii) that the profession made by the appellant in his circular was that he could apply certain rules (which were known to those who had studied astrology) to the particular cases of individuals, and although this was coupled with an expression of opinion that such fixed rules were sound, and when properly applied would give an indication of what was likely to happen, yet there was no pretence by the appellant that he had any mysterious personal power of divination, such as might impose on the credulity of the superstitious, which was the mischief aimed at by that portion of the statute under which the offence was charged; (iii) that there was no evidence of intent to deceive as required by the words of the Act, inasmuch as there was no evidence that the appellant had not the most implicit faith in the science he professed to apply, namely, astrology. A

The magistrate was of opinion that there was evidence that the appellant did pretend and profess to tell fortunes, and that he did it to deceive and impose on Timm Khurt and others of Her Majesty's subjects within the meaning of the statute. He, accordingly, convicted the appellant and fined him £5.

By the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4: B

"Every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means or device, by palmistry or otherwise, to deceive and impose on any of His Majesty's subjects . . . and being subsequently convicted of the offence for which he or she shall have been so apprehended, shall be deemed a rogue and a vagabond. . . ." C

Murphy, Q.C., (Wormald with him) for the appellant.

Poland for the respondent, was not called on to argue.

DENMAN, J.—This is an instance in which the doctrine res ipsa loquitur applies. It is nonsense to suppose that in these days of advanced knowledge the appellant really did believe he had the power to predict a man's future by knowing at what hour he was born, and the position of the stars at the particular moment of his birth. No person who was not a lunatic could believe he possessed such power. There was, therefore, no need on the part of the prosecution to negative his belief in such power or capacity. The magistrate rightly drew an inference that the appellant had an intent to deceive and impose on the prosecutor. I do not decide whether merely telling fortunes is or is not an offence under the statute, but this advertisement and circular amounted to a pretending and profession to tell fortunes within s. 4 of the Act. I think there was ample evidence on which we ought to hold the magistrate was right. D

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. E

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Fry, L.J.), August 4, 5, 1890]

Master and Servant—Apprentice—Infant apprentice—Apprenticeship deed—Benefit of infant—Contract to be read as a whole.

By an apprenticeship deed between an infant, her parent, and the plaintiff, a dancing master, the infant was apprenticed to the master for a term of seven years to be instructed in stage dancing. The deed provided that the infant should not contract matrimony within the said term, that her services should be entirely at the disposal of the master, and that she should not accept any professional engagement without his full consent. The master agreed that he would, with qualified assistants, teach the apprentice dancing, and make her small payments for each night on which she had an engagement. The deed also gave the master the right to engage the apprentice for performances in any foreign country, and provided that he should during such engagement pay her a certain sum and provide board and lodging. The deed contained no provision for any remuneration to the infant except during an engagement, nor any J undertaking by the master to provide her with any engagement or with clothes, lodging, or food, except when abroad. It was also provided that if at any time during the seven years the master should be of opinion that the apprentice was unfit from any cause (physical or otherwise) to pursue the vocation of a stage dancer, he might put an end to the deed by giving the parent notice to that effect. The infant entered into an engagement to perform as stage dancer for the defendant B., without the consent of the master.

In an action brought by the master for specific performance of the contract, an injunction, and damages against the defendant B. and his agent for inducing breaches of the contract,

Held: the court must regard the contract as a whole and the circumstances of the case; the contract contained stipulations of an unusual character which placed an inordinate power in the hands of the master; and, therefore, the infant was not bound by the contract, and the action failed.

Action brought by the plaintiff, a dancing master, to enforce a contract of apprenticeship made with an infant, and claiming damages for enticement and alleged breach of that contract.

By an indenture dated Dec. 6, 1886, and made between the defendant Helen Maude Parnell (an infant of the age of fourteen years), thereafter called the said apprentice of the first part, the defendant Elizabeth Parnell, widow (the mother of the said infant, thereafter called the parent), of the second part, and the plaintiff (a teacher of stage dancing) of the third part, it was witnessed as follows:

“That in pursuance of the said agreement in this behalf the said apprentice, by and with the consent of the parents, doth put herself apprentice to the said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco, to learn his art, and with him (after the manner of an apprentice) to serve from Dec. 6, 1886, until the end and term of seven years from thence next following, and to be fully complete and ended, during which term the said apprentice her said master faithfully shall serve, his secrets keep, his lawful commands everywhere obey. She shall do no damage to her said master nor see it to be done by others, but that she to the utmost of her power shall let or forthwith give warning to her said master of the same. She shall not waste the goods of her said master nor lend them unlawfully to any. She shall not contract matrimony within the said term. She shall neither contract professional engagements nor accept such unless with the full written permission of her said master. She shall not absent herself from her said master's service unlawfully, but in all things as a faithful apprentice, she shall behave herself towards her said master and all his during the said term. And the said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco, in consideration of the faithful services of the said apprentice, in the art of choreography which he useth, by the best means that he can shall teach and instruct or cause to be taught and instructed his said apprentice during the said term, but subject in all respects to the stipulations hereinafter mentioned. And this indenture also witnesseth that, in pursuance of the said agreement in this behalf and in consideration of the premises, the parents and the said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco hereby mutually covenant and agree with each other as follows, that is to say,

“1. That the said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco, in conjunction with qualified assistants, shall instruct the said apprentice in the higher branches of the choreographic art for the term of seven years, to be computed from the date of these presents.

“2. That the said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco shall pay to the said apprentice the following remuneration for all or any choreographic engagements of the said apprentice during the said terms, viz., in London and suburbs for the first three years 9d. per night, and 6d. for each matinée, and for the remainder of the said term 1s. per night, and 6d. for each matinée. The said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco shall have the right to engage the said apprentice for performances in America or in any colonial and foreign State, and shall pay to the apprentice during the continuance of such engagement the sum of 5s. per week, and also provide the said apprentice with board and lodging during such last-mentioned engagement.

“3. In the event of there not being sufficient dancing, the apprentice may be required for utility business, and shall be paid for such service at the rate of 6d. per night or for such matinée.

“4. The services of the said apprentice shall be entirely at the disposal of the said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco, and the said apprentice shall not during the said term of seven years enter into any professional engagements without the permission in writing of the said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco.

“5. The said apprentice shall take and receive lessons daily (of one hour's duration) except Saturdays and Sundays, and except in case of ill-health, during performances, rehearsals, public holidays, or when otherwise unavoidably prevented.

“6. The said apprentice shall abide by and conform to the rules, orders, and regulations of the theatre where the said apprentice shall be engaged.

“7. The parents and apprentice shall conform to all the requirements of the Education Acts, and the parents shall furnish the said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco on the first day of each month with a governess’s certificate that the said apprentice’s scholastic obligations are strictly adhered to.

“8. In case the said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco shall at any time during the said term be of opinion (after a fair trial) that the said apprentice is unfit from any cause whatever (either physical or otherwise) to pursue the avocation of stage dancing, the said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco may put an end to these presents and every matter and thing herein contained, by giving to the parents and the said apprentice notice in writing to that effect.

“9. Should the parents fail in the fulfilment of any of the terms of these presents on his or her part herein contained, or if the said apprentice shall fail to comply with the rules and regulations which may be necessary for the fulfilment of any engagement, or accept any engagement without having previously obtained the written consent of the said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco, or practise the art of stage dancing under the direction of any person or persons other than the said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco or his assistants, or withhold her talents and best endeavours, or by direct or indirect insubordination, or fail to attend practice or rehearsal regularly and punctually, or decline to accept any engagement or stage business of which the said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco may approve, or not give proper attention to her duties at the theatre or elsewhere, and above all should the conduct of the apprentice be liable to blame in or out of school, the said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco may by notice in writing addressed in a registered letter to the parents or the survivor of them, put an end to these presents, and the parents shall thereupon pay as and for liquidated damages to the said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco the sum of £50.”

Another indenture of the same date, containing similar provisions, was made between the defendant Ada Parnell, an infant of the age of twelve years, of the first part, the defendant Elizabeth Parnell of the second part, and the plaintiff of the third part.

In August, 1889, the apprentices, without the consent of the plaintiff, arranged with the defendant Parravicini, as agent for the defendant Barnum, to perform as stage dancers at Olympia, each receiving one guinea per week. The plaintiff having become aware of this arrangement in November, 1889, commenced this action against Barnum and his agent Parravicini, and Elizabeth Parnell, Helen Maude Parnell, and Ada Parnell, claiming specific performance of the indentures, an injunction restraining the defendants Helen Maude Parnell and Ada Parnell from performing and the other defendants from permitting or allowing them to perform without the plaintiff’s consent, and damages against the defendants Barnum and Parravicini for inducing the infants, the plaintiff’s pupils, to break their engagements with him. On Nov. 22 the plaintiff moved for an injunction until the trial of the action or further order restraining the defendants Barnum and Parravicini from inducing or allowing the defendants Helen Maude Parnell and Ada Parnell to perform as stage dancers at Olympia without the written permission of the plaintiff, and to restrain the infant defendants from performing, and the defendant Elizabeth Parnell from allowing them to perform, at Olympia or elsewhere, without the consent of the plaintiff; but CHITTY, J., refused to grant the injunction on the ground that Gylbert v. Fletcher (1) had established that the master could not sue his apprentice on the covenants to serve in the apprenticeship deed purporting to be entered into by the apprentice, therefore the negative clauses could not be enforced by injunction. The action now came in for trial before FRY, L.J., sitting as an additional judge of the Chancery Division.

The plaintiff in his evidence deposed that before the infant defendants signed the agreements to dance at Olympia he had given Barnum's agent, Parravicini, notice that they were apprenticed to him, though Parravicini denied this. It also appeared that the plaintiff's establishment had a high reputation, and that, owing to the poverty of most of the pupils, the only remuneration received by the plaintiff for his instruction was the pay he received from theatrical managers for the services of his pupils during the term of their apprenticeship. The plaintiff had received no premium in respect of the infant defendants, and they had received some money from him as payment for their services.

FRY, L.J.—This is an action brought by Signor de Francesco, who is the proprietor and manager of a large school for the teaching of ballet-dancers, against several defendants. Those defendants are, in the first place, Mr. Barnum, who, at the time this action was brought, was described as proprietor of a certain show known as Barnum's Show at Olympia. The next defendant is a Signor Parravicini, who is a theatrical agent in London, and who was employed by Mr. Barnum to engage ballet-dancers for him. The next defendant is Mrs. Parnell, who is the mother of the two infants, the ballet-girls; and lastly come the two infant defendants, who are apprenticed to Signor de Francesco. Those are the parties to the action.

In the first place, with regard to the two infants, the case appears to me to have been determined by CHITTY, J., when it came before him on the motion. I say that for this reason: that he pointed out in his judgment that, so far back as the reign of Charles I, it had been determined that an infant could not be sued at law upon an apprenticeship indenture; there are other remedies which the master may have recourse to, but that he cannot sue the apprentice at law; and furthermore that there is no case in which the apprentice has been sued in equity; and he came to the conclusion that that authority was binding on him unless after the various statutes, the statute of Elizabeth and the subsequent statutes with regard to apprenticeship were all examined, there is some explanation given of that authority. Counsel for the plaintiff very candidly stated, after examining the statutes, that he is unable to offer any explanation of that authority, and therefore he very wisely and rightly suggested that I should probably not want to reconsider that branch of the argument, but consider myself bound by what CHITTY, J., had done in this case. Therefore the case has not been elaborately argued on that point. I only on this part of the case follow CHITTY, J., at the same time saying that nothing that has occurred has created, in my mind, any reasonable belief that the decision of CHITTY, J., was not perfectly in accordance with the law. For my own part, I should be very unwilling to extend decisions, the effect of which is to compel persons who are not desirous of maintaining continuous personal relations with another to continue those personal relations. I have a strong impression and a strong feeling that it is not in the interests of mankind that the rule of specific performance should be extended to forcing people to maintain permanent and continuous relations which they are unwilling to maintain. I think the courts are bound to be jealous in case they should turn contracts of service into contracts of slavery, and therefore, speaking for myself, I should lean against the extension of the doctrine of specific performance and injunction in such a manner. So much for the case against the infants.

With regard to the first defendant Mr. Barnum, the case stands in this way: It is alleged that he has enticed away the apprentices of Signor de Francesco.

A that he has done so with the knowledge of their engagement with Signor de Francesco, and consequently what he did was in law malicious, and he therefore is liable in damages for the malicious act. To that his defence is that the indentures of apprenticeship which were entered into between the infants and Signor de Francesco were not valid and binding in law, and that that being so,
B the whole structure of the case against him fails; and he further argued that he had not done anything which was malicious, and that there was no employment in fact of which they were deprived or from which they were enticed away.
He has further urged that there is no evidence of damage before me to justify my pronouncing a judgment against him for damages.

C The most important question in this case is the first of those propositions which has been urged at the Bar on Mr. Barnum's behalf. Is there, or is there not, in this case a valid contract between the infants and Signor de Francesco?
From a very early date it has been held that one exception to the incapacity of an infant to bind himself relates to contracts for his good teaching or instruction whereby he may profit himself afterwards, to use LORD COKE's language. There is another exception which is based on the desirability of infants employing D themselves in labour; therefore, where you get a contract for labour and you have a remuneration of wages, that contract I think must be taken to be prima facie binding upon the infant. At any rate it is plain that a contract by which an infant binds himself to learn an art or trade to his own future profit is prima facie valid and binding. But no doubt the law has grafted on that general principle certain well-known and defined exceptions. It has been held at law from E the time of LORD COKE and onwards, that an infant cannot bind himself to be liable to a penalty, that the contract to impose a penalty on an infant is void. Again it has been held that a contract by which an infant renders his vested interest subject to forfeiture is void against the infant; and again I think it may be taken that, wherever you find extraordinary or unusual stipulations F contained in a contract either of apprenticeship or of service, there the court at least must be on the watch lest the infant should be held to be bound by a contract which is not reasonable, and which is not good in law and which is not maintainable.

I approach this subject with the observation that it appears to me the question is: Is the contract for the benefit of the infant? Not, Is any one particular stipulation for the benefit of the infant? Because it is obvious that the contract G of apprenticeship or the contract of labour must, like any other contract, contain some stipulations for the benefit of the one contracting party, and some for the benefit of the other. It is not because you can lay your hand on a particular stipulation which you may say is against the infant's benefit that therefore the whole contract is not for the benefit of the infant. The court must look at the whole contract, having regard to the circumstances of the case, and determine H subject to any principles of law which may be ascertained by the cases, whether the contract is or is not beneficial. That appears to me to be in substance a question of fact.

In the present case, I must bear in mind that the two girls who were apprenticed in 1886 were at that time not ignorant of the art of dancing. It appears they had learnt something of it from their mother, who herself had been I connected with the theatre, and also from friends who were familiar with the art of dancing. By this indenture which I have already mentioned, dated December, 1886, the defendant Helen Maude Parnell, with the consent of her parents, put herself apprentice to Signor de Francesco to learn from Dec. 6, 1886, until the full end of the term of seven years thence next following, and the deed contains the usual stipulations with regard to faithful service by the apprentice during that term. There is the further stipulation that she shall not contract matrimony within the said term; and further, that she shall not accept professional engagements unless with the full written permission of her master.

So far, the contract with the exception of the stipulation about matrimony A seems to be of a usual description. But then we come to the clauses by which Signor de Francesco undertakes his duties towards the infant. In the first place, he agrees that he will with qualified assistants instruct the apprentice in what are described as the higher branches of the "choreographic art," which I understand to be dancing, "for the term of seven years." Then he agrees to pay the apprentice

"the following remuneration for all or any choreographic engagements of the said apprentice during the said term, namely in London and suburbs, for the first three years 9d. per night, and 6d. for each matinée, and for the remainder of the said term 1s. per night and 6d. for each matinée."

Then further he shall have the right to engage the apprentice for performances in America or any foreign or colonial State, and shall pay to the apprentice during the maintenance of such engagement abroad the sum of 5s. a week and provide the apprentice with board and lodging during such last-mentioned engagement.

It is obvious that that is a very unusual stipulation. There is no provision for remuneration of any sort or kind except during the engagement. There are no wages to be paid to the girls except during the engagement; the matter therefore rests with Signor de Francesco as to how far these children shall take any wages at all. Besides this it must not be forgotten that he has a right to send these apprentices for performances to any foreign State or foreign country, which is a circumstance which, if exercised, would remove the infants, or probably would remove the infants, from their maternal care. Perhaps it is right on this point that I should say that, so far as the evidence goes, I am satisfied that the establishment of Signor de Francesco is carried on in a thoroughly careful and respectable manner. It appears that whenever the girls go anywhere out of London they are placed under the care of matrons, whose duty it is to look after them, and that a similar care is extended to them when they have been to a performance at the Crystal Palace, when they had to perform the journeys between London and Sydenham. The mother, who was in the witness-box, says explicitly so far as regards the care while the children had been under Signor de Francesco's management she has no complaint to make whatever. I say that by way of parenthesis. At the same time it is obvious that the clause I have read places a very large power indeed in the hands of Signor de Francesco.

The next provision is that if there is not sufficient dancing the apprentice may be required to do utility business and receive certain remuneration. That would not seem unreasonable. Then it is provided,

"The services of the apprentice shall be entirely at the disposal of Signor de Francesco, and the said apprentice shall not during the said term of seven years enter into any professional engagements without the permission in writing of the said"

Signor de Francesco. Be it observed there is no corresponding obligation on the part of Signor de Francesco. He requires the infant to enter into no engagements without his permission, but does not in any corresponding way bind himself to any extent to provide engagements or employment for the infant.

Then comes the provision with regard to the apprentices receiving lessons and a provision as to the rules and regulations of the theatre; they all seem reasonable. Then there is a provision, which is praiseworthy, requiring the infant to conform to the Education Acts; and then comes cl. 8:

"In case the said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco shall at any time during the said term be of opinion (after a fair trial) that the said apprentice is unfit from any cause whatever (either physical or otherwise) to pursue the avocation of stage dancing the said Guiseppe Venuto de Francesco may put an end to these presents and every matter and thing herein contained by

A giving to the parents and the said apprentice notice in writing to that effect."

Be it observed that that clause is provided to operate throughout the whole seven years. It might at any time be enforced subject only to this, that it must be after a fair trial. But what is a fair trial? How long after the fair trial this notice may be given is not stipulated for in any manner whatsoever. B We have, therefore, to put it shortly, the contract under which the infant is placed, I might almost say, absolutely at the disposal of the teacher. The child may be required to undertake any engagements at any theatre in England, or any theatre in the United Kingdom, or anywhere else in the world. The child is to receive no remuneration, no maintenance except when employed, C there is no correlative obligation on Signor de Francesco to find employment for the child, there is power in him to put an end to a child's chances who is under his care at any time during the term or any part of the term.

Those are stipulations of an extraordinary and an unusual character which throw, or appear to throw, an inordinate power into the hands of the master without any correlative obligation on his part. I cannot, therefore, say that D on the face of this instrument it appears to be one which the court ought to hold for the benefit of the infant.

I will suppose myself sitting in chambers administering the jurisdiction in this division of the court over infants, and I ask myself whether I should approve of such a contract as that as being for the benefit of an infant ward of court, assuming of course in so doing the infant ward of court was one whom it was E desirable to apprentice to the art of a ballet dancer. I cannot say that I should hold anything of the kind. It may be that evidence could be tendered which would show me that no other form of contract is available, that the same contract prevails in every school, and that no person can hope to enter the profession of a ballet dancer except by an apprenticeship in these terms. That may be so. But no evidence of the sort has been tendered before me. I have undoubtedly F this in favour of upholding it, that the school of the plaintiff is said by Mrs. Parnell to be a very excellent school, and for anything I know it may be the best in London, and I have already said Signor de Francesco is a person who is well able to and does protect the interests of the girls who are under his care on their tours and so on. At the same time this, it seems to me, does place in his hands an inordinate power which, except under the pressure of some G evidence which has not been given, I cannot help being of opinion is not for the infant's benefit.

I hold, therefore, this instrument is one by which the infants are not bound, and consequently Mr. Barnum, having only enticed them away from an employment or contract of a nature which is not binding upon them, no action can be maintained against Mr. Barnum.

H That really concludes the case, because the same observations cover any suggestion that may be made with regard to Mr. Parravicini and the mother. But, with regard to Mr. Parravicini, it is right I should express an opinion upon the point that has been raised between him and Signor de Francesco. Signor de Francesco relies for his case against Signor Parravicini upon notice which he says he personally gave Parravicini. I come to the conclusion that it has not been I proved to my satisfaction that there was any notice given of the contract entered into, and consequently that Parravicini did nothing whatever with any knowledge of the engagement between the plaintiff and the girls. The result of the whole of the observations I have made is this, that I am bound to dismiss the action against all defendants, with costs to be paid by the plaintiff.

County Court—Practice—Judgment summons—Order for committal of debtor—Direction for payment of debt by instalments—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict., c. 62), s. 5.

Judgment was recovered in the county court against a debtor and an order for payment of a first instalment of £20 was made. The debtor having made default in payment, a judgment summons was issued against him under s. 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, and the county court judge made an order to commit the debtor to prison for ten days, directing that the warrant was not to issue if the debtor paid the £20 by instalments of £4 a month, commencing in fourteen days. The debtor paid the first two instalments and then defaulted, and a warrant for his arrest and commitment was issued against him.

Held: the order made by the county court judge was in respect of the default in payment of the £20 and had no relation to the payment or non-payment of the instalments of £4, and, accordingly, the order of the learned judge and the warrant were valid.

B Appeal by the county court judge from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ.), reported sub. nom. R. v. Brompton County Court Judge, 18 Q.B.D. 213, affirming a decision of the Divisional Court (LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and MANISTY, J.).

C On Jan 7, 1886, in an action of Reeves v. Fowle, which was brought in the Brompton County Court, the plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant for £57 2s. 2d., debt and costs, whereupon an order was made on the defendant to pay that amount by two instalments, the first, of £20, on Jan 21, 1886, and the second, of the balance, on Feb. 21. The defendant made default in payment of the first instalment, and a judgment summons was issued against him under s. 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869. This summons was heard on Mar. 4, and an order was made for the commitment of the defendant. The order, as it appeared in the commitment summons book, was in the following terms: "Commitment ten days; suspended fourteen days." Contemporaneously with the making of this order the judge, in accordance with the usual practice of the court, gave D a verbal direction to the registrar that the warrant was not to issue at all if the defendant paid the amount by instalments of £4 a month, commencing on Mar. 18. The registrar made a note of this direction on a slip of paper in the following terms, "Fourteen days, £4 a month," but did not enter it as part of the order in the commitment summons book. The defendant paid the first two instalments, but, having made default in the payment of the third, a warrant E for his arrest and commitment was issued against him. On June 17, the defendant applied for a copy of the committal order, and received a paper certified by the seal of the court, and admittedly made out by a clerk in the registrar's office of the county court, in which he found that he was to pay monthly instalments of £4, and in default to be committed to prison for ten days. A rule nisi for a prohibition was obtained to restrain all further proceedings on F the committal order of Mar. 4, on the ground that, since the defendant had made default in the payment of the £4 instalments, there had not been the necessary inquiry as to his ability and refusal to pay the instalments. The Divisional Court made the rule for a prohibition absolute, and their decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

H LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case, I desire to say at once that, if I understood the facts to be as assumed by the Lord Chief Justice and by the Court of Appeal, I should entirely agree with the law which they have laid down in their judgments. The two different propositions which have been suggested as guiding the interpretation of the statute are as distinct as anything can be. The Debtors Act, 1869, in that respect giving the jurisdiction to the judges both of the High Court and of the county court, although exercised under I different provisions, has prescribed that there shall be in substance an abolition of imprisonment for debt, but has also provided that, if a debtor, having had the means or having the means at the time when the matter comes for adjudication before either the judge of the High Court or the county court judge, wilfully refuses to pay, or has improperly spent the money which he had after the date of the judgment, and has not applied it as he should have done in honesty for the purpose of satisfying the creditor's claim, there shall then be a jurisdiction, exercised by whichever judge exercises the jurisdiction, of sending him to prison, and that that sending of him to prison shall be a punishment to him for the offence which, on that hypothesis, he has already committed, A inasmuch as the Act specially provides that that imprisonment shall not be in satisfaction of the debt; it is an imprisonment for the offence which he has already committed.

In this particular case, there are two views suggested as being, the one or B the other, the true view of the facts. A certain debt was due by this debtor, and, on Mar. 4, the debtor having been at a previous court ordered to pay £20, the matter is brought before the judge. It is suggested on the one side that what happened was that the learned judge made an inquiry into the means of the debtor and ascertained on that Mar. 4 that he either had had or had at that date (it is immaterial to inquire which) means whereby that debt might have been discharged, and that, having adjudicated that he had or had had C that £20, he had refused or neglected to pay it, and that thereupon the learned judge directed an order for his commitment for ten days for the offence which at that date, namely, Mar. 4, was already consummate, but that he gave a direction to the registrar of the court, in consequence of something which passed between the plaintiff and the defendant in the cause, that, although that warrant of commitment might then and there have issued because the offence had already D been committed, yet it might be suspended and not put into execution if the debtor paid £4 a month in discharge of the debt which he had so owed, and had so wilfully refused or neglected to pay.

If that is the true view of the facts, it does not appear to be doubted that that was within the legal competency of the judge. What happened afterwards, whether the debtor had means or had not, whether he did comply with the E conditions into which he had entered or not, could in logic or good sense have no relation to the offence which, on Mar. 4, was already consummate. But the parties, with the assent of the judge, appear to have agreed that the extreme rigour of the law might be relaxed if, instead of continuing his refusal or neglect to pay, the debtor would comply with what the plaintiff in the cause was satisfied with, namely, the gradual wiping off of the debt by the payment of £4 a month. F
And I do not think that any one observation of the learned judges in the courts below, with the single exception perhaps of LOPES, L.J., seems to throw any doubt on such a course being legal. LOPES, L.J., however, rather indicates that it might be a sort of circuitous evasion of the Act of Parliament. I do not share his doubt. On the other hand, it is suggested that the facts of the case were these: that the £20 being due the parties appeared before the learned G judge, and that the learned judge made no order for commitment for the non-payment of the £20, because, as the whole thing took place on Mar. 4, I suppose it would be too unreasonable and absurd to suppose that he made two contradictory orders at the same time; that what he did was to make a substituted order with regard to the £20 with which the previous order had dealt, and to reduce the amount payable to instalments of £4 a month. H

The question of fact for your Lordships to determine on those materials resolves itself into this question: What was it that the learned judge did at that date, and was there any substituted order made? I have no doubt that the learned judge would, under the Debtors Act, have the power and authority to make such a substituted order had he been so minded. But the answer appears to me to be overwhelmingly conclusive. There is not a fragment of evidence I of any such order having been made at all. On the contrary, in the form which is relied on in argument by the respondent, "I hereby certify that the above is a true copy of an entry in the summonses for commitment, interpleader, and minute of orders thereon," I find that every one of the entries included in that certificate is absolutely inconsistent with the existence of any such order as it is suggested to your Lordships was made. I find that the amount for which the summons was issued was £20. I find that the order is not an order for £4, with the additional direction that if not paid the person is to be A committed; but I find, "Commitment ten days; suspended fourteen days." What does that mean? If the order which is now suggested was made, namely, that the instalment was altered from £20 to £4, and that that was to be paid in future, how could there be any commitment for ten days? There was no default made, and the commitment for ten days would have been totally in-B appropriate, for the judge could not possibly anticipate that the order would not be obeyed.

When one looks at the order which was ultimately issued, it appears to be very clear in its terms. Those terms are: "Whereas the defendant hath made default in payment of," what? "of £20 16s."—the odd 16s. being the cost of the hearing, I suppose—

C "And whereas a summons was, at the instance of the plaintiff, duly issued out of this court, by which the defendant was required to appear personally at this court on the 4th day of March, 1886, to be examined on oath touching the means he had then, or had had since the date of the judgment, to satisfy the sum then due and payable in pursuance of the judgment, and to show cause why he should not be committed to prison for such default. And whereas, at the hearing of the said summons it has now been proved to the satisfaction of the court that the defendant now has [or has had] since the date of the judgment, the means to pay the sum then due and payable in pursuance of the judgment, and has refused [or neglected] to pay the same, and the defendant has shown no cause why he should not be committed to prison: Now, therefore, it is ordered that E for such default as aforesaid [for the nonpayment of the £20 which he had the means of paying on Mar. 4] the defendant shall be committed to prison for ten days."

Every document in the cause appears to me to bear the same meaning. The F judge's note is, "C," meaning committed, for "ten days," "S.W.," suspended warrant, for "fourteen days." And even this document, on which so much reliance has been placed, drawn up by the registrar, or noted rather on a scrap of paper having apparently no particular relation to the forms of the court,
"10 S. 14-4," seems to be in exact accordance with the note of the learned judge.
I read that to mean "10," ten days' commitment; "S," suspend; "14," fourteen G days; and then at the bottom "4," £4, not £4 a month; the word "month" does not occur. What I should understand that to mean was that the order had then been made by the judge for commitment for ten days, but that it was to be suspended for fourteen days, and that the condition on which the warrant was to lie in the office and not to be given out to the high bailiff for execution was the payment of £4.

H If that is the true view of the matter, what is the error, what is the mischief, what is the objection on the part of the defendant, of which he has a right to complaint? He is not being adjudicated, as counsel for the respondent put it, in default for his not having paid the £4 at the end of the fourteen days, but what he is adjudicated as guilty of contempt for, and what he is sent to prison for, is what the judge has found as a fact on the judicial evidence before him, I namely, that, on Mar. 4, he had, or had had, the £20, and did not pay it. I cannot help thinking that some confusion has been created by the ambiguous use of the word "order," without describing what order, and of the word "direction," without describing what direction. This was an order of commitment for ten days for the nonpayment of the £20 on Mar. 4, and has no relation to the payment or the nonpayment of the £4 at any subsequent date. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that the learned judge had full jurisdiction to make the order, which, in fact, I find he did make, and, if so, of course, this writ of prohibition cannot be sustained.

I desire to say one word as to the letter of the solicitor on the one side, and the reply of the person professing to act under the orders of the court on the other. It seems to me to have been an irregular proceeding from beginning to end. The solicitor had no right to write such a letter; the registrar had no right to make any such reply. The registrar was thereby taking on himself to give an exposition in contradiction of what the judge's order really was, and I cannot help thinking that that letter bears on the face of it a sort of invitation to the registrar to fall into the trap, which, as it appears to me, he has fallen into. I only desire to say on that matter that I should regard it as certainly a novelty in our jurisprudence if the regular order of a learned judge could be affected, or qualified, or altered in the slightest degree by what some subordinate officer of the court thought proper to say in writing about it, even though in so doing he committed this additional irregularity, that to that private correspondence he thought proper to affix the seal of the court.

For these reasons, I move your Lordships that the judgment of the court below be reversed, and that this appeal be allowed with costs.

LORD WATSON concurred.

LORD BRAMWELL.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. There is one observation which I should like to make, partly owing to what was said by the learned counsel who followed senior counsel for the respondent. No doubt the county court judges have to do their business in a considerable hurry, and especially such business as this, as I can well testify from my own experience of these things. They cannot give them that elaborate discussion which is perhaps desirable. But I think that a county court judge would do wrong if, merely because both parties were willing to give time, as was done here, he should adjudicate that the man had means, and had made default. I think that that would be wrong. At the same time, if the whole conduct of the parties before him was such as to recognise that the man had had means, the county court judge might well adjudicate without any specific proof of it. I think that it is important to bear in mind that an adjudication of committal ought clearly only to take place where there has been a wilful default in payment; because in truth this power of committal is not an imprisonment for debt, it is an imprisonment for past dishonesty, together with the prospect of the plaintiff getting his money. I quite agree that, for the reasons which have been given, we ought to decide that there was here a finding by the county court judge that the debtor had had the means and had made a default in paying the amount, and an adjudication that for that default he should go to prison for ten days, but there was a direction at the same time that the execution of that order should be respited or delayed, and that it should not be executed at all if payment were made according to the instalments which were mentioned.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I quite agree. I am not surprised altogether at the view taken by the learned judges in the court below of the facts, considering the way in which the case was presented to them and the admissions or statements which were made by the learned counsel who appeared on behalf of the county court judge. I think that we have probably an advantage which they had not with regard to arriving at a correct view of the facts of the case. I should be extremely sorry to throw any doubt on the view which was expressed by LORD ESHER, M.R., in conformity with that which he said had been entertained by WILLES, J. (Re The Debtors Act (1)), and had been acted on by the judges, but I think that, in the present case, there was an inquiry as to the means of the debtor; there was the conclusion that he was in default; there was an order for his commitment in respect of that default; and all that was done further was that, in mercy to the person declared liable to suffer imprisonment, he was allowed an opportunity of escaping from that liability, provided he made certain payments. I do not think that it is material how the amount of those payments was arrived at, whether it was according to what the judge thought he would be able to pay, which was perfectly consistent with his having been in default in respect of past nonpayment, or whether it was according to what the plaintiff was willing to take. I do not think that we need enter into those motives at all, because I do not think that it was in respect of the nonpayment of that sum that any proceedings were about to be taken to cause the debtor to suffer imprisonment, which led to this application for a prohibition.

But I desire to say this with regard especially to what was urged by junior counsel for the respondent, that I think that a judge would very much neglect his duty if, in order to save himself the trouble of inquiring whether there was default, and whether the man had possessed the means of making payment of the instalments down to that time ordered, he were to issue a warrant of commitment with a stipulation for suspending it if some smaller sums were paid, without having really arrived at the conclusion that there had been default. I think that that would be a most irregular and improper proceeding, and one which might very well be called in question. I think that it would be an abuse, but, if there has been really in good faith a determination and adjudication of a past default, then I cannot see that the case is really open to the objections which have been raised.

LORD MACNAGHTEN concurred.

Passing Off—Wrapping of goods—Goods wrapped by defendants in similar way to plaintiffs'—Account of profits—Sales by plaintiffs to retailers and by defendants to wholesalers.

Both the plaintiffs and the defendants were soap manufacturers, the plaintiffs selling their produce to retailers and the defendants selling theirs to wholesalers. The defendants began to sell soap in wrappers which bore a close resemblance to the wrappers on soap made by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants selling soap in these wrappers and an account of profits from the defendants.

Held: on the facts the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction; with regard to an account, the defendants had put into the hands of the wholesalers to whom they sold their soap the means of committing a fraud on the plaintiffs by selling the defendants' soap as that of the plaintiffs, and, therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to an account of the profits which the defendants had made by the sale of their soap to wholesalers in the wrappers complained of.

Appeal by the defendants from an order of CHITTY, J., in an action brought by the plaintiffs for infringement of their trade mark and for selling soap in such wrappers as to pass it off as being soap of the plaintiffs' manufacture. The learned judge dismissed the action so far as it related to the infringement of the trade mark, but gave judgment for the plaintiffs on the ground of the defendants passing off their goods as being those of the plaintiffs' manufacture and granted an injunction restraining the defendants from selling, offering for sale, or disposing of, any soap not manufactured by or for the plaintiffs in the wrappers in question. The judge further directed an account of the profits made by the defendants in selling or disposing of soap made by or for the defendants in any wrapper such as that contained in certain marked exhibits. No question as to the form of this account was raised before CHITTY, J. D E

The plaintiffs sold their soap to retail dealers in packets which did not bear their name, but were wrapped up in a special kind of paper known as parchment paper, of which they were almost the only users, with space printing calling the soap "Sunlight Self-washer" or "Sunlight Self-washing." Early in 1885 the defendants commenced to sell their soap in packets of the same size and shape, wrapped in the same kind of paper, with spaced printing of the same colour as that of the plaintiffs, describing the soap as "Goodwin's Self-washing Soap." The general appearance of these packets was very like those of the plaintiffs, though, if put side by side, there was no difficulty in distinguishing them. The defendants did not carry on a retail business. F G

Romer, Q.C., Lockwood, Q.C., and John Cutler for the plaintiffs. H

COTTON, L.J.—There are two questions here, first of all, whether CHITTY, J., was right in granting an injunction against the defendants; secondly, if that be decided against the defendants, what ought to have been the form of the decree as regards profits?

Consider what this case is. Undoubtedly it is complicated by the fact that when the plaintiffs, who are wholesale manufacturers of soap, commenced their action, they were on the register for, and considered themselves entitled to, the trade mark of the words "Self-washer" and "Self-washing." They claimed to protect that trade mark by their action; but it was not a proper trade mark, and has since that time been struck off the register. The plaintiffs also raised this case: "You, the defendants, are selling your soap in a wrapper and dress which represents it to be our soap, and therefore, on the old common law doctrine enforced in courts of equity by injunction, we ask to restrain you from passing

A off your goods as our goods." [His LORDSHIP referred to the adoption by the defendants, about the end of 1884, of a way of making up their soap in packets having a great general resemblance to those of the plaintiffs.] What was the contention on behalf of the defendants? Looking at the two tablets, one cannot but see that there is a strong resemblance between them, and especially to the eyes of people who cannot read. But counsel for the defendants' contention
B was this: there is no trade mark in "Self-washing" or "Self-washer;" there is no monopoly in this parchment paper; there is no monopoly in the spaced printing; then why should we be restrained in carrying on business, from using those things as to which the plaintiffs cannot claim any monopoly? That is an obvious fallacy. There may be no monopoly at all in the individual things, but
C if they are so combined by the defendants as to pass off the defendants' goods as the plaintiffs', then the defendants have brought themselves within the old common law doctrine, in respect of which equity will give to the aggrieved party an injunction, in order to restrain the defendants from passing off their goods as those of the plaintiffs.

Is there, then, here enough to show that the defendants' soap was represented as manufactured by the plaintiffs? It is in evidence that, as a matter of fact, up
D to this time, soap for sale had scarcely ever been wrapped in parchment paper except by the plaintiffs. It is in evidence also that, although this spaced printing was used as regards groceries, it was not used as regards soap, except by the plaintiffs. That being so, can we come to any other conclusion than this—that the use of this paper and the use of this particular printing was
E intended to represent these goods as the goods of the plaintiffs, which had become known in the market, and would, in my opinion, induce people who do not when they buy an article look carefully to see what the particular mark or name upon it is, to consider, when they got handed down to them one of the tablets of the defendants in this new dress, that they were getting the same soap as they had been accustomed to buy in this kind of packet.

The principal argument on behalf of the defendants was that the essential
F marks in the two packets are "Sunlight Self-washer" in the one case, "Goodwin's Self-washing Soap" in the other; and that the name is that which would guide everyone who bought this soap. In my opinion that argument is wrong. It is very true that Goodwin's name appears as the maker or the wholesale seller of this particular soap; but it is quite contrary to experience, and quite contrary
G to the evidence, to suppose that everyone when buying a packet of tabular soap would look to the name for the purpose of determining whether what he has bought is that which he has been accustomed to buy in a very similar packet. I do not for a moment suggest that the plaintiffs could have absolutely restrained the use of the words "Self-washing," nor do I say that they could absolutely have H restrained the defendants from having the spaced printing, or from the use of the parchment paper; but when we find that, as regards soap for sale, they were almost exclusively used by the plaintiffs, we cannot but see that this combination is calculated to induce people to believe that what they were buying, which was the defendants' soap, was what they had known and appreciated—namely, the plaintiffs' soap. In my opinion, the injunction was right.

Ought there to be an alteration as regards the account of profits? Junior
I counsel for the defendants referred us to cases on the question of damages. In my opinion, those cases are not relevant to the question as to the form of the account of profits. It is well known that both in trade mark cases and patent cases, the plaintiff is entitled, if he succeeds in getting an injunction, to take either of two forms of relief. He may say either: "I claim from you the damages I have sustained from your wrongful act," or: "I claim from you the profits which you have made by your wrongful act." Counsel contended that the only profit which the plaintiff could call for was that profit which arose from the sale of this soap where the ultimate purchaser bought it, not as the defendants' but as the plaintiffs' soap. In my opinion, that is mistaking the whole gist of this action. The defendants, as I understand, do not sell anything to retail purchasers; they sell to middlemen, that is to say, to people who purchase from them as wholesale merchants, and are going to re-sell by retail. The complaint against the defendants is this: "You have dressed your soap in such a dress that those middlemen to whom you sell it are enabled, by its having that deceptive dress upon it, to sell it to the ultimate purchasers as the soap of the plaintiffs." The profit for which the defendants must account is the profit which they have made by the sale of soap in that fraudulent dress to the middlemen. It is immaterial how the middlemen deal with it. If they find it for their benefit not to use it fraudulently, but to sell the soap to the purchasers from them as Goodwin's that cannot affect the question whether the sale by the defendants to those middlemen of this soap in a fraudulent dress was a wrongful act. It still remains a wrongful act, because it puts into the hands of the middlemen the means of committing a fraud on the plaintiffs by selling the soap of the defendants as the soap of the plaintiffs. In my opinion, therefore, the account of profits was right as it stands.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the main question, I think the case is plain and easy, and it may be rested upon the defendants' own evidence and upon the appearance of the packages. What is called the general "get up," which is an expression used by some of the witnesses, is so similar that obviously the one might easily be mistaken for the other. Of course in all these cases there are differences as well as resemblances, and the question, so far as the packages are concerned, must always be decided by contrasting the striking resemblances with the striking differences. The only difference which strikes me at all is this—that Goodwin has substituted the word "Goodwin" in large letters for "Sunlight." That is the whole difference which catches the eye. Then look at the resemblances; look at the paper; look at the printing; look at the blank space, and the catch words; look at the whole thing, and it is impossible not to arrive at the conclusion not only that one was intended to pass for the other, but that that intention has been realised. I say that apart from the evidence. If you look at the evidence, it comes out clearly and strongly that the defendants' soap is often bought under the belief that it is the plaintiffs' soap, and it is of no use to point out the differences, which of course may be perceived when attention is drawn to them.

The question raised by junior counsel for the defendants as to profits and the form of the account, struck me as somewhat novel and deserving of attention; but, having looked at Edelsten v. Edelsten (1), and having regard to the reasons given in the judgment of LORD WESTBURY in that case, I am satisfied that CHITTY, J., was right, and for the reasons which have been given I am of opinion that the appeal fails.

BOWEN, L.J. I am of the same opinion.

Bill of Sale—Assignment of chattels to be acquired in futuro—"In or about the same or other premises of assignor"—"Whether brought there in substitution for, or renewal of, or in addition to" specifically assigned goods—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict., c. 43), s. 9, Sched.

Bill of Sale—Form—Validity of bill substantially in accordance with statutory form—No departure in any material respect.

A bill of sale which purports to assign chattels which are not then in the possession of the grantor but may thereafter be acquired by him is void under s. 9 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, as not being in accordance with the form prescribed by the schedule to that Act, whether such future or after acquired property is brought on the premises on which the specifically assigned goods are at the time of the grant of the bill, or any other premises on which those goods, or any part of them, might be, and whether the future property is in substitution for, or renewal of, or in addition to, the specifically assigned goods.

Per LORD FITZGERALD: I do not think that the legislature intended by the words "in accordance with the form in the schedule" [in s. 9 of the Act of 1882] a literal conformity with the statutable form of the bill of sale. I adopt the view that it is sufficient if the bill of sale is substantially in accordance with and does not depart from the prescribed form in any material respect.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., FRY and LOPES, L.J.J.), reported sub nom. Kelly v. Kellond Thomas, claimant, 20 Q.B.D. 569, affirming a decision of the Divisional Court (LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and DENMAN, J.), on an appeal from a county court upon a case remitted under s. 17 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1884. H

In August, 1886, Kellond, a grocer and oil and colour merchant, mortgaged to the appellant Thomas, for £40, all the goods scheduled to a bill of sale,

“together with all other chattels and things the property of the [assignor], now in and about [his] premises . . . and also all chattels and things which may at any time during the continuance of this security be in or about the same or any other premises of the mortgagor . . . whether brought there in substitution for, or renewal of, or in addition to, the chattels and things hereby assigned, by way of security for the payment of the £40 and interest” I

It was stipulated that, if the mortgagee should become entitled to seize the goods assigned, he might enter upon any premises where the goods might be, and might remove and sell them. In January, 1887, Kelly and Baker having recovered

A judgment against Kellond, the sheriff seized the goods in question under a writ of execution in satisfaction of such judgment. Thomas claimed the goods from the sheriff by virtue of his bill of sale, whereupon the sheriff took out an interpleader summons, and an issue was directed between the claimant Thomas and the execution creditors Kelly and Baker. Upon the trial of the issue JUDGE STONOR, at Marylebone County Court, found in favour of the execution creditors upon the ground that the bill of sale was void for non-compliance with the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, inasmuch as it included substituted or after-acquired goods, and barred the claimant. The Divisional Court affirmed that judgment, and gave leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal, which dismissed the claimant's appeal.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

July 16, 1888. The following opinions were read.

D LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I cannot say that any construction of this obscure statute seems completely satisfactory or gives an adequate solution to all the difficulties suggested in the argument. I certainly do not mean to express any opinion upon the numerous cases which have been brought under review, except so far as may be necessary to determine this case. I do not think it can be seriously doubted that the statute did intend to make void absolutely, and not merely against all but the grantor, every bill of sale given by way of security for money unless it was made in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Act. Some faint effort was made in the argument to suggest that the word "void" in s. 9 must be read as a repetition of the same word in ss. 4 and 5, and that, therefore, we must by construction add the words "except as against the grantor." That such a construction would involve the necessity of adding words, and that it would involve the necessity of supposing that the legislature meant to express the same thing in the same statute by two wholly different sets of phrases, would be enough to condemn it as untenable.

G But whatever else is obscure in the statute, this is plain, that it did intend to place a restriction upon the form of a bill of sale, and that it did intend to make a departure from the form fatal to the bill of sale which should contain it. Further, I think that s. 9 must be construed to enact not only what a bill of sale must contain, but also what it must not contain, so that the statute must be understood to have prohibited bills of sale of personal chattels as security for money to which the form given by the statute is not appropriate. It is, however, true that the form given is so far elastic that the statute does not make every word imperative, but H provides that no form shall be permitted except one made "in accordance with the form in the schedule." The degree of latitude involved in these words it would be difficult, perhaps impossible, to define. It is, in my view, only necessary to apply them to the concrete case, and, applying the test of the statute as a test, to see whether the bill of sale challenged is within or without the line prescribed by the statute. No one, of course, can be insensible to the difficulties so acutely I pressed upon your Lordships by both the learned counsel who argued the case for the appellant; and undoubtedly the only answer that I can find is that suggested by FRY, L.J., [that a form of bill of sale which would be different in its operation and effect from a bill in the form in the Schedule to the Act was not in accordance with that form]. That answer has this to recommend it, that if adopted it does give a meaning to each part of the statute, and that the distinction between the body of the deed and the schedule is one well warranted by a comparison of the wording of ss. 4, 5, and 9 in which certainly the bill of sale is distinguished from the schedule to which the earlier sections refer.

I own I have had great difficulty in dealing with sub-s. (2) of s. 6. It undoubtedly seems to indicate that goods not capable of specific description, and to be afterwards supplied, may nevertheless be so included in the security as yet not to make the bill of sale void. But if one supposes the assignment to be of all such goods as are the subject of the provision in question, and that in the schedule they were properly described, but added thereto were the words which give rise to the argument, namely, such goods as should be in substitution thereof, the form of the deed would be in accordance with the statute, though the schedule should contemplate substituted articles. I have come to the conclusion, not without great difficulty, that it is possible to suppose a present assignment to apply to goods properly described as presently existing goods, but which, when one looks to the schedule, one finds are nevertheless not presently assigned but are to be substituted for them. It is to be observed that ss. 4 and 5 are only referred to in s. 6, and the statute must be supposed to have some meaning in this specific reference.

Applying the principles I have suggested, there can be no difficulty in the decision of this case. An essential condition of the deed appears to me to be a present assignment of goods capable of specific description and present assignment (see definition in the Act of 1878). It is obvious that a bill of sale which purports to assign after-acquired property, whether in the form of a covenant (its true legal effect) or as stated specifically in words as part of the security is not in accordance with the "form," and, therefore, void. I doubt whether the reason why it is void is adequately given when it is said that such property is incapable of specific description. I think it also introduces a covenant not in accordance with the form; and the form is here, in my judgment, intended to be exhaustive of what may or may not be included in such a deed. This bill of sale purports to assign all the chattels specifically described, and then

"all other chattels and things the property of the mortgagor now in and about the premises known as 119 Shirland Road, Paddington, in the county of Middlesex; and also all chattels and things which may at any time during the continuance of this security be in or about the same or any other premises of the mortgagor (to which the said chattels or things, or any part thereof, may have been removed), whether brought there in substitution for, or renewal of, or in addition to, the chattels and things hereby assigned, by way of security for the payment of the said sum of £40 and interest thereon at the rate of 60 per cent. per annum."

It would be impossible to imagine words apparently more designedly contrived to sweep up everything of which the mortgagor might at any time thereafter become possessed. It appears to me that, whatever else was permitted by the bills of sale contemplated by the statute, it never could have been intended that words so wide, whatever legal effect may be given to such words, could have been permitted so as to render it possible for a lender of money to have a claim against all future property, either on the premises upon which the assigned goods then were or on any other premises upon which those goods, or any part of them, might thereafter be—any goods, not only in substitution for or renewal of, but in addition to, any goods that the mortgagor was then possessed of.

I have, therefore, no difficulty whatever in saying that this bill of sale is absolutely outside the limit of interpretation which can be properly given to the language in the form prescribed by the statute, and, consequently, in holding that this bill of sale is void. I, accordingly, move your Lordships that the order appealed from be affirmed, and that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD FITZGERALD.—The bill of sale on the validity of which your Lordships are called on now to decide has written thereon a schedule containing an inventory of some, but not all, "of the personal chattels comprised in it," and though objections have been raised to that schedule on the allegation that in some par-

A particulars it is insufficient, yet we assume for the purposes of the present case that, so far as it extends, the personal chattels "are specifically described in the said schedule." The instrument, however, professes to assign other goods not described in the schedule—viz., (i) in the passage which the Lord Chancellor has just read,

B "all other chattels and things the property of the mortgagor now in and about the premises known as 119 Shirland Road;"

and (ii), which may be called an attempt to assign after-acquired property,

C "and also all chattels and things which may at any time during the continuance of this security be in or about the same or any other premises of the mortgagor (to which the said chattels or things, or any part thereof, may have been removed), whether brought there in substitution for, or renewal of, or in addition to, the chattels and things hereby assigned, by way of security for the payment of the said sum of £40 and interest thereon at the rate of 60 per cent. per annum."

D The schedule does not include any description of the personal goods comprised in (i) and does not, and it obviously could not, give any specific description of the subjects which might come within (ii) as after-acquired property. We assume for the purposes of the present decision that, if it had not been for the assignment in the bill of sale of the goods mentioned in (i) and (ii), the instrument and the E schedule to it would have been sufficient within the provisions of s. 9 of the Act of 1882 and the bill of sale in accordance with the form given in the schedule to that Act.

The question is whether those additional matters which are not to be found in the statutable form render it invalid as not being "made in accordance with the form in the schedule." Thirty-four years have elapsed since the passing of the F Bills of Sale Act, 1854. It was amended by the Bills of Sale Act, 1866, and the two were repealed by the Act of 1878, which is still the leading Act, though altered and amended in some particulars by the Act of 1882. The title and preamble of the Act of 1854, carried on as they are by the subsequent Acts, still afford some light. The whole code is designed to prevent frauds on creditors (i.e. the public), and also to protect the borrower from the exercise of oppressive powers on the part
G of the lender. The Act of 1854 seems to have dealt only with bills of sale of existing goods capable of being seized and taken possession of, which might be the subjects of "ostensible ownership." It does not seem to have contemplated that a bill of sale as such could apply to goods not in existence, and which might never exist. The definitions in that Act of "bills of sale" and "personal chattels" and the exclusions from these definitions lead to that conclusion.

H The definition of "bill of sale" in the Act of 1878 is very large, and intended to meet the devices by which the previous Acts had been evaded; but, according to judicial decision, it was interpreted to include as bills of sale instruments which, departing from the old simplicity of the common law, professed to assign after-acquired property. The amending Act of 1882 was probably intended (inter alia)
I to limit the evils arising from attempts to bind future-acquired property. The Bill which eventuated in the Act of 1882 received the most critical consideration from the most capable men of the day, both in 1881 in the House of Commons and in 1882 in Select Committees of both Houses of Parliament, aided by the answers to a circular sent to judges and registrars as to the operation of and defects, if any, in the Act of 1878. It was apparently intended to put an end to the almost interminable controversies which had arisen on the previous Acts.

The Act of 1882 has not had in the latter respect the effect which the legislature intended. We have now to consider some of the provisions of that Act. It is an amending Act, and so far as is consistent with the tenor thereof is to be construed as one with the principal Act (the Act of 1878). By s. 3 : A

“The expression ‘bill of sale’ have the same meaning as in the [Act of 1878] except as to bills of sale or other documents mentioned in s. 4 of the [Act of 1878], which may be given otherwise than by way of security for the payment of money, to which last-mentioned bills of sale and other documents this Act shall not apply.” B

It leaves such instruments to the Act of 1878; the Act of 1882 is not to apply to them. We thus see that the provisions of the Act of 1882 which your Lordships have now to interpret are limited to the ordinary and simple transactions of everyday life specified in s. 9. C

A sale of goods, or grant or mortgage of goods, could at common law be effected without writing, but it should be accompanied by possession and an assignment of non-existent property, that is, of property which might or might not be acquired in the future, was at common law inoperative. If, however, it was for value it was in equity regarded as a contract of which specific performance might be enforced when (if ever) the thing came into actual existence. The bill of sale before your Lordships is one “made by way of security for the payment of money,” which s. 9 declares “shall be void unless made in accordance with” the statutory form. The bill of sale is to be between the parties directly—that is to say, between, on the one hand, the borrower, and, on the other, the lender; and the “form” seems to have been intended to attain, first, certainty and simplicity; secondly, the statement of the consideration—a sum in moneys numbered, and (reading the language of the form) “now paid to” the grantor, the receipt of which the grantor thereby acknowledges; thirdly, that the assignment is confined to the chattels and things specifically described in the schedule thereto annexed; fourthly, that it shall be by way of security for the same sum then advanced with interest at a specified rate to be repaid to the grantee, with the interest then due, by equal payments on fixed days; fifthly, the insertion of the terms which the parties have agreed to for the maintenance of the security or its defeasance; and sixthly, the incorporation by reference of the provisions of s. 7, which restrict the right of the grantee to take possession. D
F

Does the bill of sale before your Lordships conform to the provisions of the statute? Is it in accordance with the “form”? I do not think that the legislature intended by the words “in accordance” a literal conformity with the statutable form of the bill of sale. I adopt the view of BOWEN, L.J., that it is sufficient if the bill of sale is substantially in accordance with and does not depart from the prescribed form in any material respect. I concur in the opinion expressed by the Lord Chancellor (and on this I have never had any doubt) that this bill of sale is not in conformity with the statute and varies from the “form” in material and substantial particulars to which I have already alluded, and the noble and learned Lord has stated them in detail. The result follows, that it is void against all parties. G
H

In Ex parte Stanford (1), BOWEN, L.J., in laying down a rule of construction as the judgment of the whole six judges of the Court of Appeal, says (17 Q.B.D. at p. 270) :

“A divergence only becomes substantial or material when it is calculated to give the bill of sale a legal consequence or effect either greater or smaller than that which would attach to it if drawn in the form which has been sanctioned.” I

He adds (ibid. at p. 271) :

“We must consider whether the instrument as drawn will, in virtue either of addition or omission, have any legal effect which either goes beyond or falls short of that which would result from the statutory form.”

A That he states to be the rule of construction. I should hesitate to criticise a proposition coming from a tribunal so important and so weightily constituted. I am not now called on to do so; nor shall I say more than that I am not now to be taken as adopting in all its terms that rule of construction as affording an inclusive as well as an exclusive test. As to the question whether the general words of s. 9 are to be restrained by the language of ss. 4 and 5, I have only to
 B say that I agree with your Lordship and with the reasoning of FRY, L.J., in the present case. The bill of sale in the present case is on a printed form, and contains in print the passages which have raised the objection. It seems like a sweep-net adopted after the decision in Roberts v. Roberts (2) in 1884; but now the decision of the Court of Appeal in this case, affirmed by your Lordships,
 C prohibits in effect the assignment of future-acquired property in bills of sale coming within s. 9 of the Act of 1882; and I may add that it accomplishes a most desirable result.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—To say that the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, is well drawn, or that its meaning is reasonably clear, would be to affirm a proposition to which I think few lawyers would subscribe, and one which D seems to be contradicted by the mass of litigation which the Act has produced and is producing every day. For my own part, the more I have occasion to study the Act, the more convinced I am that it is beset with difficulties which can only be removed by legislation. At the same time, I cannot help thinking that some of the puzzles which were presented in the course of the argument disappear if the scope of the Act is steadily kept in view.

E The Act of 1882, as well as the Act of 1878, is concerned only with assurances of personal chattels. The expression “personal chattels” is strictly defined in the Act of 1878 [s. 4]. The Act says :

“The expression ‘personal chattels’ shall mean goods, furniture, and other articles capable of complete transfer by delivery, and (when separately assigned or charged) fixtures and growing crops. . . .”
 F

Then follows an enumeration of things which, subject to one exception in the case of trade machinery, are not included in the expression “personal chattels.” The Act of 1882 adopts the definition in the earlier Act [s. 3], but deals with it in certain particulars by way of explanation or modification. As regards growing crops, it explains, with perhaps unnecessary caution, that the expression is con-
 G fined to crops actually growing at the time when the bill of sale is executed [s. 6 (1)]. As regards fixtures separately assigned or charged (with which the Act couples plant and trade machinery), it seems to extend the definition of personal chattels to fixtures, plant, and trade machinery, used in, attached to, or brought upon any land, factory, or other place in substitution for any of the like fixtures, plant, or trade machinery, specifically described in the schedule to the bill
 H of sale [s. 6 (2)]. This appears to be the meaning of the Act, because s. 4 clearly imports that a bill of sale to which the Act of 1882 applies may “have effect” in respect of the chattels mentioned in s. 6 (2). That can only be if such chattels are brought into the category of personal chattels as defined by the Act.

Notwithstanding a remark made by LORD CHELMSFORD in Holroyd v. Marshall (3), which obviously was not required for the decision of the case, I am disposed to
 I think that the expression “capable of complete transfer by delivery” means capable of such transfer at the time when the bill of sale is executed. That was the view of the Divisional Court consisting of BRETT and ARCHIBALD, JJ., in Bran- tom v. Griffiths (4). BRETT, J., there said (1 C.P.D. at p. 354) :

“The Act [of 1854] only applies to things which at the moment when the bill of sale is given, and the provisions of the Act are to be applied to it, might be delivered to the assignee and are not, but are left in the enjoyment of the assignor.”

ARCHIBALD, J. concurred. He said (ibid. at p. 357):

“The application of the statute must be limited to articles of which possession could have been given to the vendee, and which are capable of removal.”

I am the more inclined to adopt this view of the meaning of the expression “capable of complete transfer by delivery,” because the decision in Brantom v. Griffiths (4), was standing unchallenged when the Act of 1878 was passed, and must have engaged the attention of the framers of that Act. The Act repeats with some few alterations the definition of “personal chattels” contained in the Act of 1854. The only alterations are consequent upon the decision in Meux v. Jacobs (5), and the decision in this very case of Brantom v. Griffiths (4).

If this view be correct, the definition of “personal chattels” excludes future or after-acquired chattels, for the simple reason that they are not capable of transfer by delivery. Neither the Act of 1878 nor the Act of 1882 prohibits the assignment of future or after-acquired chattels any more than the assignment of existing personal property, which may not come within the definition of personal chattels, but the assignment of such property and the assignment of future or after-acquired property are entirely outside the scope of the Bills of Sale Acts. Under the Act of 1878 an assurance of things not within the description of personal chattels, as defined by the Act, was none the better for being in a registered bill of sale. On the other hand, a bill of sale under the Act of 1878 was none the worse for including in its terms an assurance of things not coming within the definition of personal chattels.

The question on this appeal is whether, under the Act of 1882, a bill of sale is void which includes in the body of the instrument an assignment of future or after-acquired chattels, as well as an assignment in general terms of existing chattels in or about the mortgagor's premises other than those specifically described in the schedule. In the present case the future or after-acquired chattels do not seem to be within the protection of s. 6. But, in my view of the Act, nothing turns upon that circumstance. The Act of 1882 gives a form of bill of sale, and declares (s. 9):

“A bill of sale made or given by way of security for the payment of money by the grantor thereof shall be void unless made in accordance with the form in the schedule to this Act annexed.”

This section seems to me to deal with form and form only. So purely is it, I venture to think, a question of form, that I should be inclined to doubt whether a bill of sale would not be void which omitted the proviso referring to s. 7, though I cannot see that the omission would alter the legal effect of the document in the slightest degree, or mislead anybody.

It has been held, and I think rightly, that s. 9 does not require a bill of sale to be a verbal and literal transcript of the statutory form. The words of the Act are, “in accordance with the form” not “in the form.” But then comes the question: When is an instrument which purports to be a bill of sale not in accordance with the statutory form? Possibly when it departs from the statutory form in anything which is not merely a matter of verbal difference. Certainly I should say when it departs from the statutory form in anything which is a characteristic of that form. It seems to me that, if there is any one thing which is plainly and obviously a characteristic of the statutory form, it is that in the body of the instrument there is no substantive description of the things intended to be assigned. Following the directions contained in s. 4, the statutory form relegates to a schedule the description of the personal chattels intended to be comprised in the bill of sale. It probably would not be difficult to suggest reasons more or less satisfactory why the legislature should require an inventory of the personal chattels comprised in a bill of sale, and require that inventory to be contained in a schedule. It is convenient to have the things which are the subject of assignment specified in a list,

A so that one may see at a glance what is and what is not included. Besides, it has become very much the practice to use printed forms of bills of sale. An illiterate person might naturally take it for granted that everything that was in print was right, and then he might afterwards find himself bound to terms which were never really brought to his notice, especially since the Act of 1882 has repealed the provision requiring the attestation of a solicitor and a certificate by the solicitor that he had explained the effect of the bill of sale to the grantor. However that may be—whatever reasons may have influenced the legislature—it seems to me clear that the Act of 1882 does require that the schedule to a bill of sale shall contain, and that the body of the bill of sale shall not contain, a description of the personal chattels comprised therein.

C There was a very formidable argument urged on behalf of the appellant against this view, which it is impossible to pass over in silence. It was to this effect: s. 4 does not avoid a bill of sale as against the grantor in respect of personal chattels not specifically described in the schedule. Section 5 does not avoid a bill of sale as against the grantor in respect of personal chattels specifically described in the schedule of which the grantor was not the true owner at the time of the execution of the bill of sale. Such assignments are, therefore, permissible as against the grantor in a bill of sale. Room then must be found for them somewhere—either in the schedule or in the body of the instrument—you cannot put them in the schedule if you follow the statutory form. Besides, the body of the deed is the natural and proper place, it was said. If the statutory form does not make provision for including that which may be lawfully included, you must adapt the form to meet the particular case. That, it was urged, was common sense. This, I think, was the substance of the argument.

E For the present purpose it is only necessary to determine that the description of all the chattels intended to be comprised in a bill of sale must be found in the schedule. I desire not to be understood as expressing an opinion on any question not immediately and directly before the House. But I am inclined to think that the difficulty suggested is more apparent than real, and that the range of the exceptions in ss. 4 and 5 is extremely limited. The Act, as I have said, deals only with personal chattels as defined by the Acts of 1878 and 1882. That definition, if I am right, excludes from the category of personal chattels future or after-acquired chattels, except in the one case mentioned in s. 6 (2). Chattels falling within that case are referred to in s. 5 as “specifically described,” though the description of such chattels cannot be made more specific than it is in s. 6, except that the articles for which they may be substituted would of course be specified. The Act, therefore, seems to recognise the description in s. 6 as a specific description. It seems to follow that chattels which come under the description contained in s. 6 would find their proper place in the schedule. The other personal chattels referred to in s. 5, of which the grantor may not be the true owner, must be H chattels actually in existence, in reference to which the expression “true owner” is more appropriate than to things of which there can be no owner true or apparent. They are, therefore, certainly capable of being specifically described. They, too, would find their place in the schedule. The exception in s. 4 only extends to personal chattels which admit of specific description, but by some mistake or inadvertence are not so described. The schedule seems to be the proper place for I them, though it may be that possibly some very slight variation would have to be made in the language in the operative part of the instrument in order to carry out the intention of the Act. Possibly such a variation, being in furtherance of the provisions of the Act, would not be held fatal.

Whether a bill of sale overladen in its schedule with a description of things for which the statutory form has no room, and for which the Act makes no provision, would or would not be held to be in accordance with the statutory form is a matter on which I express no opinion. The explanation I have offered may possibly be a solution of the difficulty on which the argument of the learned counsel for the appellant was mainly founded. There may be other explanations. But even if the difficulty should seem insoluble that circumstance would not, in my opinion, authorise a departure from the comparatively clear provisions of the Act in regard to the form of the bill of sale. For the reasons I have given I concur in thinking that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

HILTON v. TUCKER

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Kekewich, J.), June 12, 13, 1888]

[Reported 39 Ch.D. 669; 57 L.J.Ch. 973; 59 L.T. 172;

Pledge—Delivery—Need for delivery to be contemporaneous with advance of money—Delivery made in fulfilment of contract of pledge.

In a transaction for the pledge of goods it is essential that there should be a delivery of the goods, but it is not essential that the delivery should be contemporaneous with the advance of the money so long as it is made in pursuance of the contract and in fulfilment of it.

In November, 1883, the plaintiff agreed to advance to T. the sum of £2,500 on the security of a collection of prints and other chattels. The first instalment of the advance was paid and it was agreed that the collection should be housed in a room of the Archæological Society, of which both parties were members, the key being placed at the disposal of the plaintiff and T. having unlimited access. The rest of the advance was made in December, 1883, and on Jan. 11, 1884, T. wrote to the plaintiff acknowledging receipt of the advance of £2,500, authorising the plaintiff to retain possession of the collection deposited in the room, the key of which was in the plaintiff's possession, and acknowledging that the plaintiff was to retain possession of the collection until the money had been repaid. T. died intestate. In an action brought by the plaintiff against T.'s personal representative asking for a declaration that he was entitled to retain possession of the collection as security for his advances, the defendant claimed that the transaction was not a pledge and that the letter of Jan. 11, 1884, was a bill of sale but void as not complying with the requirements of the Bills of Sale Acts.

Held: the delivery of the key to the plaintiff was equivalent to delivery of possession of the collection; the pledge was completed even though the delivery was not contemporaneous with the advance; and, therefore, the action was one of pledge.

Action brought by the plaintiff, a pledgee, against the defendant, the personal representative of the pledgor, for a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to hold and retain possession of certain chattels as security for advances.

The plaintiff agreed to advance to S. J. Tucker the sum of £2,500, to be secured by the bonds and certain title deeds of Tucker. It was afterwards, and before the advance was made, arranged that in place of the title deeds Tucker should deposit with the plaintiff certain prints and other chattels. The first instalment of the advance, namely, £1,250, was made on Nov. 19, 1883. The plaintiff and Tucker were both connected with the Archæological Society, who occupied premises at Oxford Mansions in Oxford Street, London. Shortly after Nov. 19, 1883, Tucker hired a room on the same premises, and there deposited the prints and chattels mentioned. Tucker paid the rent of the room and for its being kept in order. The key of the room was in charge of the steward of the premises. Tucker had unlimited access to the room, which he visited from time to time for the purpose of having a catalogue of the prints made by a Mr. Larkin, and from the evidence given at the trial it appeared that Tucker in fact had a second key to the room. On Dec. 21, 1883, Tucker wrote to the plaintiff saying :

“The collection was moved in today, and I have arranged with Larkin to spend (subject to your approval, for I thought it would be better for you to have one already in a sense under your own control) a certain time in the room every day in making a list . . . Larkin has the key, which I place entirely at your disposal.”

The rest of the advance, namely, £1,250, was made on Dec. 24, 1883, and on Jan. 11, 1884, Tucker wrote to the plaintiff as follows :

“Dear Sir,—You having advanced to me the sum of £2,500 on two bonds for £1,250 each executed by me, I hereby request and authorise you to retain possession of my collection of engraved portraits, prints, and all other property now deposited by me in a certain room in Oxford Mansions, Oxford Street, the key of which room is at present in your possession or power, and I hereby acknowledge that you are to retain possession of such portraits, prints, and property until the whole of the said sum of £2,500 with interest thereon . . . shall have been repaid to you.—(Signed) STEPHEN J. TUCKER.”

The plaintiff never had physical or exclusive possession of the prints and chattels until after the death of Tucker in January, 1886, when he took possession of the property. This action was brought by the plaintiff on April 1, 1887, against the personal representative of Tucker, claiming a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to hold and retain possession of the prints and chattels as security for his advances. The defendant, by her statement of defence, denied that the prints and chattels were ever delivered to or pledged with the plaintiff. She submitted that the plaintiff's only right or title to the articles was under the letter of Jan. 11, 1884, which she submitted was a bill of sale within the Bills of Sale Acts, and was void under ss. 8 and 9 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882.

Barber, Q.C., and Rowden for the defendant.

KEKEWICH, J.—It would not be right to say that this is a bill of sale case, because to say so would be to conclude the real question which arises. If it were a bill of sale case, that is to say, if there were any bill of sale at all, there is none which has been registered, or can be registered under the Act of 1882. The plaintiff's case is that there has been a pledge of the goods, namely, pictures and engravings, and such articles, and the defendant's case is that there has been no pledge. What is a pledge is common knowledge, and it is scarcely necessary to say what it is, but I will take the words of BOWEN, L.J., in Ex parte Hubbard (1). He says (17 Q.B.D. at p. 698) :

“There is another entirely distinct transaction, which was known to the Romans, and has been long familiar to English law, the transaction of a pawn or pledge, where there must be a delivery of the goods pledged to the pledgee, but only a special property in them passes to him, in order that they may be dealt with by him, if necessary, to enforce his rights—the general property in the goods remaining in the pledgor.”

The pledge, therefore, consists in the delivery; at any rate, a delivery is an essential part of the pledge, and, as stated by WILLES, J., in Meyerstein v. Barber (2) (L.R. 2 C.P. at p. 51) :

“With respect to a pledge, according to the law of this country, a mere contract to pledge even specific goods, and even although the money is actually advanced upon the faith of the contract, is not sufficient to carry the legal property in the goods.”

It is unnecessary for me to examine the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, or the amendment Act of 1882, but I certainly understand that neither of those Acts was intended to be applied or is applicable to a parol contract, or to anything in the character of a pledge. That is left to be dealt with by the common law, and is outside the statute altogether. I certainly also understand these cases to go this length. If you have a pledge, that is to say a contract, involving the advance of money and the delivery of the goods, that can no doubt be enforced quite irrespective of any authorities decided on the statute or the statute itself.

The question, to my mind, therefore, is whether there has here been a pledge of that character. What was the bargain I have no doubt at all. Mr. Hilton, the plaintiff, agreed in the autumn of 1883 to make an advance to Mr. Tucker on certain security, which security was afterwards by agreement between them, and before the date of the advance, changed to the security now in question. No money was advanced until Nov. 19, 1883, but £1,250, part of the £2,500, was then advanced, and there was a further advance about a month later. Before the first advance there had been no delivery: that is common ground. About the date of the next advance there was a delivery. There can be no question that the second advance and the delivery were for all practical purposes contemporaneous, but the first advance was made before the goods were delivered, supposing them to have been delivered.

There was a contract, therefore, binding in honour (but whether binding in law is the question which I have to decide between the plaintiff and the defendant), that the money should be charged on these goods. That would be a contract on which possibly the plaintiff might have had an action. It is a contract which might possibly give rise to an equitable right of specific performance, according to the authority of LORD WESTBURY in Holroyd v. Marshall (3), but it did not by itself constitute a pledge, nor pass any property in the goods generally or specially. The goods were afterwards dealt with in a peculiar manner. They were up to that time under the control and in the possession of Mr. Tucker, the borrower. Then they were not delivered in the sense in which one ordinarily sees goods delivered to the lender, the plaintiff, that is to say, they were not taken to his house, they were not taken to any warehouse, and entered in his name. No receipt was given to him by any wharfinger, or any person of that character, admitting his right of ownership, or the right of delivery to be in him, but they were deposited in a house which seems to have been selected only because the borrower and lender were connected with the Archæological Society, whose museum was in this house in Oxford Street. There a room was taken for the deposit of those goods. The room was taken by Mr. Tucker, the borrower. Mr. Tucker not only paid the rent for it, but he paid what was necessary from time to time for keeping the room in order, for dusting and so forth; so that in no sense, according to the ordinary use of the word, could it be called the plaintiff's room. The key—or one of the keys, for there seem to have been two—seems to have been hung up in the way in which one knows the keys of a large house let off in flats are hung up, in some hall, or porter's or steward's office, where the proprietor of the room could come and get possession of the room from time to time.

If it stopped there, I should unhesitatingly hold that possession had not been given to the plaintiff, but there was something more than that. On Dec. 21, 1883, Mr. Tucker writes a letter to the plaintiff, in which he refers to the collection having been moved in pursuance of the agreement, and he refers there to the arrangement which he determined to make, and to which I must take it for granted the plaintiff assented, that there should be a list made of these goods; but in the letter he says, "Larkin has the key, which I place entirely at your disposal." The key was there. I think it is immaterial whether the key was in the actual manual possession of Larkin, or some other officer of the establishment. It was there, and Mr. Tucker says, "It is entirely at your disposal." It was also to a great extent at the disposal of Mr. Tucker himself, and those he employed to make the list and to do what he thought right.

At this point, let me notice that it is proved by the evidence that two pictures were carried away. No doubt, that was put in evidence to show that Mr. Tucker had control. I attach no importance to that fact one way or the other. The plaintiff might very well, having regard to the large amount placed there, and the valuable character of the collection, be disposed to allow Mr. Tucker to carry away any small selection or number from the whole bulk; but Mr. Tucker might have done it wrongfully—not that I suggest he did, but either supposition would explain that, and I do not think very much importance ought to be attached to that evidence. A

This state of things went on for some time longer, and on Jan. 11, 1884, Mr. Tucker wrote the letter, which is said to be a bill of sale—that is to say, in this sense, that it ought to have been registered, or, being incapable of registration, it avoids the whole transaction.

“You having advanced to me the sum of two thousand five hundred pounds on two bonds for one thousand two hundred and fifty pounds each executed by me, I hereby request and authorise you to retain possession of my collection of engravings, portraits, prints, and all other property.” B

I admit the accuracy of counsel for the defendant's criticism that an authority to retain possession does not necessarily imply that the possession has been given, and that it may refer to a possession to be hereafter had, or to be had at the date of the letter; but he goes on, C

“now deposited by me in a certain room in Oxford Mansions, Oxford Street, the key of which room is at present in your possession or power, and I hereby acknowledge that you are to retain possession of such portraits, prints, and property until the whole of the said sum of £2,500, with interest thereon at 5 per cent. per annum from the date of the said bonds respectively shall have been repaid to you.” D

To my mind that is a statement by Mr. Tucker entirely consistent with his letter of Dec. 21, the statement that those goods are deposited by him in that room at present in the possession of the plaintiff. E

Is there anything inconsistent with the plaintiff's possession in Mr. Tucker having this right of ingress and egress to make lists, and cleaning the place and so on? To my mind there is not. It would be more satisfactory, no doubt, in a case of this kind, and avoid all dispute, if they had been deposited in a room under the exclusive control of the plaintiff; but assuming, as I do, on the facts not disputed, the entire bona fides of both parties, and the absence of any intention to defraud either one another or any outside party, it seems to me that it is quite consistent with the honesty of the transaction that there should be some laxity in the control of the room, Mr. Tucker from the first to the last acknowledging that whatever power he might have it was a power subject to the plaintiff's paramount control. F

I do not rely on the fact of the key having been handed over. There are several cases cited on the interesting question of the effect of delivery of the key. I think when they are examined they all really come to this, that the delivery of the key, in order to give constructive possession, must be under such circumstances that it really does pass the full control of the place to which admission is to be gained by means of the key, as for instance that case where timber was deposited in a warehouse. One might, of course, enter by force in other ways, but the key of the warehouse being delivered, the only way of getting to the contents of the warehouse was the ordinary way. Possibly possession would be obtained by using the key and opening the door, and the key being delivered it is the symbol of possession where the possession itself is practically impossible. A man being unable to carry about with him, or conveniently to move to his own warehouse adjoining, a large quantity of timber, the delivery of a key giving exclusive control is regarded as delivery of possession itself. I think that runs through all the cases on the delivery of the key as equivalent to delivery of possession. G H I

That being so, I must decide this question of law which has been raised—whether it is essential to a pledge, not that there should be a delivery, because that is admitted to be essential, but that delivery should be actually contemporaneous with the advance of the money. When I say actually contemporaneous I am not proposing to discuss such a case as I put to counsel for the defendant, where delivery has followed within an hour or a day afterwards, so that in support of the honesty of the transaction one might assume them to be practically contem-

A poraneous, though not identical in point of time, but where an advance is made, as here, in November, and the delivery is not given until, say, a month later, but then comes in pursuance of the contract and in fulfilment of the contract. I have pointed out that until delivery is made there is nothing but a contract, and the contract does not pass the property without such incidents as I have already mentioned; but I am not aware of any authority which goes so far as to say that

B the delivery must be contemporaneous so long as it is in honest fulfilment of the contract, and Reeves v. Capper (4) certainly is an authority the other way. Counsel for the defendant says that Reeves v. Capper (4) would not be decided in the same way now as it was decided by the full Court of Common Pleas in 1838. That may or may not be. To me it is sufficient to know that it was decided by

C the Court of Common Pleas fifty years ago, or nearly so, and that until overruled it is binding upon me. I, of course, must follow that decision as it stands, but I think it right to add, irrespective of that decision, that I am at a loss to understand why actual delivery should be contemporaneous with the advance. It seems to me that the transaction may be divided into two parts, and that though fraud may intervene in any case, however careful lawyers may be, still, remembering that in the meantime there is no property passed, and that unless the dictum of

D LORD WESTBURY is applicable, which I prefer, there is no property in the lender until he has got the goods, it seems to me a very small opening for fraud to hold that the actual delivery need not be contemporaneous with the pledge.

My view of the law certainly is, that if money is advanced, as here, on a contract that goods shall be delivered, and those goods are delivered in pursuance of that contract, the same legal results follow as if the money was handed over with one

E hand and the goods received with the other. That is the view on which I decide the case. It is a matter of some importance and apparently of some novelty, but that being so, I must hold the plaintiff entitled to the relief which he asks.

CLAYTON v. LEECH

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cotton, Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ.), March 22, 1889]

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Mistake as to length of lessor's term—Compensation

The lessors, believing that their term had thirty years to run, agreed to grant an underlease for twenty-one years to the lessee, nothing being said about compensation for misdescription. The lessee did not investigate the lessors' title, but took an underlease for twenty-one years. A year later he discovered that the lessors' term had only fourteen years to run, and he then claimed rectification of the lease and compensation.

Held: since the lessee claimed in respect of a defect in the title which, by investigating the title, he might have discovered before he took the lease, he was not entitled to any compensation.

Appeal from an order of KEKEWICH, J., dismissing an action brought by the lessee for compensation.

I

By a letter, dated Mar. 19, 1886, the lessors offered to let to the lessee a certain house on a lease at a yearly rent of £40, payable quarterly on the usual quarter days, the lessee paying all rates, taxes and outgoings, except property tax on the rent, the term to commence on Mar. 25 next; the lease to contain the usual covenants, with the usual proviso for re-entry on nonpayment of rent; the tenant to be at liberty to end the term at seven or fourteen years on the usual six months' notice. The lessee signed an unconditional acceptance of this offer, written on the same paper. On April 19, 1886, the lease was granted for twenty-one

A years from Mar. 25, 1886, determinable by the lessee at the end of seven or fourteen years. It contained the usual covenant for quiet enjoyment,

“without any lawful interruption, disturbance, or denial of, from, or by, the lessors, or any person or persons rightfully claiming from or under the lessors.”

B The lessors held the property under a lease, and were under the impression that, when they granted the lease, their term had thirty years to run. They in fact held under a lease for eighty-one years from Oct. 11, 1819, so that, at the time when they granted the under-lease to the lessee, only little more than fourteen years of their lease was unexpired. The lessee did not call for production of the original lease, and the mistake was not discovered until March, 1887, when the lessee desired to
C purchase the leasehold reversion, and the original lease was shown to him. He then declined to purchase, and in June, 1887, demanded compensation from the lessors. The lessors' solicitors wrote to the lessee, saying they would advise their clients to grant at their own expense a fresh lease for the residue of their term less three days, but no reply was made to this letter. On Sept. 22, 1887, the lessee's solicitors wrote to the lessor's solicitors claiming compensation. The D lessors' solicitors replied refusing to give any compensation, and, on Oct. 24, 1887, the writ in this action was issued. By the statement of claim, the lessee claimed rectification of the lease and compensation.

Candy, Q.C., and McConnell for the lessee.

Cock, Q.C., and Daniel Jones for the lessors.

E COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., who has dismissed an action brought by a lessee for compensation. The lessors, who are the leaseholders, thought that they had a longer term than they had, and, under that erroneous impression, granted to the lessee what purported to be a lease for twenty-one years. They had in fact only a term of which about fourteen years
F were unexpired. This was a defect of title which the lessee could have discovered if he had called for inspection of the original lease. It may be that it is not usual for a person taking a lease at a rack rent to investigate the title; still, the fact remains that the lessee might at once have discovered this defect of title. On discovering the defect some time after he had taken his lease, he applied for compensation. Is he entitled to it? It is conceded that fraudulent intention cannot G be alleged, and that there is no ground for an action on the covenants in the lease; but it is contended that the lessee is entitled to compensation for misrepresentation.

In Besley v. Besley (1) it was held by MALINS, V.-C., in very similar circumstances that there was no right to compensation. But it was urged that Besley v. Besley (1) was disapproved of by the Court of Appeal in Palmer v. Johnson (2), H and that the present case is governed by Re Turner and Skelton (3), which was there approved. But Besley v. Besley (1) was quite a different case from Re Turner and Skelton (3). There was in Re Turner and Skelton (3) an express stipulation in the contract that, if any error or mis-statement should be found in the schedule, it should not annul the sale, but compensation should be made in respect thereof. The vendors contended that this stipulation was put an end to by the conveyance.
I The court there said that the defect was one of quantity which the purchaser discovered after conveyance, and which he could only have discovered previously by leave of the vendors, which they were not bound to give. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., thought that it would be wrong to hold the contract for compensation to be put an end to by the conveyance, when the mistake was one which he could not by due diligence discover before conveyance, and he referred to the decision of MALINS, V.-C., in Manson v. Thacker (4) as being at variance with the prior authorities. In that case, there was an express contract for compensation, and MALINS, V.-C., had refused to give compensation after conveyance. It was from this, and not from the decision in Besley v. Besley (1), that the Master of the Rolls expressed his dissent. I do not consider that either Besley v. Besley (1) or Allen v. Richardson (5) can be considered as overruled by Palmer v. Johnson (2), for that case went on an express contract for compensation which did not exist in the other cases. In my opinion, therefore, the authorities do not support the lessee's case. A

The case, then, is simply this. The lessee after completion has discovered a defect of title which, if he had chosen to investigate the title, he would have discovered before completion, and there was no contract to make compensation for defects. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the lessee has no right to compensation, and there is no authority which decides that he has. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed. B

LINDLEY, L.J.—There is no doubt here that the lessors made a mistake and thus misled the lessee, but, unless he can show that an action for damages will lie on the ground of that mistake he cannot succeed. The covenants in the lease give him no remedy. He brings his action for rectification of the lease and compensation. Rectification of the lease was offered him free of expense before action, but he was not satisfied with that. I think that he has sustained some loss, but has he any legal remedy for it? Besley v. Besley (1) is an express authority that he has not. He contends that the decision in that case has been overruled in Palmer v. Johnson (2), but, in my opinion, that is not so. Besley v. Besley (1) is perfectly consistent with Palmer v. Johnson (2), which only decided that a contract for compensation was not put an end to by the conveyance. I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal fails. C D E

BOWEN, L.J.—At law, the lessee could not recover damages, for there is no covenant, express or implied, which the lessors have broken. The implied covenant which would have arisen from the demise is excluded by the express qualified covenant for quiet enjoyment. Then, how does the case stand as a demand for compensation for a defect of title? I believe that it is not usual in taking leases in the metropolis at a rack rent to call for the lessor's title, but it does not follow that the lessee could not, as a matter of right, have claimed to have the title shown, and, if he had taken that precaution, he would have found out the mistake. He has chosen to complete without investigating the title, and cannot have any right to compensation unless there is some stipulation entitling him to claim it, and there is none. F G

Besley v. Besley (1) is directly opposed to the lessee's claim. It was contended that that decision had been overruled by Palmer v. Johnson (2), but I am of opinion that it was not so overruled. The point decided in Palmer v. Johnson (2) was that an agreement to make compensation for a misdescription of the things sold was not extinguished by taking a conveyance unless the agreement was so expressed as to limit it to defects discovered before the conveyance. The language of all the judgments in Palmer v. Johnson (2) appears to treat Besley v. Besley (1) as wrong, but that is erroneous. All that was intended, as I think, was to decide that any expressions in Besley v. Besley (1) which laid down a principle inconsistent with that laid down in Palmer v. Johnson (2) were wrong. It had been cited as an authority for the proposition that, in the absence of fraud, no relief for misdescription could be given after conveyance; perhaps the language in it may have been too wide, and so far, if at all, as it supported that proposition it was overruled. When, however, the fact is looked at that, in Besley v. Besley (1) there was no agreement for compensation, the decision in that case is not inconsistent with Palmer v. Johnson (2), and, in my opinion, it was rightly decided. F

Appeal dismissed.

Limitation of Action—Land—Right to support—Surface let down by mining—Payment of compensation—Further subsidence 14 years later—Right to maintain action.

In 1868 the appellants worked out the coal under land belonging to the respondent without leaving proper support, in consequence of which the surface subsided and some cottages belonging to the respondent were injured. The appellants made compensation for the injury, and did not work the minerals after 1868. In 1882 a further subsidence occurred from the combined effect of the previous workings of the appellants and workings under adjoining land. In an action brought by the respondent later in 1882 to recover compensation for the injury he had sustained as the result of this further subsidence,

Held (LORD BLACKBURN dissenting): a new cause of action arose in respect of the second subsidence, and, therefore, the respondent's right to maintain an action for the injury he had sustained in consequence of it was not barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Appeal by the defendants in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal (SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ.), reported 14 Q.B.D. 125, reversing a decision of HAWKINS, J., upon further consideration, of an action tried before him at Leeds. G

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., Forbes, Q.C., and G. Banks for the appellants.

Rigby, Q.C., and C. E. Ellis for the respondent.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Feb. 8, 1886. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY.*—In this case the plaintiff, the owner of land upon the surface, has sued the lessees of certain seams of coal below and adjacent to the plaintiff's land for having disturbed the plaintiff in the enjoyment of his property by causing it to subside. The defendants before and up to the year 1868 have worked, that is to say, excavated, the seams of coal of which they were the lessees. Their excavation caused a subsidence of the ground, for which they acknowledged their liability and made satisfaction. There were other subsidences after this, and as the case originally came before your Lordships, it was matter of inference only whether these subsidences were or were not in some way connected with, if not forming part of, the original subsidence. The parties have now, by an admission at your Lordships' Bar, placed the matter beyond doubt. It has been agreed H I

* In the interval between the argument of the case and the delivery of their Lordships' opinions LORD HALSBURY resigned the office of Lord Chancellor, LORD HERSCHELL succeeding him on Feb. 6, 1886, on a change of government.

A that the owner of the adjoining land worked out his coal subsequently to 1868, that, if he had not done so, there would have been no further subsidence, and if the defendants' coal had not been taken out, or if sufficient support had been left, the working of the adjoining owner would have done no harm.

Under these circumstances, the question is whether the satisfaction for the past subsidence must be taken to have been equivalent to a satisfaction for all succeeding subsidence. No one will think of disputing the proposition that for one cause of action you must recover all damages incident to it by law once and for ever. A house that has received a shock may not at once show all the damage done to it, but it is damaged not the less then to the extent that it is damaged, and the fact that the damage only manifests itself later on by stages does not alter the fact that the damage is there; and so of the more complex mechanism of the human frame, the damage is done in a railway accident, the whole machinery is injured, though it may escape the eye or even the consciousness of the sufferer at the time; the later stages of suffering are but the manifestations of the original damage done, and consequent upon the injury originally sustained. The words "cause of action" are somewhat ambiguously used in reasoning upon this subject; what the plaintiff has a right to complain of in a court of law in this case is the damage to his land, and by the damage I mean the damage which has in fact occurred, and if this is all that a plaintiff can complain of, I do not see why he may not recover toties quoties fresh damage is inflicted. Since the decision of this House in Backhouse v. Bonomi (1) it is clear that no action would lie for the excavation. It is not, therefore, a cause of action; that case established that it is the damage and not the excavation which is the cause of action. I cannot understand why every new subsidence, although proceeding from the same original act or omission of the defendants, is not a new cause of action for which damages may be recovered. I cannot concur in the view that there is a breach of duty in the original excavation.

In Rowbotham v. Wilson (3) (8 E. & B. at p. 157) CRESSWELL, J., said the owner of the mines might have removed every atom of the minerals, without being liable to an action, if the soil above had not fallen, and what is true of the first subsidence seems to me to be necessarily true of every subsequent subsidence. The defendant has originally created a state of things which renders him responsible if damage accrues; if by the hypothesis the cause of action is the damage resulting from the defendant's act, or an omission to alter the state of things he has created, why may not a fresh action be brought? A man keeps a ferocious dog which bites his neighbour; can it be contended that when the bitten man brings his action he must assess damages for all possibility of any future bites? A man stores water artificially, as in Rylands v. Fletcher (4); the water escapes and sweeps away the plaintiff's house; he re-builds it, and the artificial reservoir continues to leak and sweeps it away again. Cannot the plaintiff recover for the second house, or must he have assessed in his first damages the possibility of future invasion of water flowing from the same reservoir?

I With respect to the authorities, Nicklin v. Williams (5) was urged by counsel for the appellants as an authority upon the question now before your Lordships, by reason of some words attributed to LORD WESTBURY in Backhouse v. Bonomi (1). If LORD WESTBURY really did use the words attributed to him, it is, I think, open to doubt in what sense they are to be understood. PARKE, B., in that case, delivered the judgment against the plaintiffs recovering any subsequently accruing damage, because, he said, the cause of action was the original injury to the right by withdrawing support. That principle is admittedly wrong, and was expressly held to be wrong in Backhouse v. Bonomi (1), since, if that had been law, there could have been no answer to the plea of the Statute of Limitations in that case. It is difficult to follow SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., when he says it was not necessary to overrule Nicklin v. Williams (5) by that decision. It seems to me to have been the whole point decided in Nicklin v. Williams (5), and how that case so decided can be an authority for anything I am at a loss to understand. I think the decision of this case must depend as matter of logic upon the decision of your Lordships' House in Backhouse v. Bonomi (1), and I do not know that it is a very legitimate inquiry, when a principle has been laid down by a tribunal from which there is no appeal, and which is bound by its own decisions, whether that principle is upon the whole advantageous or convenient; but if such considerations were permissible, I think COCKBURN, C.J., in his judgment in Lamb v. Walker (2) establishes the balance of convenience to be on the side of the law as established by Backhouse v. Bonomi (1). I cannot logically distinguish between a first and a second or a third or more subsidences, and after Backhouse v. Bonomi (1) it is impossible to say that it was wrong in any sense for the defendant to remove the coal; CRESSWELL, J., has said, I think rightly, he might remove every atom of the mineral. The wrong consists, and, as it appears to me, wholly consists, in causing another man damage, and I think he may recover for that damage as and when it occurs. For these reasons I think that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

LORD BLACKBURN.—This is an appeal against an order of the Court of Appeal, by which it was ordered that the judgment of HAWKINS, J., delivered, on further consideration, on Dec. 18, 1883, should be reversed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for damages to be assessed by an arbitrator to be agreed upon, with costs.

Before this House can say whether this order is right or not, it is necessary to know what was the case on which HAWKINS, J., directed judgment, which this order reverses, to be entered for the defendant. The writ was issued on Dec. 27, 1882. There was an alternative defence that the causes of action did not, nor did any of them, first accrue to the plaintiff at any time within six years before the commencement of the action; and, therefore, it lay on the plaintiff to give evidence of some cause of action subsequent to Dec. 27, 1876. I think it sufficiently appears in HAWKINS, J.'s judgment that the defendants had worked out the seams of coal of which they were lessees as long ago as 1868, and that they had done nothing from that time. And as the defendants seem to have proved and relied on the fact that very considerable subsidences had occurred between 1868 and 1871 which injured the plaintiff's premises, and that the defendants had been called upon to do and had paid for repairs rendered necessary, it is clear that the original working was such as to give rise to a cause of action as early as 1871, and that the plaintiff had then known it.

Lamb v. Walker (2) was then cited. With a view to enable the plaintiff's counsel fully to consider that authority, it was arranged that the jury should be discharged, and that the case should be reserved for further consideration, it being expressly admitted by the plaintiff that damage was done by subsidence in 1868. On further consideration the plaintiff's counsel is stated by HAWKINS, J., to have admitted that judgment must be entered for the defendants unless Lamb v. Walker (2), which he intended to question in a Court of Appeal, was overruled. I think it convenient here to see what was the decision in Lamb v. Walker (2), so as to see whether, while it stands unreversed, it was decisive of the case before HAWKINS, J. MANISTY, J., quotes so much of the plaintiff's statement of claim as was material in that case. There was a first claim, on which the referee gave a farthing, which I do not notice. I think that paras. 5 and 6 are in effect the same as the amended statement of claim in the action now at Bar. But the only plea in Lamb v. Walker (2) was payment into court of £150, and the issue joined was whether that was enough. That was referred, and it was on the award that the question was raised. The two material findings on the award are stated:

“2. I estimate the damage actually sustained by the plaintiff at the date of the commencement of the action . . . at £400. 3. I estimate the future damage which will be sustained by the plaintiff . . . at £150.”

He, therefore, directed judgment to be entered for £400, deducting the £150 paid into court from those two sums, amounting together to £550. The question was raised

A on a rule to reduce the damages, and was, "whether the plaintiff was in point of law entitled to recover the sum of £150 which the referee finds will be sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the defendants' acts." The decision in Lamb v. Walker (2) was that he was so entitled. And I think it was rightly thought that, if damages subsequent to a writ issued in 1871, could be recovered in an action on that writ, they were included in the cause of action then existing, and consequently that decision, which was binding on HAWKINS, J., was at that stage of the proceedings conclusive against the plaintiff.

B In Lamb v. Walker (2), COCKBURN, C.J., differed from the majority of the court. He said (3 Q.B.D. at pp. 399, 400):

C "Taking the view I do of [Backhouse v. Bonomi (1)], I am unable to concur in holding that, in addition to the amount to which he may be entitled for actual damage sustained through the excavation of the adjacent soil by the defendant, the plaintiff is entitled to recover in respect of prospective damage, that is to say, anticipated damage expected to occur, but which has not actually occurred, and which may never arise."

D He enters into elaborate reasoning to support this opinion, which I shall examine presently. I think, if that opinion had prevailed in Lamb v. Walker (2) and a judgment had been given accordingly, that decision would have been, not only not an authority against the plaintiff in this case, but an authority in his favour as far as the defence of the Statute of Limitations is concerned. There must have been some understanding between counsel for the plaintiff and for the defendants in this case as to what was to be done in case the final decision on this very important question was in conformity with the opinion of COCKBURN, C.J. And I think, though I wish it had been expressly stated, it must now be taken that the defendants' counsel agreed that he would not, on the evidence then before the court, ask for a verdict on any of the other defences, but would in that case consent to have the damages settled by arbitration. COCKBURN, C.J., could not, in Lamb v. Walker (2), have meant to go so far as to say that if a house had been shaken, and was evidently going to fall, but had not yet completely fallen when the writ was issued, the plaintiff could only recover for what had already occurred, and would have to bring a fresh action when a further chimney fell. He has not quite sufficiently guarded himself from saying so.

E As the facts here were different, it was, somewhat late in the day, but with the assent of this House, agreed to add this further admission:

G "That if the owner of the adjoining land (one Cooper) had not worked his coal, there would have been no further subsidence; but the appellants (defendants) admit that if the coal under the respondent's (plaintiff's) land had not been taken out, or if the appellants (defendants) had left sufficient support under respondent's (plaintiff's) land, then the working of the adjoining owner would have done no harm."

H I do not understand this to be an admission that the subsidence was occasioned by the removal by the defendants of coal other than that the removal of which occasioned the subsidence in 1871. Such an admission would have raised a different question, and one the solution of which might have required a further investigation as to the facts.

I I will now proceed to consider the case exactly as if it was an appeal from Lamb v. Walker (2). I must first observe that MANISTY, J., in that case, says (3 Q.B.D. at p. 394):

"It is a well-settled rule of law that damages resulting from one and the same cause of action must be assessed and recovered once for all."

And it is not disputed by COCKBURN, C.J., that the rule is established that

"damages resulting from one and the same cause of action must be assessed and recovered once and for all."

He joins issue with MANISTY, J., on the application of this rule to cases arising from subsidence occasioned by mining so as to remove support. I think that this rule is established as the general rule of law. I do not think it is one of those rules of law which depend upon natural justice. I think it is an artificial rule of positive law introduced on the balance of convenience and inconvenience. I think that if it were res integra a great deal might be said against the expediency of the rule. I know no place where the objections to the expediency of the rule are more clearly and forcibly stated than by COCKBURN, C.J., in that case. But I think it was not disputed in the argument that at all events, when the act complained of is one which would entitle the plaintiff to maintain an action, and recover, as a matter of law, at least nominal damages, without any proof of damage in fact, the rule is firmly established, and I think all three judges in the court below agree that the question is what was the cause of action in the present case.

They adopt the reasoning of COCKBURN, C.J., in Lamb v. Walker (2), that it logically follows, from Bonomi v. Backhouse (1), that there are independent and distinct causes of action, on each fresh distinct cause of damage, though arising from the same act of disturbing the soil. FRY, L.J., puts this very clearly. He does not think that it is concluded by authority, and says :

"I think we are bound to determine this question on principle. Now, with reference to principle, it appears to me to be plain that all damages which result from one and the same cause of action must be recovered at one and the same time, and therefore we are driven to the inquiry what is the cause of action in a case of this description."

In this I completely agree, but I have not been able to agree with the reasoning by which it is sought to be made out that it logically follows, from the decision in Backhouse v. Bonomi (1) in this House, that there are fresh causes of action at each fresh subsidence, arising from the old disturbance of the strata, occasioning fresh damage to the same property. I decide nothing on a question which does not here arise, viz., whether, if the same person has two separate tenements, say, A. on the north of the seam worked by the defendant and B. on the south of it, and damage has actually occurred to A., and he sues for the damage done to it, he is bound to join in the action any claim which he has or hereafter may have as to B. While the recent decision of Brunsdon v. Humphrey (6) in the Court of Appeal stands unreversed, and I do not mean to cast any doubt on it, it would seem that he is not.

It is desirable to see what Bonomi v. Backhouse (1) really was. The writ was issued on May 20, 1856. The declaration alleged that the plaintiffs, as reversioners of certain buildings in the occupation of Parkin, were entitled to have the said messuages and buildings supported by the mines and soil "contiguous and near to and under the said messuages and buildings," and then in the usual way alleged working by the defendant, disturbing the support, by which the walls of the said messuages were cracked and injured, and the ground on which the said messuages and buildings stood subsided. The pleas were: (i) not guilty; (ii) denial of Parkin's occupancy as tenant as alleged; (iii) denial of the reversion being in the plaintiffs as alleged; (iv) that the plaintiffs were not entitled to have the said messuages and buildings or either of them supported, to wit, by the mines, earth, and soil underground contiguous; (v) that the said alleged causes of action did not accrue within six years before this suit. The verdict was entered for the plaintiffs, subject to a Special Case.

One very important question raised in and decided by that case was as to the rights of buildings to support, as distinguished from the rights of the natural soil to the support: with that we are not now concerned. The arbitrator in detail stated very clearly, and I have no doubt very accurately, the way in which the cleety coal in the Auckland coal-field was worked. I doubt if this account would be found to be applicable in most coal-fields. I think I may say that it would not in some. I do not know what is the nature of the strata in the Yorkshire coal-field

A where the present coal lies. But it appeared quite clear on his statement of the case that, though it was apparent in 1850, more than six years before the action, that unless steps were taken to stop the progress of the thrust then in operation the plaintiffs' houses would be injured by the thrust, yet no actual injury was sustained till 1854, less than six years before the action; he also found that the thrust would continue and would produce damage in future. There was also a finding that
 B it was possible to stop the thrust, "but the expense of so doing would have been very great, and would on the whole have amounted to a much larger sum than the value of the property injured."

He then proceeded to find in detail the facts on which it was to depend how the issues should be entered, and then proceeded as follows:

C "If the verdict is to be entered for the plaintiffs upon the issues joined on the first, fourth, and fifth pleas, another question for the court is (iv) whether the defendant is responsible for all the damage which has been sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the injuries to their said messuages and buildings above described, or for any or what part of that damage, and whether he is responsible D in any and what respect for the probable future damage which may be occasioned in manner above described, or for the damage occasioned by the diminution in value of the said messuages and buildings by reason of their insecure state and condition, or the injuries which will probably be hereafter occasioned by the further progress of the thrust as above mentioned."

Had this question, and more especially the part of it I have marked in italics, been answered, it would have decided the question afterwards raised in Lamb v. Walker (2). But, as the majority of the Queen's Bench decided that the issue on E the fifth plea should be entered for the defendant, the fourth question required no answer from those three judges, and received none. WIGHTMAN, J., does give an answer which, I think, so far as it goes, is in favour of COCKBURN'S, C.J., view in Lamb v. Walker (2). The defendant does not appear to have thought the fourth question of importance, for nothing whatever was said in the argument in the F Exchequer Chamber about it; and though the expression in the judgment indicates approval of Nicklin v. Williams (5), so far as regarded the principle "that no second or fresh action can, under such circumstances, be brought for subsequently accruing damage, all the damage consequent upon the unlawful act is in contemplation of law satisfied by the one judgment or accord,"

G and seems in favour of the view taken by the majority in Lamb v. Walker (2), yet I do not think it can be properly said that the Court of Exchequer Chamber in their judgment put their minds to that question, which was not much, if at all, argued before them. Before the case was taken into this House the damages were agreed on at £500, how or on what principle we do not know. And that being so, the House had no occasion to decide anything on that fourth question. There seems H to have been no allusion to it in the argument, and I think no one of the Lords makes any reference to it.

I think that Backhouse v. Bonomi (1) does decide that there is no cause of action until there is actual damage sustained, and does decide that the Court of Exchequer erred when in Nicklin v. Williams (5) they said that there was an injury to the right as soon as the support was rendered insufficient, though no damage
 I had occurred. But I do not think that it at all follows from this that the act of removing the minerals to such an extent as to make the support insufficient is an innocent act rendered wrongful by the subsequent damage. That would be a great anomaly, for I think there is no other instance in our law where an action lies in consequence of damage against a person doing an innocent act. There are many where no action lies against the doer of an improper act, unless and until damage accrues. One is alluded to by LORD CRANWORTH. The cause of action against the speaker of words not actionable per se consists in the speaking of the words and the damage. It was, therefore, held in Littleboy v. Wright (7), on error from the Palace Court, that an inferior court had no jurisdiction over an action for calling the plaintiff a whore, whereby the plaintiff lost her marriage, unless both the speaking of the words and the loss of the marriage were averred and shown to have occurred within the jurisdiction. But the cause of action was as much the speaking of the words as the damage. It is quite clear that, if the words were spoken under such circumstances as to be privileged, no amount of damage could give rise to an action. So where a man beats another's servant, no action arises to the master until there is damage by the loss of the service, but no amount of damage would give the master an action if the beating was justifiable. And if a man in breach of the duty to take reasonable care in the management of a horse in a public street gallops along it, no action lies except at the instance of a person who has suffered damage. But no amount of damage will give a cause of action against the owner of the horse unless a breach of duty is shown.

I think that there is a duty in the owner of land on which his neighbour's land rests to respect it, and take care that he does not injure that support. This is subject to many qualifications, some of which were considered in Birmingham Corpn. v. Allen (8). All I think that is really decided in Backhouse v. Bonomi (1), at least in this House, is that where there is a breach of duty, followed by damage, there is a cause of action; and that until there is damage there is no more cause of action for the breach of duty than there would be in a person who saw the breach of duty in the reckless rider of a horse, but was not damaged, though in peril. LITTLEDALE, J., said in Hodsoll v. Stallebrass (9) (11 Ad. & El. at pp. 305, 306), speaking of an action by a master for beating his servant per quod servitium amisit:

"It is argued that a fresh action might be brought from time to time, but that is not so, the action being founded not upon the damage only, but upon the unlawful act and the damage. Without the special damage, this action would not be maintainable at the plaintiff's suit. A fresh action could not be brought unless there were both a new unlawful act, and fresh damage."

This, I think, indicates the real principle. No authority was cited on the argument against this, except a dictum of NORTH, C.J., in Lord Townshend v. Hughes (10), where he is reported to have said (2 Mod. Rep. at p. 150):

"This is a civil action, brought by the plaintiff for words spoken of him, which if they are in their own nature actionable, the jury ought to consider the damage which the party may sustain, but if a particular averment of special damage makes them actionable, then the jury are only to consider such damages as are already sustained, and not such as may happen in future, because for such the plaintiff may have a new action."

NORTH, C.J., was a great lawyer, and, though at the moment engaged in maintaining what seems a very bad cause, no dictum of his is to be slighted. But this, if he did say it, was utterly irrelevant, for his opinion was that the words spoken were actionable without any special damage such, in the case before him, being neither averred nor proved. I cannot, therefore, attach much weight to this dictum, and it has never, I think, been acted upon.

I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the opinion of the majority in Lamb v. Walker (2) was the better opinion. I should say that I take a very different view of Whitehouse v. Fellowes (11) from that taken by SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R. I think that was an action for maintaining a nuisance, which from time to time caused fresh damage. What WILLIAMS, J., there says is "The true answer to this objection, as it seems to me, is that no fresh cause of action arises from each fresh damage, but that where there is not only a fresh damage, but a continuance of the cause of damage, such continuance of the wrongful act which caused the damage constitutes a fresh cause of action."

This was how the court of error in Ireland understood that case in Devery v. Grand Canal Co. (12). So understanding it and approving of it, PALLES, C.B., in that

A case gave judgment for the plaintiff. How that case is in any way in conflict in principle with Nicklin v. Williams (5) I am unable to perceive. BOWEN, L.J., says

“Applying the reasoning in Whitehouse v. Fellowes (11), it seems to me that there has really been not merely an original excavation or act done, but a continual withdrawal of support.”

If I could take that view of the facts, I should agree in the conclusion. But I cannot take that view of the facts. One consequence of doing so would be that where the owner in fee of a seam of coal worked it out, and died leaving it in this state, the heir of the land in which the worked-out seam lay would be liable to an action for continuing a nuisance. Surely, the facts cannot be such as would produce that effect. And unless they are, I do not think that they can make the defendant responsible on this ground. I, therefore, think that the order appealed against should be reversed, and the judgment of Dec. 18, 1883, restored.

LORD BRAMWELL.—Laying down general propositions is attended with the same danger as giving definitions. Some necessary qualification or exception is generally omitted. Moreover such propositions are often and justly called obiter. With these fears before my eyes I shall nevertheless venture on some abstract propositions. It is a rule that when a thing directly wrongful in itself is done to a man, in itself a cause of action, he must, if he sues in respect of it, do so once and for all. As, if he is beaten or wounded, if he sues he must sue for all his damage, past, present, and future, certain and contingent. He cannot maintain an action for a broken arm, and subsequently for a broken rib, though he did not know of it when he commenced his first action. But if he sustained two injuries from a blow, one to his person, another to his property, as, for instance, damage to a watch, there is no doubt that he could maintain two actions in respect of the one blow. I may apply the test I mentioned in the argument. If he became bankrupt, the right in respect of the watch would vest in his trustee; that for damage to his person would remain in him.

I have put the case of a trespass. The same would be true of an action for consequential damages. A man slandered or libelled by words actionable in themselves must sue, if at all, for all his damage in one action. Probably, if he sustained special damage, as that he lost a contract through being charged with theft, he might maintain one action for actionable slander, another for the personal loss—certainly if Littleboy v. Wright (7) is right. But it is not necessary to decide this. I now come to the case of where the wrong is not actionable in itself, is only an injuria, but causes a damnum. Such a thing may be. A bargain between A. and B. that B. should call C. a swindler would be unlawful, though neither actionable nor indictable, except perhaps as a conspiracy. But it would not be enforceable, though the bargain was made out of the jurisdiction, and so not indictable. In such a case it would seem that, as the action was only maintainable in respect of the damage, or not maintainable till the damage, an action should lie every time a damage accrued from the wrongful act. For example, A. says to B. that C. is a swindler, B. refuses to enter into a contract with C., C. has a cause of action against A.; D., who was present and heard it, also refuses to make such a contract; surely another action would lie. And so one would think if B. subsequently refuses another contract. Of course, one can see that frauds might be practised. So they may in any state of law. But I cannot see why the second action would not be maintainable if the second loss was traced to the speaking. Perhaps one might apply the same test. Would not the first right of action pass to the trustees of C. if he became bankrupt? If the second loss was after the bankrupt's discharge, it would not.

There is still another class of cases to be considered, viz., those where the act causing damage is not in itself wrongful. No easier case can be taken than the above-ground case of an excavation, whereby an adjoining owner's soil is let down. It cannot be said that the act of excavation is unlawful. A contract to do it could be enforced. No injunction against it could be obtained unless injury was imminent and certain. What would be the rights of the person damaged in such a case? I think the former reasoning would apply. If there was an excavation 100 yards long, and 50 feet of the neighbouring soil fell in, the right of action would be in respect of those 50 feet, and not only in respect of what had fallen in, but what would in future fall in along the 50 feet. But if afterwards the other 50 feet fell in, there would be a fresh cause of action. Surely this must be so. If 10 feet at one end fell in, and afterwards 10 feet at the other, it would be impossible to say that there would not be two causes of action. If the excavation was on two sides of a square, the same consequences. Counsel for the appellants denied this, and was driven to do so. But suppose A. owned the adjoining property on one side, and B. that which was at right angles to it, there must then be two causes of action. Apply this reasoning to the present case. There are by the admission of the parties two separate and distinct damages caused to the plaintiff by the acts, including in that word omissions, of the defendants. One a removal of coal and non-providing of supports, which caused a subsidence in 1868. A cause of action accrued then. Another cause of action is the removal of coal, including perhaps the coal which caused the first subsidence, but doubtless also a removal of coal extending to a greater distance, and not immediately under the plaintiff's land, and the non-providing against the consequences, which, when the adjoining owner to the defendants removed his coal, as he lawfully might (though I think that immaterial), caused a creep in the defendants' land, which in time caused the further subsidence. I think this gives a second cause of action.

I think, therefore, that the judgment was right. It seems to me not to matter that the subsidence was of the same spot, nor that the immediate cause of the second subsidence was the non-existence of coal underneath that spot. Two damages have been occasioned to the plaintiff, one directly and immediately by the removal of the coal under his surface; the other by that and removal of other coal, and consequent creeping and further subsidence. Counsel for the appellants, as I have said, denied that there could be two causes of action if two different parts of the plaintiff's land subsided at two different times. But surely there must be. Suppose the two pieces belonged to different owners, as I have suggested. Of course, one can see the danger and inconvenience that will follow. This damage accrues many years after the defendants' act which has caused it. If my reasoning is right, many years hence there might be a further action from some further subsidence. But the inconvenience is as great the other way. For if the defendants are right, it follows that on the least subsidence happening a cause of action accrues once and for all, the Statute of Limitations begins to run, and the person injured must bring his action, and claim and recover for all damage actual, possible, or contingent, for all time. As to the authorities, Backhouse v. Bonomi (1) seems clearly in the plaintiff's favour. Indeed, I have thought of limiting my judgment to the following remark on it. It decided that the excavation of the coal was not wrongful, and that the cause of action accrued when the damage arose. The damage now complained of arose at the last subsidence. That subsidence was no part of or continuance of the former subsidence, therefore, no cause of action in respect of it arose till it happened.

LORD FITZGERALD.—The real, though not the formal, question for your Lordships' determination is whether Lamb v. Walker (2) was correctly decided. LORD BLACKBURN rightly deals with this appeal in the same light as if it was an appeal from Lamb v. Walker (2). I do not propose to follow him in his instructive examination of that case and Backhouse v. Bonomi (1) and his criticisms on those cases, but I think that we may deduce from the authorities some propositions as now settled in law, and applicable to the circumstances of the appeal now before your Lordships' House, and to similar cases.

I proceed to state those propositions, though in doing so I am conscious of the danger pointed out by LORD BRAMWELL. (i) That the owner of the surface has a natural and legal right to the undisturbed enjoyment of that surface in the absence

A of any binding agreement to the contrary. (ii) That the owner of the subjacent minerals may excavate and remove them to the utmost extent, but should exercise that right so as not to disturb the lawful enjoyment of the owner of the surface. (iii) That the excavation and removal of the minerals do not per se constitute any actionable invasion of the right of the owner of the surface, although subsequent events show that no adequate supports have been left to sustain the surface.

B (iv) But that when, in consequence of not leaving or providing sufficient supports, a disturbance of the surface takes place, that disturbance is an invasion of the rights of the owner of the surface, and constitutes his cause of action. The foundation of the plaintiff's action, then, seems to be that, although the excavations of the minerals were acts by the defendants in the lawful enjoyment of their own property, yet when subsequently damage arose therefrom to the plaintiff in the

C enjoyment of his property, the defendants became responsible. For although the law encourages a man to the free use of his own property, yet, if in doing a lawful thing in the enjoyment of that property he occasions damage to his neighbour which might have been avoided, he will be answerable for that damage whenever it occurs. As to the cause of action in 1868, there is no doubt that the mere excavation prior to or in 1868 was legitimate, and not of itself alone the foundation of any right of

D action; but when the subsidence of that year took place, and caused damage to the plaintiff's houses, then the defendants became liable to make good that loss, because, though their acts were in the lawful use of their own property, yet the injurious consequences to the plaintiff might have been avoided. It is the disturbance then, when it arises, that is the cause of action, and not the prior legitimate act of the owners of the minerals in the lawful enjoyment of their own

But although this be true, yet still the question which arose in Lamb v. Walker (2), and was not expressly decided by this House in Backhouse v. Bonomi (1), remains now to be considered and finally decided. There was a subsidence in 1868 causing special damage, giving the plaintiff a cause of action, and in respect of that damage he accepted compensation, which, it seems agreed, is equivalent to

F a recovery of damages in an action if such action had then been instituted. In 1882 a fresh and distinct subsidence took place, causing special damage to the plaintiff. It was admitted before your Lordships

G "that after the partial subsidence in 1868 the strata remained practically quiescent until the working of the coal in the next adjoining land by the owner thereof in the year 1881, which working caused a creep, and a further subsidence."

And further:

H "that if the owner of the adjoining land had not worked his coal there would have been no further subsidence, and that if the coal under the respondent's land had not been taken out, or if the appellants had left sufficient support under the respondent's land, then the working of the adjoining owner would have done no harm."

I It will be observed on these admissions that the partial subsidence of 1868 had practically ceased, and that a fresh creep and subsidence took place in 1882, which would not have taken place if the defendants had left sufficient natural support under the plaintiffs' land, or, we may add, had substituted adequate artificial support. There can be no doubt that, though there has been no act of commission by the defendants since the completion of the excavation of 1868, yet, if there had been no subsidence causing damage to the plaintiff prior to that of 1882, the present action could be maintained; but it is alleged that, as the plaintiff had a complete cause of action in 1868, arising from the prior excavation and the subsidence of 1868, the Statute of Limitations then began to operate, and has barred the present action. It was further argued that in 1868 the plaintiff could and ought to have insisted on recovering once and for all any damage that might arise prospectively from the excavation of 1868, according to the rule of law which, in order to prevent a multiplicity of actions, provides that damages resulting from one and the same A cause of action must be assessed and recovered once and for all.

That rule was applied by the majority of the court in Lamb v. Walker (2), and is not controverted. It is not inflexible, and admits of exceptions. We have to consider what was the cause of action in 1868, and whether the cause of action of 1882 is one and the same cause of action as that of 1868. If it is so, then the defendants are entitled to succeed on the defence of the Statute of Limitations. B This appeal represents a class of cases peculiar and exceptional, to meet which, and to avoid grave inconvenience, if not injustice, our flexible common law has somewhat moulded itself. I deprecate discussing some of the arguments addressed to us, which seemed to me to be too fine, such as, for instance, whether the original act of the defendants was "innocent" or "perfectly innocent." The question here is not whether the original act of the defendants was "innocent," but whether they C have occasioned damage to the plaintiff without any inevitable necessity. I am of opinion that COCKBURN, C.J., in Lamb v. Walker (2), and the Court of Appeal in the case before us, were right in resting on Backhouse v. Bonomi (1), and deducing from it a principle which governs the question. Backhouse v. Bonomi (1) is not satisfactorily reported. We gather from the report in your Lordships' House with some difficulty what was actually decided. Mr. Manisty in his argument in that D case at your Lordships' Bar puts it thus (9 H.L.Cas. at pp. 509, 510):

"The act done was a perfectly innocent act at the time it was done; the argument on the other side is that it must be treated as having been injurious, because it might afterwards become so. If the action had been brought when the act was first done, the answer would have been that the defendant had a right to do the act, and that no damage had been occasioned." E

LORD WESTBURY says (ibid. at p. 512):

"I think it is abundantly clear, both on principle and authority, that when the enjoyment of the house is interfered with by the actual occurrence of the mischief, the cause of action then arises, and the action may then be maintained."

LORD CRANWORTH adds (ibid.):

"It has been supposed that the right of the party whose land has been interfered with is a right to what is called the pillars or the support. In truth his right is to the ordinary enjoyment of his land, and until that ordinary enjoyment is interfered with he has nothing of which to complain. That seems the principle on which the case ought to be disposed of." F

It seems to me that Backhouse v. Bonomi (1) did decide that the removal of the subjacent strata was an act (I will not say an innocent act) done in the legitimate exercise of ordinary ownership, which per se gave no right of action to the owner of the surface, and that the latter had no right of action until his enjoyment of the surface was actually disturbed. The disturbance then constituted his right of action. In the present case there was a complete cause of action in 1868, in respect of which compensation was given, but there was a liability to further disturbance. The defendants permitted this state of things to continue without taking any steps to prevent the occurrence of any future injury. A fresh subsidence took place, causing a new and further disturbance of the plaintiff's enjoyment, which gave him a new and distinct cause of action. If this view is correct, then it follows that the cause of action now insisted on by the plaintiff is not the same cause of action as that of 1868, but is in point of law, as it is physically, a new and independent cause of action arising in 1882, to which the defence of the Statute of Limitations is not applicable. The necessary conclusion is that Lamb v. Walker (2) was not correctly decided, and that the able reasoning of COCKBURN, C.J., in that case ought to have prevailed. G H I

SPICER v. MARTIN

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Watson, Lord FitzGerald and Lord Macnaghten), July 2, 9, December 18, 1888]

[Reported 14 App. Cas. 12; 58 L.J.Ch. 309; 60 L.T. 546;
53 J.P. 516; 37 W.R. 689]

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant prohibiting use of premises for carrying on business—Consideration of transactions between landlord and tenant as a whole.

The appellant purchased various houses from the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851, the conveyance of each of them containing a covenant that he would not carry on, or permit to be carried on, any trade or business, but would keep the house as a private dwelling-house. The appellant let one of the houses to the respondent, to whom his solicitor sent a draft lease, with a letter in which he said that the draft was in the form used for all the houses on the appellant's estate. The draft contained a restrictive covenant similar to that in the conveyance to the appellant, with a note to the effect that there was a covenant to that effect in the conveyance. Some time afterwards the respondent entered into negotiations with the appellant for a long lease of the same house at a ground rent, he paying a premium, and a draft agreement was sent which contained a provision that the lease should contain such covenants on the part of the lessee as were usually inserted by the lessor in leases of his other houses. The respondent's solicitor thereupon wrote for the form of lease used by the appellant, a copy of a lease containing the restrictive covenant was sent, and a lease containing a similar covenant was granted to the respondent. The appellant afterwards entered into negotiations for the sale of some of his houses to a company for the purpose of their being converted into a hotel. In an action by the respondent for an injunction to restrain the appellant and other defendants from carrying on or permitting to be carried on upon any part of the appellant's property the trade or business of a hotel,

Held: in view of the terms of the documents evidencing the transactions between the appellant and the respondent the respondent was entitled to the benefit of the restrictive covenant, and to the injunction which he claimed.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (COTTON, LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ.), reported 84 Ch.D. 1, affirming a decision of BACON, V.-C. B

Rigby, Q.C., and E. Ford for the appellant.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Millar, Q.C., and A. R. Kirby for the respondent.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Dec. 18, 1888. The following opinions (except that of LORD WATSON) were read. C

LORD FITZGERALD.—In dealing with the questions in this case your Lordships may look at the title of Mr. Spicer as disclosed on the agreement and conveyances before us, and appearing on the abstract of title submitted to the solicitors who represented the respondent Martin in the negotiations with Mr. Spicer, and also at the occurrences of 1874 on the negotiations for the lease for fourteen years. That lease is directly connected with the lease for eighty years which was made during the continuance of the lease for fourteen years. Both leases are between the same parties and negotiated between the same solicitors. The solicitors for Mr. Martin had apparently the same information and the same representations before them on both negotiations. The estate in fee had been in the Exhibition Commissioners, who, acting as a public body and apparently in the interests of the public, in their preliminary agreement with Mr. Spicer, and in their subsequent conveyances to him, imposed an obligation, D

“that he, his heirs or assigns, would not exercise or carry on, or permit or suffer to be exercised or carried on, by any person whomsoever upon any part of the premises thereby conveyed, any trade or business whatsoever, but shall keep and use the same premises as and for private dwelling-houses only.” E

The original agreement of the commissioners with Spicer was in fact a building contract, and provided that Spicer was to prepare a block or plan laying out the ground and showing its appropriation, and it was to be devoted to the erection of “seven good and substantial dwelling-houses” according to specified plans, and sometimes described in the agreement as “first class.” F

I can entertain no doubt that the commissioners made those provisions in the interest of the local authority, and of those who might afterwards become the owners or lessees of the several houses so to be erected. The fourteen years’ lease of No. 2 to George Martin, the respondent, is preceded by an agreement which provides that the lease should (inter alia) contain “such other covenants as are usual and comprised in the lessors’ lease.” By “lessors’ lease” is meant the conveyance from the commissioners to Spicer. It was in the course of the negotiations for that lease that the present appellant, then acting as solicitor for his late father, John Spicer, in sending the draft of the lease for fourteen years to George Martin for approval, writes: “I may perhaps add that the draft is the form used for the other houses in Cromwell-gardens.” That draft lease contains a covenant on the part of the lessee that the demised premises should not be used “for any purpose whatsoever other than as a private dwelling-house,” with a marginal observation by the present appellant in these words: “There is a covenant to this effect in the conveyance of these premises to Mr. Spicer. G. J. S.” That lease was executed in the terms of the draft. G

In 1880 Mr. Martin, availing himself of a provision in the lease of 1874 (that is the fourteen years’ lease), gave notice of his intention to surrender in 1881, but there never was a surrender in fact of that lease. Negotiations were entered on for the purchase of a lease for eighty years, which, when completed by the execution H

A of the new lease, created a surrender by operation of law of the earlier lease. Your Lordships have not before you the earlier portion of these negotiations, but we may look at the position of the parties and the circumstances of the sale. The parties were the same, the solicitors were the same, and Martin was then still in possession under the lease of 1874. There is a letter from Martin to John Spicer relating apparently to the notice of surrender, in which he quotes, and sends to B him, a letter from his solicitors in which they ask him to get Mr. Spicer's acknowledgment of the receipt of that notice, "and then we can put it up with our papers." This passage seems to indicate that Ashurst & Co. retained the papers connected with the lease of 1874, and had before them the representation contained in the letter of Feb. 26, 1874. The terms of the new contract appear to have been substantially arranged before Sept. 21, 1880, for on that day the C present appellant writes to Ashurst & Co.: "I send you the draft contract for sale No. 2, Cromwell Gardens." That draft agreement deserves the special attention which was given to it in argument, and will be given to it in the opinion which LORD MACNAGHTEN will read after me. I have read his opinion, and I concur in the observations which will be made by him, and in the inferences he will deduce. It will be seen that the agreement for the lease for eighty years D was subsequently carried into effect by a lease prepared by the present appellant.

It seems to me that these two transactions run into each other and are not to be separated, and that each was subject to and brought about by the same representation that the whole of this property of the seven dwelling-houses was and was to continue to be on the part of both the landlord and his lessees subject to the same restriction, that the houses were to be used as dwelling-houses only and for E no other purpose, and that the purchaser Martin was to be subject to and to have the benefit and protection of that restriction. I cannot doubt that both parties so intended in honesty and good faith. The transaction of 1880 was really that Martin purchased the larger term of eighty years commencing from a date then three years past, at a lesser rent, but for which he paid a premium of £11,000. It was but the extension of the same relation of lessor and lessee for a longer F term and at a reduced rent, and the representations which affected the first were, as it appears to me, equally applicable to the second lease. There is every ingredient in this case from which we may reasonably infer an intention that the lessees or purchasers were to be protected by and have the benefit of the restrictive covenant as between Spicer and the commissioners, and to be bound by a similar obligation entered into by each on his own behalf. It can make no difference that G Spicer's original single obligation to the commissioners was split up by the adoption of a separate conveyance in fee of each of the seven building lots.

The deed of March 25, 1867, which is the completion of that arrangement, seems to me to be a persuasive piece of evidence. The seven houses had been before then erected, and the seven conveyances made to Spicer by the commissioners: The deed recites all this, and that each of the seven conveyances contained the H restrictive covenant which it sets out in terms:

I "and that it was also agreed that, for the purpose of saving expense, the commissioners would, in lieu of requiring counterparts of the seven indentures, accept a covenant from the said John Spicer, by a separate deed in the form of the covenant on his part contained in the same indentures, but applicable to the whole of the premises comprised in the said several indentures respectively."

The deed witnessed that, in pursuance of the said lastly mentioned agreement, the said John Spicer did

"thereby for himself, his heirs, appointees, and assigns, covenant with the said Exhibition Commissioners, that he the said John Spicer, his heirs, appointees; and assigns, will not exercise or carry on, or permit or suffer to be exercised or carried on, by any person or persons whomsoever, upon any part of the premises by the said several indentures or any of them respectively granted and released, or intended so to be, any trade or business whatsoever, but will keep and use the said premises as and for private dwelling-houses only." A

The restrictive obligation, it will be seen from the last deed, was one single and undivided, applicable to the whole, and to each and every of the seven houses; and Mr. Spicer has himself, while giving notice to his lessees and assigns of the obligation he had undertaken, stipulated that they severally should enter into a similar covenant as to his own holding. I cannot entertain any reasonable doubt that, as between the appellant and the respondent, the latter was, according to right and justice, entitled to the full benefit and protection of the restrictive covenant which the vendor had entered into with the commissioners. The appellant Spicer alone contests the respondent's claim. The lessees or purchasers of two other of the seven houses were made defendants, but offered no opposition, and other defendants, one Brett [who was promoting the formation of the hotel company] and the intended hotel company, have vanished. B C

In my opinion, the decision of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed, and so affirmed on the ground and for the reasons which I have given, namely, that the lessee, while he was on the one hand subject to the obligation of the restrictive covenant contained in his lease, was also on the other hand entitled to the benefit of the covenant entered into by Spicer with the commissioners to the same effect. The decision of the Court of Appeal proceeded on a question somewhat different, being one of mixed fact and law, which may be thus expressed, viz., whether the representations alleged to have been made by or on behalf of Spicer were so made, and were such, that the court ought to deduce from those representations a collateral contractual obligation on his part with Mr. Martin that the tenants of the other six dwelling-houses should be severally bound to use the houses as and for private dwelling-houses only, and not otherwise, and that he, Mr. Spicer, would not permit his property to be used save in accordance with that obligation. The houses 3, 4, 5, and 7 had been dealt with by John Spicer prior to 1874, and the leases each contained that restrictive covenant. In 1876 Hammersley acquired No. 6, but subject to the same restriction. The same observation applies to the dealing with Shafto as to No. 3 in 1876. In the view which I have expressed as to the proper ratio decidendi, it is not now necessary to express an opinion on the difficult question on which the Court of Appeal acted. I desire to say, however, that if I had been called on now to express an opinion on it, the inclination of my mind would be in favour of the view on which the judgment of the Court of Appeal rested. The temptation of a large price was unfortunately sufficient to induce the appellant to become active in assisting to defeat the arrangement he had so entered into. It is not necessary here to examine in detail the action of the appellant. He was not only active in promoting the design of Mr. Reginald Brett, but he has maintained at the Bar here his right to do so. It makes no difference that the actual project has come to an end since the institution of the suit, and possibly because of its institution. The suit became necessary because of the action of the appellant, and the respondent is entitled to an injunction in the modified form adopted by the Court of Appeal. I move your Lordships, therefore, that the decision of the Court of Appeal be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs. D E F G H

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The learned counsel for the respondent put their case in two ways. Adopting the arguments which seem to have found most favour with the Court of Appeal, they contended that the communications addressed to Mr. Martin and his solicitors by Mr. Spicer's solicitor involved representations which amounted to a collateral contract by Mr. Spicer as to the future management of the estate on which Mr. Martin was induced to purchase a residence. They also contended that, under the circumstances of the case, and having regard to the nature of the transaction which resulted in that purchase, Mr. Martin was entitled to the benefit of the restrictive covenant which the I

A Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851 imposed on Mr. Spicer, and through Mr. Spicer on all persons deriving title from him to any portion of the estate.

B Certainly the communications which passed between the parties are not to be disregarded. They form part of the transaction. They serve to record some facts which otherwise might have been left to inference or conjecture; but still, if the true view were that "this case really turns on the correspondence," to use the language of one of the learned judges, or "really depends upon the construction of the letters which passed between the plaintiff and the defendant Spicer," as another member of the court sums up the question, I should have had a difficulty in advising your Lordships to affirm the decision under appeal. Mr. Martin's connection with the estate began in 1874. On that occasion no correspondence of any sort or kind appears to have passed between the parties until Mr. Martin C had entered into a binding agreement to take a lease of No. 2, Cromwell Gardens. The lease was to be for a term of fourteen years, determinable by the lessee at the end of the first seven years. One of the conditions of the agreement was, that the lease should contain such "covenants as are usual and comprised in" the conveyance to the lessor. Shortly afterwards a draft lease, on a lithographed form, with some alterations in writing, was sent to Mr. Martin. It was accompanied by a D letter, which stated that the draft was "the form used for other houses in Cromwell Gardens, and, in fact, for all the houses on Mr. Spicer's estates." In the margin of the draft, opposite to a written addition, there was a note in these words: "There is a covenant to this effect in the conveyance of these premises to Mr. Spicer." In due course the draft was approved, and the lease was executed in May, 1874. This lease was terminated by notice in 1880 at the end of the first E seven years.

Then there were negotiations for a new lease of the same premises for a long term of years, at a premium of £11,000. A draft agreement was sent by Mr. Spicer's solicitor to the solicitors who acted for Mr. Martin, which originally contained this clause:

F "The said lease shall contain such covenants, conditions, and agreements, on the part of the purchaser or lessee, as are usually contained in leases granted by the said vendor of his other houses in Cromwell Gardens."

Mr. Martin's solicitors asked for "a copy of the form of lease referred to in the draft agreement as in use on the estate." They said they could not settle the draft without it. They also suggested that the shortest plan would be for G Mr. Spicer's solicitor to prepare and send to them the draft lease, which might then be annexed to the agreement. A form of lease was accordingly sent, which apparently was a copy of a lease actually granted to a tenant of one of the other houses in Cromwell Gardens. Accompanying this document there was a letter in these words, "As promised I beg to forward draft of proposed lease herein." The draft was approved, and scheduled to the agreement, which was altered in the H clause I have quoted, so as to make it refer to the draft lease as the form of lease to be granted in pursuance of the agreement.

I I have now stated the whole of the communications which passed between the parties from the very beginning to the end of the transaction, so far as they are relevant to the present question. Whatever construction may be placed upon the communications which passed in 1874, I much doubt whether they are so connected with the transactions that took place seven years afterwards as to entitle Mr. Martin to rely upon them as a representation inducing the contract of 1880. But, however that may be, I must confess that I am unable to see any difference, as regards the question now before your Lordships, between the communications which took place in 1874 and those which took place in 1880. On the first occasion the information was furnished in fulfilment of an antecedent obligation contained in the agreement for a lease. On the second occasion the information was supplied in compliance with a request by Mr. Martin's solicitors who wanted it in order to enable them to settle the draft then before them. In each case the representation which was made was nothing more than a simple statement as to the terms of the restrictive covenant which, for himself and his sequels in right, Mr. Spicer had contracted to observe. In itself the statement was admittedly accurate. It was not, in my judgment, designed or calculated to put Mr. Martin off his guard. It was not intended, or apparently understood, to convey any assurance as to the continuance of the existing state of things. A

In this respect the present case is altogether different from Piggott v. Stratton (2), on which the judgment of the Court of Appeal seems to be founded. In Piggott v. Stratton (2), one Stratton had taken a building lease of two plots of ground in the Isle of Wight. There was a restrictive covenant in respect of plot A., with the object of preserving an uninterrupted view of the sea for the benefit of houses to be erected on plot B. Stratton granted an underlease of plot B. During the negotiations for the underlease he had told the under-lessee that he was prevented by the terms of his lease from building so as to obstruct the sea view. On this assurance the underlease was taken, and villas were built which were afterwards acquired by Piggott. Stratton then went to the lessor and surrendered his lease for the purpose of getting rid of the restrictive covenant. But it was held that the obligation of the covenant still remained. What was actually said by Stratton may have been nothing more than a representation, accurate in itself, of an existing fact. But it was intended to be understood, and was in fact understood, as an assurance that he had no power to obstruct the sea view during the currency of the lease, and that so long as the underlease lasted, the under-lessee would be safe from the apprehended obstruction. That was a case of bad faith, and LORD CAMPBELL, L.C., denounced Stratton's conduct in terms which would be absurdly extravagant if applied to the conduct of the commissioners, or to the conduct of the appellant. There is no room for any charge of bad faith in the present case. Strange as it may seem, I have no doubt that both the commissioners and the appellant honestly thought that they were not even acting unreasonably or unfairly to Mr. Martin. B C D E

Although the correspondence of itself would not, as I venture to think, give the respondent a right to the interposition of the court, the question still remains whether Mr. Martin was not, under all the circumstances, entitled to the benefit of the restrictive covenant. On this branch of the case COTTON, L.J., apparently would have been in favour of the respondent. But the point did not form the ground of his decision. The law on the subject has never been stated more clearly than it was by HALL, V.-C., in Renals v. Cowlshaw (1). The opinion of that learned judge on any question relating to conveyancing and real property law, owing to his great experience as a conveyancer, would of itself carry the utmost weight. In this instance his opinion was emphatically confirmed in the Court of Appeal, where JAMES, L.J., expressly concurred in every word of the vice-chancellor's judgment. It has also, I may observe, been approved and followed in the Queen's Bench Division: Nottingham Brick Co. v. Butler (3). The learned counsel on both sides accepted the statement of HALL, V.-C., as an accurate exposition of the law. I should be disposed to hesitate if I were invited to extend the principles recognised in Renals v. Cowlshaw (1). But, at the same time, I think those principles, as defined by the vice-chancellor, are perfectly sound, consistent with the authorities and consistent with good sense. I think they apply to the present case, and I think they must govern it. If the site of the houses now known as Cromwell Gardens had been put up for sale by auction in building lots according to a plan corresponding with that on Mr. Martin's lease, and if the conditions of sale had prescribed that houses should be built such as those which have actually been erected, and that every purchaser should bind himself by a covenant in the terms of the restrictive covenant now in question, no one, I think, could have doubted that each purchaser would, as against the vendor and as against every co-purchaser, have had a right to the benefit of the covenant, although there might have been no direct stipulation to that effect, and no express provision for mutual covenants by the purchasers inter se. F G H I

What difference is there in substance between the case I have supposed and the case which has occurred? The site was laid out by the commissioners in accordance with a building scheme. The houses were to be built as private houses, and to be used for no other purpose; a covenant to that effect was imposed on the builder who bought the ground, and intended to parcel it out and sell it, or let it again. The houses were actually built as private houses, and offered to the public as such. Their character was unmistakable; and every person who took one of the houses was required to enter into the same restrictive covenant. Every lessee in ordinary course must have had the same information as Mr. Martin had. Every lessee must have known that every other lessee was, or would be, bound to use his house as a private residence only. This restriction was obviously for the benefit of all the lessees on the estate; they all had a common interest in maintaining the restriction. This community of interest necessarily, I think, requires and imports reciprocity of obligation. As regards the appellant, the case, I think, is doubly clear. It seems to me that, when Mr. Spicer put his houses in Cromwell Gardens on the market, he invited the public to come in and take a portion of an estate which was bound by one general law, a law perfectly well understood, and one calculated and intended to add to the security of the lessees, and consequently to increase the price of the houses. The benefit of that increase, whatever it was, Mr. Spicer got. Can he or his representative be permitted to destroy the thing he sold by authorising the use of part of the estate for a purpose inconsistent with the law by which he professed to bind the whole? For these reasons I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

LORD WATSON.—In this case I have had the advantage of considering in print the opinion which has just been delivered by LORD MACNAGHTEN, and finding there all that I could desire to say myself, I shall simply express my concurrence.

Appeal dismissed.

Bankruptcy—Property available for distribution—Property in reputed ownership of bankrupt—Goods—“Things in action”—Shares in limited company.

By s. 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [re-enacted by Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 38]: “The property of the bankrupt divisible amongst his creditors, and in this Act referred to as the property of the bankrupt . . . shall comprise the following particulars. . . . (iii) All goods being, at the commencement of the bankruptcy, in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt, in his trade or business, by the consent and permission of the true owner, under such circumstances that he is the reputed owner thereof; provided that things in action other than debts due or growing due to the bankrupt in the course of his trade or business, shall not be deemed goods within the meaning of this section.” By s. 168 (1) [s. 167 of Act of 1914]: “ ‘Goods’ includes all chattels personal.”

B. and T., who carried on business in partnership, purchased shares in a railway company with moneys belonging to the firm. The shares were registered in the name of B., and he deposited the certificates, together with a transfer in blank, with the appellant bank as security for a loan for the purposes of the partnership business. The partners having become bankrupt,

Held: (i) shares in a limited company, transferable by deed, were personal chattels and so “goods” within the meaning of s. 44 (iii), but they were also “things in action” and so within the exclusion from the operation of the section provided by the proviso; (ii) goods belonging to a third party were not within s. 44 (iii) unless they were left with the bankrupt in such circumstances that he, as reputed owner, could sell them or obtain credit on them in the course of his trade or business; anyone who was about to purchase the shares from the bankrupts in the present case, or was about to give credit to them as being the owners of the entire interest in the shares, would require that the share certificates be produced or accounted for, and that, in the absence of fraud on the part of the partners (which the House had no right to assume might take place), would lead to disclosure of the fact that the shares had been pledged; and, therefore, the partners were not reputed owners of the shares within s. 44 (iii) and the bank were entitled to retain them as against the trustee in bankruptcy.

Appeal by the plaintiffs in the action from a decision of the Court of Appeal (COTTON and LINDLEY, L.JJ., FRY, L.J., dissenting), reported 30 Ch.D. 261, affirming a decision of BACON, V.-C.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., Rigby, Q.C., and Northmore Lawrence for the appellants. E

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Marten, Q.C., and Buckley for the respondent.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

June 29, 1886. The following opinions (except that of LORD HALSBURY) were read. F

LORD BLACKBURN.—This is an appeal against an order of the Court of Appeal affirming a judgment of BACON, V.-C., dated July 28, 1884, and orders that the plaintiffs, the Colonial Bank, do pay the costs. The judgment of July 28, so far as it is material, was as follows :

“This court, being of opinion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to the relief prayed by the statement of claim in this action, doth order that the action stand dismissed out of this court, with costs, to be paid by the plaintiffs.” G

The facts are not in dispute, and, as far as material in the view I take of the case, may be briefly stated. The firm of P. W. Thomas, Sons & Co. consisted of two persons, W. E. Blakeway and Perry William Thomas. The firm bought and paid for 7,108 £10 shares in the Forth Bridge Railway, a company incorporated by an Act of Parliament incorporating the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845. The name of W. E. Blakeway was entered in the register of shareholders as entitled to the 7,108 shares, and certificates were delivered in his name, but the shares belonged to the firm. The certificate of the shares (as to the form and legal effect of which I will say a word a little later) were deposited with the Colonial Bank as a security for advances made to the firm by that bank. They were accompanied by what is commonly called a blank transfer signed and sealed by W. E. Blakeway. That, not being a deed, was inoperative as a transfer. It was, however, I think, evidence that the deposit of the certificates was intended to be as a security. There was ample evidence, independent of this, to show that this was the real nature of the transaction, and that, so long as the firm continued sui juris, the Colonial Bank had a right to detain these certificates till the advances for which they were pledged were paid off; and it is not disputed H I

A now that, while the pledgors remained sui juris, the pledgee would be entitled to the relief which the Colonial Bank have prayed by the statement of claim in this action against the defendant. Some doubt which might seem to be thrown on this by Ex parte Boulton (1) was removed by the decision in Re Shelley, Ex parte Stewart (2). But, though this was so, the firm were still entitled to what, for want of a better term, I may (not quite accurately) call the equity of redemption in the shares. It was not contested that, as it has turned out, the value of the shares was not sufficient to meet the unpaid advances, so that this property remaining in the firm has turned out not to be of any value. Still it was their property. Both partners became bankrupt in January, 1884, and the defendant was, on Feb. 1, 1884, appointed trustee under the bankruptcy.

C LORD WESTBURY, in Re Shelley, Ex parte Stewart (2), points out that the general rule in bankruptcy was that the assignee took the property of a bankrupt subject to the equities which affected it in his hands, and consequently that the only question under the bankruptcy laws then in force (Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act, 1849) was whether the case was brought within s. 125 of that Act. The only question in the present case is whether the case is brought within s. 44 (iii) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which comprises among the property of the bankrupt D divisible among his creditors "all goods," which by the interpretation clause (s. 169) in this Act, "unless the context otherwise requires," includes

E "all chattels personal being at the commencement of the bankruptcy in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt in his trade or business, by the consent and permission of the true owner, under such circumstances that he is reputed owner thereof; provided that things in action other than debts due or growing due to the bankrupt in the course of his trade or business shall not be deemed goods within the meaning of this section." [See now Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 38 (b), s. 167.]

F There can, I think, be no doubt that shares in a railway company, though not goods in the ordinary sense of the word, are personal chattels, and, I think, as little doubt that the Colonial Bank are the true owners of the equitable right which they had acquired in the shares. But for the proviso, therefore, I think the chief question would have been whether this equitable interest was in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupts, who were the pledgors and true owners of the equity of redemption, by the consent and permission of the Colonial Bank. G under such circumstances that they (the bankrupts) were the reputed owners of the equitable interest. A further point was made founded on the words "in his trade or business." I fear I did not quite appreciate the argument, and, as the words which are new may be important in other cases, I prefer to consider the case as if those words were not here.

H I think that the owner of chattels personal not passing by delivery, though he can create a good equitable title in a pledgee for the purpose of securing a debt, may still continue to be reputed owner of the whole property. It was argued that there was an inexorable rule that he must so continue, unless the persons to whom anyone who took a subsequent conveyance from the person once the owner of the property would have to apply in order to perfect that title had knowledge of the pledge. I think that such knowledge in them is one way in I which it may be shown that the pledgor is not to be considered as reputed owner. If the decisions were confined to cases of notice, that is, notice given to those persons by the pledgee, as distinguished from mere knowledge acquired by them otherwise, it might be said that the cases only showed that the pledgee, having given that notice and done all that was in his power to make the pledge known, could not be said to consent to the apparent ownership. But Ex parte Richardson (3); Re Shelley, Ex parte Stewart (2); and Re Worcester, Ex parte Agra Bank (4) all show that knowledge in those persons, though not derived from the pledgee, is a sufficient circumstance to prevent reputed ownership. I do not think there is either authority or principle for saying it is the only circumstance that can have that effect. A

LORD HARDWICKE, who thought that the statute only applied where the bankrupt had been originally owner, says, in Ryall v. Rolle (5) (1 Ves. Sen. at p. 372):

“It appears that the general view and intent of the provision now under consideration was to prevent traders from gaining a delusive credit, by a false appearance of substance to mislead those who should deal with them.” B

In Cole v. North Western Bank (6), in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, it is said (L.R. 10 C.P. at p. 362):

“At common law, a person in possession of goods could not confer on another, either by sale or pledge, any better title to the goods than he had himself. To this general rule there was an exception of sales in market overt, and an apparent exception where the person in possession had a title defeasible on account of fraud. But the general rule was that, to make either a sale or a pledge valid against the owner of the goods sold or pledged, it must be shown that the seller or pledgor had authority from the owner to sell or pledge, as the case might be. If the owner of the goods had so acted as to clothe the seller or pledgor with apparent authority to sell or pledge, he was at common law precluded, as against those who were induced bona fide to act on that apparent authority, from denying that he had given that authority, and the result as to them was the same as if he had really given it. But there was no such preclusion as against those who had notice that the real authority was limited.” C D

The policy of the Bankrupts Act, 1731, as explained by LORD HARDWICKE, went a good deal further. It took, in the event of bankruptcy, the property of the person who had left it in the hands of the trader to pay the general creditors of the bankrupt, though no credit had actually been obtained upon it; but I think it never was so unjust as to take his property, unless it was left by him in such circumstances as that credit might have been obtained upon it. E

This principle seems to have been lost sight of in some cases. I think, however, it was fully recognised and restored in Re Couston, Ex parte Watkins (7). That was as to the claim of one who had bought and paid for wine, but left it in the custody of the vendor, who afterwards became bankrupt as to goods, not as to chattels such as shares. But the principles explained by LORD SELBORNE, are, I think, equally applicable to both. He says (8 Ch. App. at p. 528): F

“There is no inflexible rule of law that, because a man who was once an owner of goods and has sold them remains in possession of them, he must therefore be held to be the reputed owner. The statute does not say that. If he remains in possession with the reputation of ownership, and in those circumstances which create a reputation of ownership, then the property will pass to his trustees. But it is always a question of fact whether or no the circumstances are such as to create that reputation. . . . It is enough for the doctrine if those goods are in such a situation as to convey to the minds of those who know their situation the reputation of ownership, that reputation arising by the legitimate exercise of reason and judgment on the knowledge of those facts which are capable of being generally known to those who choose to make inquiry on the subject. . . . So, on the other hand, it is not at all necessary, in order to exclude the doctrine of reputed ownership, to show that every creditor, or any particular creditor, or the outside world who are not creditors, knew anything about particular goods one way or another. It is quite enough, in my judgment, if the situation of the goods was such as to exclude all legitimate ground from which those who knew anything about that situation could infer the ownership to be in the person having actual possession.” G H I

A MELLISH, L.J., says (ibid. at p. 533) :

B “Reputed owners of the goods so left in their possession, which surely must mean reputed to be the owners by the persons who have dealings with them, and who might be deceived. . . . I must also say that it is extremely desirable that, as far as can be done reasonably and consistently with the rules of law, the rules of law should be interpreted so as to be in accordance with the customs of trade.”

I now return to the form of the certificates in this case, which contain in them this note :

C “Note, in the event of sale or transmission this certificate must be surrendered with the deed of transfer, whether the deed transmits all or any of the shares, before the transfer can be registered, or a new certificate issued.”

D I may deal with this more briefly because a very analogous case, Société Générale de Paris v. Walker (8), has recently been decided in this House, and I see no reason to alter any part of what I then said. It was argued in the present case that a person remaining on the register and executing a transfer, or the transferee, would have a right to bring an action against the company who acted upon this note, and declined to register the transfer until the certificate was produced. I do not think so; if the company declined to do so after the non-production of the certificate was accounted for, as by proof that it was lost or destroyed, or that it was wrongfully withheld by some one who had had no right to withhold it, I suppose a court would, on proof of those facts, order registration, probably requiring as a condition that an indemnity should be given. But I continue to think that it is not wrong in the directors to act in the way which by this note they hold forth that they will act; and I think it at least doubtful whether, if they hastily and without inquiry registered the transfer, they might not incur responsibility to a pledgee who had the certificates with that note upon them if he suffered loss from their so acting.

E The custom of trade, at least as far as regards the Stock Exchange, has always been that before the buyer of shares pays his money he is entitled to have delivered to him a transfer accompanied by certificates showing that the person who executes the transfer was the registered holder of the shares. I think, therefore, it is clear that anyone who was about to give credit to the bankrupts as being the owners of the entire interest in those shares ought to know that he had no legitimate ground for believing that they were such owners of the whole interest unless the certificates were produced or accounted for. Any inquiry as to what had become of the certificates would (unless the bankrupts were fraudulent liars, which we have no right to assume) have led to the disclosure of the fact that they were pledged. I think, therefore, it is shown that the circumstances were such as to prove that the bankrupts were not reputed owners of the interest of the Colonial Bank in the shares, and that the order appealed against is wrong on that ground. The judges below had not in Société Générale de Paris v. Walker (8) perceived the importance of the production of the certificates, and they decided this case before this House had given their judgment on appeal in that case. They did not, therefore, notice this point.

H On the construction of the proviso, I think that FRY, L.J., put the right construction on it. The question, I think, is correctly said to be whether the expression “things in action,” as used in this enactment, is intended to include shares in a railway company, which clearly are personal chattels, the property in which does not pass by mere delivery, but does pass by a deed of transfer duly stamped (Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845), when delivered to the secretary and by him entered in the registry :

I “and until such transfer has been so delivered to the secretary as aforesaid, the vendor of the share shall continue liable to the company for any calls that may be made upon such share, and the purchaser of the share shall not be entitled to receive any share of the profits of the undertaking or to vote in respect of such share." A

The principal argument used by counsel for the respondent, and it seems to have prevailed both with COTTON, L.J., and LINDLEY, L.J., was that choses in action, of which things in action is a translation, had a technical sense in our old law limited to the right to sue for a debt or damages. I do not think that made out. There always was a difference between personal property such as to be capable of being stolen, taken, and carried away, and so as to be the subject of larceny at common law, and to be capable of being seized by the sheriff under a fi. fa., and other kinds of personal property. Personal property of the first sort, when belonging to a married woman, vested at once in the husband. The others the husband might reduce into possession, but did not have till he had done so. And when new kinds of property, like stock in the Funds, or, in more modern times, shares in the companies, were created, questions arose whether they were within the principle of being in possession or not; but till the phrase was used in the Companies Clauses Act, 1869, it never became important to inquire whether they were to be called things in action or not. But it is noticeable that in Dundas v. Dutens (9), LORD THURLOW, L.C., speaking of stock or the Funds, said (1 Ves. at p. 198): B C D

"Those things, such as stock, debts, &c., being choses in action, are not liable. They could not be taken upon a levamur facias."

The reason was the same as that for which they could not be the subject of larceny at common law, because they could not be seized. But LORD THURLOW thought choses in action an apt expression to use with respect to such things. Again, shares are not within the [repealed] s. 17 of the Statute of Frauds, because they do not pass by delivery. LORD DENMAN, in Humble v. Mitchell (10), thought choses in action a proper phrase to express that idea. Again, in Re Worcester, Ex parte Agra Bank (4), WOOD, L.J., in speaking of an assignment of shares, uses the phrase "whether in an assignment of a chose in action." He had no need to inquire whether it was a strictly correct phrase, but to him it appeared, as it had before done to LORD THURLOW and LORD DENMAN, that the phrase expressed the idea. And I think it was hardly disputed that, in modern times, lawyers have accurately, or inaccurately, used the phrase choses in action as including all personal chattels that are not in possession. E F

In what sense, then, is it used in s. 15 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, from which the present enactment is taken? It is not disputed that these words show that the legislature intended to take policies of insurance out of the order and disposition clause. Why not shares in companies also? I cannot answer that question in any way satisfactory to my mind. For this reason, also, I think that the judgment is wrong, and that the judgment of the vice-chancellor ought to have been that the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief prayed by the statement of claim. I, therefore, propose that the judgment appealed against and the judgment of July 28, 1884, therein affirmed be reversed; and that the costs of the appellant in this House and in the Court of Appeal be borne by the respondent. G H

LORD WATSON. I am of opinion that the judgments appealed from ought to be reversed. The principle which appears to me to be deducible from the authorities is that goods belonging to a third party are not within s. 44 (iii) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, unless they were left with the bankrupt in such circumstances that he, as reputed owner, could have sold them, or otherwise obtained credit upon them, in the course of his trade or business. I do not think the 7,018 shares in the Forth Bridge Railway Co. were left in that position at the commencement of the bankruptcy of the firm of P. W. Thomas, Sons & Co., and its individual partners. The appellants had at that time become the equitable I

A owners of the shares, and were lawful holders of the certificates issued by the railway company, which bore upon the face of them an intimation that “in the event of sale or transmission, this certificate must be surrendered with the deed of transfer, whether the deed transfers all or any of the shares, before the transfer can be registered or a new certificate issued.”

B That is, in my opinion, an assurance by the company upon which a lawful holder of the certificate is entitled to rely, to the effect that, according to their usual practice, the company will decline to register any transfer of shares until the relative certificates are produced or their non-production is satisfactorily accounted for. Société Générale de Paris v. Walker (8), as decided by this House, is, in my opinion, a clear authority for holding that a transfer of these 7,018 shares by
C William Evan Blakeway, after the certificates were deposited with the appellants, would not have been “in order.” In other words, the transfer would not have been registered until some inquiry was made and some evidence submitted to the railway company showing that the certificates had been lost or destroyed. A truthful explanation would at once have revealed the equitable ownership of the appellants; so that the transfer could not have been made effectual unless D Mr. Blakeway had chosen to commit fraud, and possibly perjury as well. In that state of matters I do not think Mr. Blakeway was in a position to obtain credit upon the shares in question from any prudent customer. I cannot, therefore, hold that the shares in question were in his order and disposition in such circumstances that he was the reputed owner thereof.

E Owing to my want of familiarity with the terms of English law, I have had considerable difficulty in making up my mind upon the other question of importance raised in this appeal. But, on consideration, I have come to be of opinion with your Lordships that such shares as these are “things in action,” within the meaning of the proviso in s. 44 (iii) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

LORD FITZGERALD.—The two questions necessarily involved in this appeal are so important commercially and in relation to advances of money on the security of shares in public companies, that I feel called on to express my reasons
F for concurring in opinion with my noble and learned friends. These questions arise on s. 44 (iii) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which now represents the order and disposition clause in bankruptcy, and it may be expedient to glance for a moment at the early history of the provision in the bankruptcy law in this respect. A somewhat ancient writer tells us that,

G “although originally merchants were much favoured in our law, soon their number and cunning and their crafty dealings had so much increased, that it fell out we had more need to make laws against them than for them.”

Whether this is accurate or not in the present day, I do not know. We find in the earlier statutes bankrupt traders are dealt with very much as if H criminals. The Statute of Bankrupts, 1542, was enacted “against” such persons “as do make bankrupt.” The Bankrupts Act, 1571, in dealing with who is a bankrupt, and how and by whom his body, lands and goods shall be ordered for payment of the creditors, recites that “those kind of persons do still increase and are like more to do if some better law be not made for their repression.” We find in the preamble of the Bankrupts Act, 1603. “For that frauds daily increase
I among those who live by buying and selling by such as wickedly and wittully become bankrupts.” We next come to the Bankrupts Act, 1623 which is (inter alia) “for inflicting corporal punishment on bankrupts” in some defined cases. That statute contained, in s. 11, the first enactment on the subject of reputed ownership, and extended to “goods left in the possession, order, and disposition of the bankrupt with the consent of the true owner.” It seems to have been intended by this section to repress dealings of third parties with traders which were in their nature fraudulent, or were at least calculated to defraud creditors by obtaining for the trader credit on false and delusive appearances.

Section 11 does not appear to have been put into actual operation for a long period after its enactment. It had almost become obsolete, and was first really expounded by LORD HARDWICKE more than a century afterwards. It was on s. 11 of that statute that he decided Ryall v. Rolle (5), and Joy v. Campbell (11) arose before LORD REDESDALE in 1804 on similar words in the Irish Bankruptcy Act, 1872. In the latter case LORD REDESDALE, L.C., observed (1 Sch. & Lef. at p. 336):

“Now that clause refers to chattels in possession of the bankrupt ‘in his order or disposition with consent of the true owner,’ that means, where the possession, order, and disposition is in a person who is not the owner, to whom they do not properly belong, and who ought not to have them, but whom the owner permits unconscientiously, as the Act supposes, to have such order and disposition. The object was to prevent deceit by a trader from the visible possession of a property to which he was not entitled; but in the construction of the Act the nature of the possession has always been considered, and the words have been construed to mean possession of the goods of another with the consent of the true owner. . . . In all those cases in which that clause in the Act has been permitted to have the effect of divesting the right of the person who had a right to the property, the nature of the possession has always been considered, and whether it was according to right. . . . It has been confined to those cases where the sole and absolute owner of the property has permitted it to remain in possession of the trader in whose possession it ought not to be.”

It was of Joy v. Campbell (11), that PARKE, B., more than once observed that it contained “the best exposition of the law”: see Simmons v. Edwards (12).

The order and disposition section of the statute of James I. [of 1621] remained in substance unaltered down to 1869. In 1861 an Act passed which for the first time applied to non-traders the provisions of the bankruptcy statutes, but it made no alteration in the law as to the doctrine of reputed ownership, which, in consequence, became applicable to goods in the order and disposition of non-traders. Whether this was designed or whether it arose from oversight in not appreciating its full effect, I do not know. My impression is that there was no provision in any of the prior Insolvent Debtor Acts similar to the order and disposition clause. The decisions on reputed ownership had not been uniform, and some of them worked great injustice. A very distinguished Irish judge, CHRISTIAN, L.J., of whom I may also say that he was a master both in law and in equity, in Ex parte Hickey (13), dealing with a case arising under the order and disposition clause, thus very vigorously expresses himself (I.R. 10 Eq. at p. 129):

“No interest whatever in the policy passed to the assignees by the vesting operation of the Bankruptcy Act. The assignees stepped into the shoes of the bankrupt. Nothing passes to them but what was beneficially the bankrupt’s own at the time of bankruptcy. Nevertheless the assignees assert that the order and disposition clause (s. 313 of the [Irish Bankrupt and Insolvent Act, 1857]) enables the Court of Bankruptcy to confiscate by a special order this, the admitted property of those two men for payment of the debts of their assignor. Without going all the way with counsel for the appellant in calling that clause a penal one, we may admit that it is an exceedingly harsh if not an unscrupulous one. It is probably the only instance in our law in which, not only purposely, but avowedly, the property of one man is laid hold of to answer the debts of another. It dates back to the time of James I., if not earlier, and is an example of what most of us have occasion to note, that both the Parliaments and the judges of those older times were bolder in initiative than their modern successors. Surveying the conditions with which the exercise of this exceptional and questionable power has been hedged round by this statute, it is impossible to avoid seeing that of all its requirements the most distinctive and central is ‘the consent and permission of

A the true owner.' All the others may combine. The goods may be in the possession of the bankrupt; they may be in his order and disposition; he may be the reputed owner of them; but unless all this has been sanctioned by the consent and permission of the true owner, the clause rests as a dead letter. And it is this alone which redeems this law from the charge of naked confiscation. As the mens rea is essential for incurring the punishment of guilt, so the mens volens is essential for incurring the forfeiture imposed by this order and disposition clause."

C The alterations in relation to "order and disposition" in s. 15 (5) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and carried further by s. 44 (iii) of the Act of 1883, were probably for the purpose of excluding its operation altogether in the case of non-traders, and of narrowing its effect as to traders. Thus by the Act of 1869 it is limited to cases of a bankrupt "being a trader," and in the Act of 1883 its operation is further confined to goods in the "possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt in his trade or business." These expressions are capable of a different meaning and are by no means identical. Their construction has yet to be determined: see Re Jenkinson (14).

D As to the first question of fact which it is necessary to decide on this appeal, viz., were the shares in question "in the possession, order, or disposition" of the bankrupts, or of either of them, at the commencement of the bankruptcy, we have to consider the position of the parties. The shares were registered in Blakeway's name, and in that respect he was the sole legal owner, but as such he was a trustee for his firm. Acting on behalf of the firm he pledged the whole beneficial interest to the Colonial Bank, and he delivered to the bank the several certificates of the shares to be retained by them as pledgees. His name continued on the register as registered owner, but as such he was but a trustee, a trustee for the equitable pledgees, and if there was a surplus as to that surplus for the firm. The firm had not "the reputed ownership," and in the view that your Lordships have expressed it will not be necessary to consider whether F Blakeway's name being on the register placed him in "such circumstances as that he was the reputed owner." The shares were not in the order or disposition of the firm. Were they "in the possession, order, or disposition" of Blakeway? The contention that they were rests entirely on his name being still on the register, but something more is requisite. He should also have had the power of disposal. I adhere to what I said in Société Générale v. Walker (8) as to the nature of these certificates, and the effect of parting with them, and am of opinion that, having pledged the shares to the Colonial Bank for value and delivered to them the certificates to be held by them as their security, Blakeway ceased under the circumstances to have the power of disposal over the shares unless possibly by the commission of not only a fraud, but a crime. I am of opinion that at the commencement of the bankruptcy these securities were not in the H possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt Blakeway within the meaning of the statute.

I There remains the second question. Are shares of the character in question "things in action" within the meaning of the proviso which concludes s. 44 of the Act of 1883? On this question I concur in opinion with my noble and learned friends. It seems to me on a careful examination of the section and proviso that the intention of the legislature was to narrow very much the operation of the "order and disposition" clause so as to confine it to such goods as might be in the order and disposition of the bankrupt "in his trade or business," and save in the case of "debts due to the bankrupt in the course of his trade or business" to exclude all those incorporeal rights which are not visible or tangible or capable of manual delivery or of actual enjoyment in possession in its ordinary sense, and which, if denied, can be enforced only by action or suit.

LORD HALSBURY.—After the opinions which have been delivered, it is unnecessary to detain your Lordships by reading that which I had myself prepared. I concur in the motion of my noble and learned friends. A

LORD ASHBOURNE.—I entirely concur in the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived. The ordinary rule in bankruptcy is that the assignee takes the property of the bankrupt, but subject to all equities which affected it in his hands. The question in this case arises on s. 44 (iii) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which includes in the property of the bankrupt, B

“all goods [i.e. by s. 168 (1) all chattels personal] being, at the commencement of the bankruptcy, in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt, in his trade or business, by the consent and permission of the true owner, under such circumstances that he is the reputed owner thereof; provided that things in action other than debts due or growing due to the bankrupt in the course of his trade or business, shall not be deemed goods within the meaning of this section.” C

The general policy of the order and disposition clauses of successive Bankruptcy Acts rests upon clear and intelligible principles. In the well-known case of Ryall v. Rolle (5), it is laid down D

“that the general view and intent of the provision now under consideration was to prevent traders from gaining a delusive credit by a false appearance of substance to mislead those who would deal with them.”

The note appended to the certificates has been rightly pressed in argument. It was, at all events, an authoritative assurance by the company of their practice and course of dealing. Anyone dealing with the bankrupts had no right to assume that they were the owners of the entire interest in the shares, unless the certificates were either forthcoming or their absence satisfactorily accounted for. Almost any inquiry would have shown the true facts of the case and prevented the bankrupts gaining on this score “any delusive credit,” and I see no valid ground for holding that the bankrupts were the reputed owners of the interest of “the true owners,” the Colonial Bank, in the shares. I cannot act on the supposition that the bankrupts could or would, by fraud or crime, have endeavoured to account for the absence of the certificates. The property of a “true owner” must not be lightly confiscated. I entirely concur in the judgment of FRY, L.J., as to the construction of the proviso and the meaning of the expression “things in action.” In the course of his judgment, he used the following words (30 Ch.D. at p. 289): E

“In the case of a partnership, the real and personal property of the partnership is, or may be, vested in all the partners, and each, therefore, may have a legal interest in choses in possession. In the case of a corporation, the whole property of the concern is vested in the corporation, and the individual corporators have no direct interest in the chattels in possession, which may belong to the concern. In a partnership of seven persons, each would have a chose in action. If that partnership incorporated itself under the Companies Act, 1862, would each of the seven have ‘a chose in possession’?” F

In the course of the argument in this House, I addressed that question to the learned counsel for the respondent, and failed to obtain any satisfactory reply. The special condition of the shares in question strengthens the view at which I have arrived. These shares were, at the date of the bankruptcy, divorced from their certificates, and must, in any event, to my mind, be regarded as clearly things in action. H

Re MOON. Ex Parte DAWES

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Esher, M.R., Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.), April 2, 1886]

[Reported 17 Q.B.D. 275; 55 L.T. 114; 34 W.R. 753;
2 T.L.R. 506; 3 Morr. 105]

Deed—Construction—Consideration of recitals—Operative part of deed ambiguous—Control by recitals—General rules.

In construing a deed the following rules are to be observed: (i) If the recitals are clear and the operative part of the deed is ambiguous, the recitals govern the construction; (ii) if the recitals are ambiguous and the operative part is clear, the operative part must prevail; (iii) if both the recitals and the operative part are clear, but are inconsistent with each other, the operative part is to be preferred.

Consideration of the provisions of a deed, it being held that the operative part, being ambiguous, was controlled by the recitals.

Settlement—Forfeiture—Determination of husband's life interest—Assignment of income—Bankruptcy—Petition filed by husband—Composition deed.

By a post-nuptial settlement, under which the husband was entitled to a life interest in the income of a sum of £50,000, it was provided that if he "shall assign, charge, or otherwise dispose of the said income, or any part thereof, or shall become bankrupt, or do or suffer anything whereby the said income, if payable to him absolutely, or any part thereof, would become vested in any other person then and in such case" the trust declared in his favour should cease, and there was a gift over. The husband, having got into financial difficulties, filed a petition in bankruptcy and executed a composition deed reciting that he was possessed of or entitled to the property specified in the deed, and that, in accordance with his desire to pay his creditors twenty shillings in the pound, he had agreed to assign to a trustee all the property set forth in the schedule upon certain trusts. His life interest under the post-nuptial settlement was not included in the schedule. On an application by the trustee of the deed for an order that the income to which the husband was entitled should be paid to him (the trustee),

Held: to bring the forfeiture clause in the settlement into operation there had to be an actual assignment by the husband of his interest either by some instrument or by operation of law, as by adjudication as a bankrupt, which would deprive him of that interest; in the circumstances no such assignment had taken place; and, therefore, the forfeiture clause did not apply and the husband was entitled to retain the income.

Special Case stated by the judge of the Salisbury County Court for the opinion of the High Court pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 97 (3).

On Jan. 20, 1885, William Moon filed a bankruptcy petition in the Salisbury County Court. On the same day a receiving order was made, and Frederick Aston Dawes became official receiver of the estate. The first meeting of creditors was held on Feb. 23, 1885, and a resolution was then come to that a proposal by Moon to assign his property to a trustee to secure the payment of a composition of 20s. in the pound, as embodied in the draft deed of arrangement and assignment produced at the meeting, should be accepted in satisfaction and discharge of the debts provable under the proceedings; and that F. A. Dawes should be appointed trustee for the carrying out of the terms of the deed. The public examination was held and concluded on Mar. 13, 1885. The second meeting was held on Mar. 16, 1885, at which meeting the resolution passed on Feb. 23, 1885, was confirmed. On Mar. 26, 1885, the deed of composition was executed by Moon and by Dawes, and on the same day the resolution and the deed were approved by the court.

The deed contained recitals of the filing of the petition, and of the resolution of the creditors, and also contained the following recitals:

“And whereas the said William Moon is possessed of or entitled to all the real and personal estate specified in the schedule hereto, subject to the mortgages and charges specified in the said schedule; and whereas in accordance with the desire of the said William Moon to pay his creditors 20s. in the pound on their debts, and in order that the said composition shall be secured, the said William Moon has agreed with the said Frederick Aston Dawes to assign to him all the said property set forth in the said schedule hereto, subject to the mortgages and charges affecting the same, upon the trusts and subject to the provisos, declarations, and agreements hereinafter contained.”

The operative part of the deed was as follows:

“Now this indenture witnesseth that, for effectuating the said desire, and in pursuance of the said agreement, and in consideration of the premises, he, the said William Moon, doth hereby, subject to the mortgages and charges affecting the same, grant, bargain, assign, transfer, and set over unto the said Frederick Aston Dawes . . . all and singular the several properties and chattels and effects set forth in the said schedule hereto, and all the estate,

A right, title, interest, claim, and demand of him the said William Moon, in, to, and upon the said properties, chattels, and effects, and all other the estate (if any) of the said William Moon, upon the trusts and for the intents and purposes, and with and subject to the powers, provisoes, agreements, and declarations hereinafter declared, expressed, and contained concerning the same."

B A question subsequently arose whether a life interest in the income of a sum of £50,000, to which Moon was entitled under the trusts of a post-nuptial settlement, dated July 14, 1882, and made between Moon, of the first part, Kathleen Amelia Bellair Moon, his wife, of the second part, and William Henry Wilson, Charles Martin Wade, and Edmund Phipps of the third part, which was not mentioned in the deed, was included in the deed of composition. The settlement provided among other things, that the trustees thereof should invest the sum of £50,000 therein mentioned, and expressed to be thereby settled in manner therein specified, and out of the interest, dividends, or income of such sum of £50,000, and the investments thereof, should pay to Kathleen A. B. Moon the annual sum of £500 during the joint lives of herself and W. Moon, so that the same annual sum should be for her sole and separate use, without power of anticipation, payable by equal half-yearly payments; and subject to, and after the payment of such annual sum of £500, should from time to time pay the interest, dividends, and income of the sum of £50,000, and of the investments for the time being representing the same, to, or permit the same to be received by, W. Moon. The settlement contained a proviso in the following terms:

E "...if the said William Moon shall assign, charge, or otherwise dispose of the said income, or any part thereof, or shall become bankrupt, or do or suffer anything whereby the said income, if payable to him absolutely, or any part thereof, would become vested in any other person, then and in such case the trust hereinafter declared in favour of the said William Moon shall, so far as the law will permit the same, cease, and during the remainder of the life of the said William Moon, the said trustees or trustee may at their or his own discretion, apply the whole or any part of the said income, subject to the said annuity, for the support and benefit of the said Kathleen Amelia Bellair Moon, and the issue of the marriage (if any) or any one or more of them, in such manner as the said trustees or trustee shall think fit, and shall pay and apply the surplus (if any) of the said income or the whole thereof, if none shall be applied in manner aforesaid, to the persons or person to whom and in which the said income would be payable or applicable under these presents if the said William Moon were dead, and if there shall be no such person, then unto the said William Moon himself."

I It was also declared by the settlement that, from and after the death of W. Moon, the trustees should, subject always to the payment of the annual sum of £500, stand and be possessed of the sum of £50,000, and the income thereof respectively, in trust for the children of the marriage as therein provided.

I On July 24, 1885, an application, on behalf of Dawes, was made to the judge of the Salisbury County Court, asking for an order to strike out or vary the proviso in the post-nuptial settlement of Moon (whereby upon his bankruptcy the whole of the income of the £50,000 therein mentioned became payable to his wife), and to order the payment of such income, after the payment of the sum of £500 per annum specifically settled upon his wife, to Dawes for the benefit of the estate of Moon. On the application coming on for hearing, the learned judge decided, with the consent of all parties, to refer the matter by Special Case to the High Court. The questions stated by the Case for the opinion of the High Court were (inter alia) as follows: First, whether, under the circumstances, Dawes was an encumbrancer or assignee of the life interest of Moon under the settlement; secondly, whether the proviso for forfeiture contained in the settlement was void against Dawes; and, thirdly, if void, whether it was absolutely void, or void to a limited, and to what, extent.

On Feb. 22, 1886, the Special Case came on for argument before CAVE, J., who held that the trustee under the deed, Dawes, was not an encumbrancer on and did not take the life interest of the debtor under the settlement. HIS LORDSHIP continued: The next question I am asked to decide is one which arises as between Mr. Moon and the trustees of the settlement, as representing the wife and children. It is whether the forfeiture clause contained in the settlement applies to what has taken place in this case—that is to say, whether there has been a forfeiture of Mr. Moon's interest. The proviso is that “if the said William Moon shall assign, charge, or otherwise dispose of the said income, or any part thereof, or shall become bankrupt, or do or suffer anything whereby the said income, if payable to him absolutely, or any part thereof, would become vested in any other person,”

the trustees of the settlement are to take the income. He has not disposed of the income or any part of it, and he has not become bankrupt. It is contended that he has done or suffered some thing whereby the income—I hardly know what word to use now—“would” become vested in another person. The word is not “might.” Certainly “would” is the term used in the deed, which it seems to me is an incorrect expression. It is difficult to understand what the meaning of that phrase is—“if he shall do or suffer anything whereby the income would become vested.” It seems to me to be very indifferent English, and I can only understand it to mean, if he does anything whereby the income “will” become vested in some other person. Has he done anything whereby the income “has” become vested in any other person? Certainly not. It is said that he has done or suffered something whereby the income “might” become vested in some other person, because he has filed a petition in bankruptcy. That, to my mind, is giving a meaning the words will not bear. It is not, whereby the income “may” become vested, but “will” become vested. I cannot put any other construction on “would” than “will.” It seems to me to be an improper mood to have used.

Is there anything in the deed which ought to lead me to put a different interpretation upon the word? If I look at the other alternatives in which there is to be a forfeiture, I see in all of them that there must be an actual assignment either by some instrument or by operation of law. If Moon “shall assign, charge, or dispose of”—which means an assignment either absolute or conditional—“or if he becomes bankrupt,” which means an assignment in law. In all the other cases there is to be an actual assignment—that is to say, the thing which he is to do is something which actually does take the property out of him. Then I think I must read the words which follow as meaning something of the same kind. I think the words “do or suffer anything whereby the income would become vested in any other person” must mean do or suffer something the effect of which is that the income does become thereby vested in somebody else. When a man files a petition in bankruptcy, his income and property do not thereby become vested in somebody else. They may become vested in somebody else if the petition is followed by an adjudication, but it is possible that no adjudication will take place, and it is equally possible that the property may not become vested in anybody else. If the words were “may become vested” there might be something to be said for the contention; but it seems to me, looking at the words as they are, nothing will satisfy them except some deed or some permission or sufferance, the effect of which is actually to vest the property in some other person.

Is there any case which prevents me putting that interpretation on the words? I was referred to a case which seems to me distinguishable. That was Re Amherst's Trusts (1), where the words used were “part with the property,” a very general and loose expression. It was held by BACON, V.-C., that those words were sufficiently complied with, because there was the presentation by the tenant

A for life of a petition, upon which it was open to the court to appoint a receiver of all or any part of the debtor's property. The learned Vice-Chancellor said that that was a parting with his property, because the debtor had done something which enabled the court to take possession of all that belonged to him—that a person parts from his property if he puts it in such a position that the court can immediately order someone to take possession of it, and he, therefore, held that there had been a forfeiture in that case. It is obvious that that is a very different thing from assigning your property or vesting your property in someone else. Nor do I understand that, if the words had been what they are here, the same result would have ensued in that case. In truth, every case must be construed according to the particular words to be found in the deed; and where those words are of a loose and general character one may understand almost anything may be intended to be embraced by them. But where the words used are definite, as it seems to me they are here, then I am not at liberty to put any other interpretation than that which is the natural meaning and interpretation of the words. I cannot understand that the clause means anything more than a sweeping up, so to speak, of what has gone before. It means that the income shall not become vested in some other person. It may become vested in some other person voluntarily by alienation; it may become vested in some other person involuntarily by the act of the law, as in the case of bankruptcy; and, in order to sweep up every other possible case in which it can be vested in any other person, the words are used, "if he do or suffer anything whereby the income would become vested in any other person." It appears to me, putting the best interpretation on it that I can, that there is not any forfeiture, and Mr. Moon is entitled to retain his income. I must answer the second question by saying that the proviso has nothing to do with Mr. Dawes, and that that question falls to the ground. So, also, does the third question fall. From this decision F. A. Dawes appealed.

Rigby, Q.C., Cooper Willis, Q.C., and F. Cooper Willis for Dawes.

Montague Cookson, Q.C., Vaughan Williams, and Seward Brice for the debtor, and his wife, and infant child.

Sidney Woolf and Butcher for the trustees of the settlement.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—This is a deed of assignment or conveyance of property by way of security. The question is how it is to be construed? It is a deed which contains recitals, and also a conveyancing or assigning clause. The deed must be construed by what appears on the face of it and by nothing else. In order to construe the deed, you may, of course, look at what was the state of circumstances which existed at the time it was made; but that, in the present case, will not help us in the construction. The deed is to be construed as it stands as a deed and nothing else.

There are three rules applicable to the construction of such an instrument: (i) If the recitals are clear, and the operative part is ambiguous, the recitals govern the construction; (ii) if the recitals are ambiguous, and the operative part is clear, the operative part must prevail; (iii) if both the recitals and the operative part are clear, but inconsistent with each other, then the operative part is to be preferred. The question here is which of those three rules this deed comes under. If it falls under either of the two last, this appeal ought to succeed. If it comes under the first, the appeal ought to fail.

That the recitals here are clear cannot be doubted, nor is it alleged that they are not as clear as they can be. They begin with reciting the property which it is said that William Moon is possessed of or entitled to. There is a declaration that he is possessed of or entitled to "all the real and personal estate specified in the schedule." The next recital is that William Moon has agreed to assign to the trustee "all the said property set forth in the said schedule hereto." Nothing can be more clear than those recitals. They show what William Moon agreed to assign. Then I come to the operative part. Is that clear? These are the words:

"Now this indenture witnesseth that for effectuating [the desire of the debtor to pay his creditors 20s. in the pound, and to secure it] and in pursuance of the said agreement [in the recital] and in consideration of the premises, he, the said William Moon, doth hereby . . . grant, bargain, assign, transfer, and set over unto the said Frederick Aston Dawes . . . all and singular the several properties and chattels and effects set forth in the said schedule hereto."

So far the operative part is clear enough. It agrees with the clear recitals, and does not go beyond them. It continues thus:

"And all the estate, right, title, interest, claim, and demand of him the said William Moon in, to, and upon the said properties, chattels, and effects."

That part is also clear; but it is manifest that the word "estate" there does not mean property. The word "estate" there means an interest. The operative part goes on, "and all other the estate (if any) of the said William Moon." It is clear that "estate" in that part ought to be read as "property." The word "estate" is not the prima facie word which the assignor would use to describe his property, especially where it has been just used in contradistinction to property. In this place, where he has been describing his property and the estate in his property, he then goes on to say, "all other the estate." I confess it seems to me that "estate" in the second part of that copulated clause has the same meaning as "estate" in the first part. It is very ambiguous and uncertain whether we ought to change the meaning of the word which is coupled with the former word "estate," and say that, in one part of the copulated sentences it means one thing and in the other part it means another. Moreover, if it is here to be read "property," so far from the assignment being "in pursuance of the said agreement," it would not be in pursuance of the said agreement. It must be in pursuance of some other agreement. Therefore, so far from the operative part of the deed being clear, it seems to me as ambiguous as it can be.

The recitals are perfectly clear and unambiguous. The operative part is not clear, and, consequently, is ambiguous. Therefore, the rule that, if the recitals are clear and the operative part is not clear, the recitals are to prevail, applies to this case, and the recitals are to prevail. The right claimed by Dawes to be the assignee of the life interest of the debtor under the marriage settlement is not within the rule. In my opinion the decision of the learned judge was perfectly right.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We are in this difficulty, that the words in question will, according to the construction we put upon them, mean nothing, and become mere surplusage. I think this is one of those cases in which we are forced to face that difficulty. We have not to consider any question of rectification. If we were considering that, of course we should have to let in and consider a body of evidence which, on the question of construction, is not admissible at all. I do not pretend to speculate whether the parties really did intend to include this life interest, except so far as we can gather their intention from the recitals and the operative part of the deed, or from any other clause to be found in it. If we look at the parcels, anybody accustomed to legal documents must be very much struck with them. I never saw, and I do not suppose anybody ever did see, such an enumeration as we have here. In the parcels the description is "all and singular the several properties and chattels and effects, set forth in the schedule hereto." Those words, "in the schedule," show pretty plainly what is meant. There is no ambiguity about it. Then we have what is known as the "all the estate" clause, which is intelligible enough to persons who are accustomed to legal instruments, and then something which strikes me as being very odd and incomprehensible. Apart from the recitals, we should not know what was meant. We have after the "all the estate" clause these words: "and all other the estate (if any) of the said William Moon." It does not say what. I am assuming now that there are no recitals to throw light upon it. I

A do not know that, apart from the recitals, anybody would know what the meaning of that was. It is argued that it must mean all the assignor's property. No doubt "the estate" may mean lands, tenements, and hereditaments, or it may mean property, chattels, and effects, and if there was anything to show that it had that meaning here, it might cover these things; but there is nothing to show it. I doubt very much whether there is anything to show that it means all the
B assignor's property. If there was nothing to explain these words, I doubt whether I should know what they meant. I cannot help thinking the whole thing would be extremely ambiguous. But the ambiguity is removed when you look at the recitals. They show what is meant by the operative part of the deed, what was intended to be conveyed, and what was in the contemplation of the parties. That being so, there is no ambiguity about it. The parcels are in such a state that
C nobody can make head or tail of them, and, apart from the recitals, they are perfectly ambiguous. It appears to me, therefore, looking at it as a matter simply of construction, and saying nothing as to what might happen if there was a question of rectification before us, I think, on the true construction of this document, that the words "all other the estate (if any)" are surplusage.

D LOPES, L.J.—There are several rules applicable to the construction of deeds. One of them is that, if the operative part of the deed is clear and the recitals are not clear, the operative part is to prevail. Again, if the recitals are clear, and the operative part is not clear, but ambiguous, the recitals are to control the operative part. If, on the other hand, the operative part is clear, and the recitals are clear, but the one is inconsistent with the other, the operative part is to prevail. Those are well-established rules. We are not asked here to rectify the deed
E in question; but we are asked to put a proper construction upon it. The question which arises under the deed is whether Dawes, the trustee, is the assignee of the life interest of the debtor under a marriage settlement. It appears to me to be perfectly clear, without following the reasons which have been given, that the operative part of this deed, especially that portion of the operative part which has been alluded to, is not clear, but is ambiguous. If that is so, then, according F to the rule of construction to which I have alluded, it becomes necessary to look at the recitals. The recitals are as clear as they can well be. There can only be one possible meaning, namely, that what is intended to be assigned by the deed is the property mentioned in the schedule. That being the case, I am of opinion that the operative part, which is ambiguous, is controlled by the recitals, and that
G this life interest did not pass under that deed. I think, therefore, that the judgment of the court below was right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

[The decision of this point disposed of the appeal, the other points raised before CAVE, J., not being argued.]

Appeal dismissed.

TAILBY v. OFFICIAL RECEIVER

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Herschell, Lord Watson, Lord FitzGerald and Lord Macnaghten), April 17, 19, 20, July 30, 1888]

[Reported 13 App. Cas. 523; 58 L.J.Q.B. 75; 60 L.T. 162;
37 W.R. 513; 4 T.L.R. 726]

Chose in Action—Assignment—Debt—Future book-debts—No limitation as to time, place, or amount, or to debts owing in respect of specified business.

An assignment by a trader of future book-debts, not limited as to time, place, or amount, or to debts owing in respect of a specified business, is not too vague to be effectual.

In or about 1879 one Izon got into pecuniary difficulties and made an arrangement with his creditors by which he was to pay certain instalments, the last of which was guaranteed by one Tyrrell. To secure Tyrrell, Izon, on May 13, 1879, gave him a bill of sale by which he assigned to Tyrrell all his stock-in-trade, fixtures, furniture, tools, etc., on his premises and also "all the book-debts due and owing, or which may during the continuance of the security become due and owing to the said mortgagor (i.e., Izon)." In October and November, 1884, Izon supplied a firm of Wilson Bros. & Co., upon credit, with goods to the value of £10 7s. 11d. The appellant, who had acquired Tyrrell's interest in the debt, gave notice of the assignment to that firm, and required them to make payment of it to himself, which they accordingly did. Some time after the date of the notice Izon was adjudged bankrupt, and the respondent, the trustee of his estate, sued the appellant for repayment of the amount received by him. It was assumed that the assignment comprehended every future book-debt becoming due to Izon in any profession or trade which might be followed by him in any place or at any time during the continuance of the security constituted by the mortgage.

Held: the debts referred to in the assignment were capable of being ascertained and identified when they became due, and, therefore, the assignment was valid as against the trustee in bankruptcy.

July 30, 1888. The following opinions were read.

LORD HERSCHELL. The short point to be determined in this case is whether an assignment by way of security of certain book-debts not existing at the time of the assignment was valid, so as to give the assignee a good title to them when they came into existence.

By an indenture of May 13, 1879, Henry George Izon assigned to John Tyrrell

“all the book-debts due and owing, or which may, during the continuance of the security become due and owing to the said mortgagor.”

The debts now in question were incurred subsequently to the date of this indenture. It was not disputed by the respondent that they were book-debts which during the continuance of the security became due and owing to the mortgagor. On Nov. 14, 1884, the mortgagee's executors (under whom the appellant claims) gave notice to the debtors to pay the debts to them. The appellant having received the money, the respondent, who was the official receiver under the bankruptcy of Izon, sued in the Birmingham County Court to recover the money so received as part of Izon's estate. The county court judge gave judgment for the respondent, and the Court of Appeal have held that he was right in so doing. They based their judgment on the ground that, as the assignment included all book-debts which might thereafter become due to the assignor in any trade which he might thereafter carry on in any place, it was so vague that the court ought to hold that nothing passed under it. The Master of the Rolls said (18 Q.B.D. at p. 29):

“That there is a doctrine that the description may be too vague is, to my mind, beyond question. Every one of the cases that has been decided has assumed that there is such a doctrine, and in each case the court has tried to find whether the description in the particular case was or was not too vague; but each and every of them recognises the doctrine.”

If by “vague” he meant indefinite or uncertain, which is probably the ordinary meaning of the word, I do not think it is correct to say that the assignment in question is in that sense vague.

It appears to me to be perfectly definite. It was just as capable of proof that a book-debt became due to H. G. Izon in some business carried on by him as that such a debt became due in the particular business mentioned in the deed; and I do not understand the learned judges in the court below to doubt that if the assignment had been limited to book-debts becoming due in that business it would

A have been good and effectual even as regards future debts. Nay, it is quite conceivable that it might be more difficult to identify a debt as owing in respect of a specified business than as one due in a trader's business generally. Suppose a business to expand or to have new branches added to it, there might often be a difficulty in saying whether a debt was acquired in the specified business or not. There is no doubt that an assignment may be so indefinite and uncertain in its terms that the courts will not give effect to it because of the impossibility of ascertaining to what it is applicable. But that is certainly not the case with such an assignment as that which we are now considering. If by "vague" be meant wide and covering a large area, that may certainly be said of the grant which has given rise to this controversy; and the Master of the Rolls is, I think, correct in saying that the courts have in two cases, viz., Belding v. Read (2) and Re Count D'Epineuil (No. 2) (3), acted upon the doctrine that an assignment of future-acquired property will be held invalid if in that sense it is too vague.

B The learned county court judge was bound by those decisions, but it is open to your Lordships to review them, and to consider whether they rest upon any sound basis; and I conceive that you have no alternative but to consider the question apart from authority, and to review the authorities, for, to my mind, it is impossible to reconcile the decision under appeal with that of the Court of Appeal in Coombe v. Carter (1) without resorting to distinctions which cannot be justified on principle. In that case the mortgage security covered

E "all moneys of or to which the mortgagor is, or may during the security become, entitled under any settlement, will or other document, either in his own right or as the devisee, legatee, or next-of-kin of his father or any other person or persons."

The mortgagor became entitled under a will to a share of the residuary estate. The Court of Appeal held that this share was covered by the mortgage. The decision in the case now before your Lordships was much pressed upon them in argument. The court, however, consisting of COTTON, BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ., refused to regard it as governing the case they had to decide. I can hardly say that they distinguished it except by saying that the terms of the two instruments and the subject-matter to which they related were not identical, and that, as the former case laid down no principle, it was inapplicable to that before them.

G I confess I am unable to see any sound distinction between an instrument assigning future book-debts which may become due to the assignor in any business carried on by him, and one assigning future bequests and devises to which he may under any will become entitled. The subjects of both assignments are equally wide, equally incapable of ascertainment at the time of the assignment, but equally capable of identification when the subject has come into existence and it is sought to enforce the security. I think that Coombe v. Carter (1) was correctly decided, and that the views expressed by the learned judges are equally applicable here.

H That case established no new principle; it proceeded on well-settled lines. In Bennett v. Cooper (5), where the security included all legacies which had already or might thereafter be given or bequeathed to the assignor or his wife, by any person whomsoever, LORD LANGDALE held that legacies subsequently bequeathed to the mortgagor were bound. And few covenants are more common or have been more often given effect to than the covenant contained in marriage settlements to settle the wife's future-acquired property. It has never been doubted that these attach as soon as such property comes into existence. The only authorities that can be cited as contrary to the view I am submitting to your Lordships are those already referred to of Belding v. Read (2) and Re Count D'Epineuil (No. 2) (3). In the latter case FRY, J., avowedly followed Belding v. Read (2). Another point was, however, there adverted to. The charge under consideration in that case included all the present and future personalty of the person giving it. The learned judge suggested that such a charge might be invalid as depriving the mortgagor of the power of maintaining himself. In Coombe v. Carter (1) the Court of Appeal left open the question whether such a disposition (which would, of course, be without effect at law so far as regarded future-acquired property) would be enforced in equity. I think your Lordships may also be content to put aside this point, which certainly does not arise in the case before you.

I cannot think that the decision in Belding v. Read (2) was correct so far as it turned on the same point as has now to be decided. The assignment to the extent to which it related to after-acquired chattels was undoubtedly void at law, and the question was, whether it was effectual in equity to pass the property in question. It appears to me that the view taken by the learned judges proceeded on a misapprehension of some observations of LORD WESTBURY in Holroyd v. Marshall (4). That learned Lord used the following language (10 H.L.Cas. at p. 211):

"If a vendor or mortgagor agrees to sell or mortgage property, real or personal, of which he is not possessed at the time, and he receives the consideration for the contract, and afterwards becomes possessed of property answering the description in the contract, there is no doubt that a court of equity would compel him to perform the contract, and that the contract would in equity transfer the beneficial interest to the mortgagee or purchaser immediately on the property being acquired. This, of course, assumes that the supposed contract is one of a class of which a court of equity would decree the specific performance. If it be so, then immediately on the acquisition of the property described, the vendor or mortgagor would hold it in trust for the purchaser or mortgagee according to the terms of the contract."

Whatever the learned Lord meant by limiting the doctrine to the class of cases in which a court of equity would decree specific performance, he certainly did not intend to exclude cases in which after-acquired property fell within general descriptive words contained in the deed, for he enforced the security in that very case against such property. Nor again, can I find any trace of the view that a court of equity would not enforce a contract relating to future-acquired property if it was vague in the sense of embracing much within its terms, for, as I have pointed out, courts of equity have frequently enforced such contracts. I think the language used referred only to that class of cases to which he had alluded in an earlier part of his opinion, where it could not be predicated of any specific goods that they fell within the general descriptive words of the grant. In my opinion, the judgment appealed from should be reversed and the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division restored, and the respondent should pay the costs in the court below and the costs of this appeal, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD WATSON stated the facts and continued: It does not clearly appear whether the debt in question was incurred to the mortgagor in the business in which he was engaged in May, 1879, or in some other trade. In the argument addressed to your Lordships it was rightly assumed that the assignment comprehends every future book-debt becoming due to Izon in any profession or trade which may be followed by him in any place and at any time during the continuance of the security constituted by the mortgage. The respondent admitted that the liability of Wilson Bros. & Co., whenever it emerged, was, and until satisfied by payment continued to be, a proper book-debt, due and owing to the mortgagor. He maintained his right to it, in competition with the appellant, upon the single ground that the assignment of future book-debts, in the mortgage of 1879, is ineffectual to carry any equitable interest to the assignee. The judge of the county court of Warwickshire, before whom the suit was brought, gave judgment for the respondent. He held, in deference to the authority of Belding v. Read (2) and Re Count D'Epineuil (No. 2) (3), that an assignment of future book-debts generally without any delimitation of time, place, or amount, is too vague to be supported. His decision was reversed by HAWKINS and MATHEW, J.J., who were of opinion that the case fell within the principle to which this House gave effect in Holroyd v. Marshall (4), but it was restored by the Court of Appeal.

Had there not been such a conflict of judicial opinion I should have thought that the question thus raised for decision admitted of one answer only. The rule of equity which applies to the assignment of future choses in action is, as I understand it, a very simple one. Choses in action do not come within the scope of the Bills of Sale Acts [see Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 4], and, though not yet existing, may nevertheless be the subjects of present assignments. As soon as they come into existence, assignees who have given valuable consideration will, if the new chose in action is in the disposal of their assignor, take precisely the same right and interest as if it had actually belonged to him, or had been within his disposition and control at the time when the assignment was made. There is but one condition which must be fulfilled in order to make the assignee's right attach to a future chose in action, which is that, on its coming into existence, it shall answer the description in the assignment, or, in other words, that it shall be capable of being identified as the thing or as one of the very things assigned. When there is no uncertainty as to its identification, the beneficial interest will immediately vest in the assignee. Mere difficulty in ascertaining all the things which are included in a general assignment, whether in esse or in posse, will not affect the assignee's right to these things which are capable of ascertainment, or are identified. LORD ELDON said, in Lewis v. Madocks (6) (8 Ves. at p. 156):

"If the courts find a solid subject of personal property they would attach it rather than render the contract nugatory."

In the case of book-debts, as in the case of choses in action generally, intimation of the assignee's right must be made to the debtor or obligee, in order to make it complete. That is the only possession which he can attain, so long as the debt is unpaid, and is sufficient to take it out of the order and disposition of the assignor. In this case the appellant's right, if otherwise valid, was in any question with the respondent duly perfected by his notice to Wilson Bros. & Co. before Izon became a bankrupt.

The learned judges of the Court of Appeal were unanimously of opinion that the description of book-debts in the assignment of Tyrrell is "too vague," and it is upon that ground only that they have held the assignment to be invalid. The term which they have selected, in order to express what they conceived to be the radical defect of the assignment, is susceptible of at least two different meanings. It may either signify that the description is too wide and comprehensive, without implying that there will be any uncertainty as to the debts which it will include if and when these come into existence; or it may signify that the language of the description is so obscure that it will be impossible, in the time to come, to determine with any degree of certainty to what particular debts it was intended to apply. In the latter sense the description of future book-debts in the mortgage of 1879 does not incur the imputation of vagueness. No one has suggested that the expression "book-debt" is indefinite; and it is, in my opinion, very clear that every debt becoming due and owing to the mortgagor, which belongs to the class of book-debts (a fact quite capable of ascertainment), is at once identified with the subject-matter of the assignment. The ground of decision in the Court of Appeal was obviously that the description of future debts is "too vague" in the sense of being too wide and comprehensive, inasmuch as it embraces debts to become due to the mortgagee in any and every business which he may think fit to carry on. If it had been limited to debts arising in the course of the business of packing-case manufacturer, in which Izon was engaged at the date of the mortgage, the Master of the Rolls was, as then advised, prepared to hold that the description would not have been too vague. Upon that point the other members of the court express no definite opinion, LINDLEY, L.J., merely remarking (18 Q.B.D. at p. 31): "I do not say that an assignment of future book-debts must necessarily be too vague." All of their Lordships were evidently under the impression that they were deciding the case according to a well-established equitable doctrine, which LOPES, L.J., traced to Belding v. Read (2).

It is unnecessary for the purposes of this case to consider how far a general assignment of all after-acquired property can receive effect, because the assignment in question relates to one species of property only. I have been unable to discover any principle upon which the decision of the Court of Appeal can be supported, unless it is to be found in Belding v. Read (2). That case arose in a court of common law, and, with all deference to the very learned judges who decided it, I am bound to say that, in my opinion, they misapprehended the doctrine laid down by LORD WESTBURY in Holroyd v. Marshall (4), which was not new doctrine, but, as the noble Lord explicitly stated, was the mere enunciation of elementary principles long settled in courts of equity. It is possible that the learned judges were misled by the reference which the noble Lord makes to specific performance, an illustration not selected with his usual felicity. Not a single decision by an equity court was cited to us prior in date to Belding v. Read (2), which gives us the least support to the opinions expressed in that case, and I venture to doubt whether any such decision exists. It is true that judges on the equity side of the court have, in one or two instances, deferred to the views expressed in Belding v. Read (2), which they assumed to be an authoritative exposition of the law applied by this House in Holroyd v. Marshall (4); but these views conflict with the previous cases in equity, to which LORD WESTBURY referred as establishing a well-known and elementary principle.

In Bennett v. Cooper (5), LORD LANGDALE, M.R., gave effect to an equitable mortgage by a debtor of “all sums of money then or thereafter to become due to him, and all legacies or bequests which had already or might thereafter be given or bequeathed to him or his wife, by any person whomsoever.”

I cannot understand upon what principle an assignment of all legacies which may be bequeathed by any person to the assignor is to stand good, and effect is to be denied to a general assignment of all future book-debts. As COTTON, L.J., said in Coombe v. Carter (1) (36 Ch.D. at p. 353):

“Vagueness comes to nothing if the property is definite at the time when the court comes to enforce the contract.”

A future book-debt is quite as capable of being identified as a legacy; and in this case the identity of the debt with the subjects assigned is not matter of dispute. When the consideration has been given, and the debt has been clearly identified as one of those in respect of which it was given, a court of equity will enforce the covenant of the parties, and will not permit the assignor, or those in his right, to defeat the assignment upon the plea that it is too comprehensive. I am, accordingly, of opinion that the order appealed from ought to be reversed, and the judgment of the Divisional Court restored.

LORD FITZGERALD.—I feel great difficulty as to the reasons which I am about to give. [HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence, and continued:] The case was put forward as a test case, and supposed to raise for decision the one large question on which the noble and learned Lords have just stated their conclusion. There is, however, a view of the transactions which must be disposed of. Let us assume that the instrument of 1879 was an existing security, unsatisfied and in full force at the time of the assignment of the book-debts to Tailby, and that all the steps taken by the mortgagee had been regular and effectual. The deed of 1879 had not as to the future debts any greater operation than as an agreement for value, to assign those future debts when they come into existence. I do not now pause to consider whether equity would from time to time, as debts become due, decree specific performance of that agreement. It was at least a contract which as between the immediate parties to it had certain efficacy, and was not wholly inoperative. If, for instance, as to future-acquired chattels coming within its provisions, the mortgagee had managed peaceably to gain actual possession of them, he could retain that possession as against the mortgagor; and so if, claiming to be entitled under his deed to receive a future accruing debt, he had demanded and received payment of it from the debtor, the mortgagor could not recover the sum so received from him.

Let us see how this case stands in this respect. The deed of 1879 contains an assignment of future debts, and also that comprehensive appointment by the mortgagor of the mortgagee as his attorney, to execute for him and in his name assignments of these future rights, when and as they should arise, either to himself or to any other person, and also a power to receive those debts when and as they became payable, and give full and effectual discharges for them—a power in fact, to do for himself and in virtue of that authority all that a court of equity could do for him if there had been no difficulties in the way of obtaining relief from that tribunal. There is nothing in law to prohibit the mortgagor from conferring such an authority on the mortgagee, or to prevent parties from helping themselves if they can lawfully do so. The whole of the steps in November, 1884, were lawful and unobjectionable, and the parties were competent to take them. The deed of 1879 professed to pledge these future debts to the mortgagee, and conferred on him large and exceptional powers to enforce that pledge. His representatives availed themselves of their powers and position to enforce their rights, and did all that they could lawfully do as equivalent to taking possession and determining reputed ownership: see Re Hennessey (7). The mortgagor certainly did not oppose, and the proper inference is that he acquiesced. If Tailby had received the amount of Wilson's debt before the adjudication in January, 1885, his title to retain it against the receiver would not be open to any question. Does the adjudication before actual payment and the intervention of the receiver make any difference? The latter does not appear to have intervened until the following month of May, the payment was actually made by Wilson in January previous. The assignee, trustee, and receiver in bankruptcy derive their title to the estate through the bankrupt, and subject to the rights and equities which would affect it in the hands of the bankrupt, save where by statute for the protection of creditors overreaching rights are conferred upon them. There is no allegation that the adjudication here had any retrospective operation, nor is it alleged that the transactions with Tailby were tainted with any fraud, nor can I discover any satisfactory ground on which the receiver can override the proceedings of November which were binding on the bankrupt, and recover the money actually paid over in January.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the action of the receiver in the county court fails, that he is not entitled to recover the money received by Tailby from Wilson, and that the defendant Tailby is entitled to judgment. If I am correct in this view, no further question arises—the decision of the Court of Appeal and of the county court judge should be reversed, and the judgment of the Divisional Court should be restored. In the course of the argument at the Bar some of these considerations were thrown out for discussion, but it was said in reply that this was “a test case” to elicit your Lordships’ decision on an abstract question of great public importance. The Master of the Rolls is represented to have put the question thus:

“It seems to me that, according to the ordinary rules of construction, the deed of 1879 applies to the book-debts which may become due to Izon in any trade which he may hereafter carry on anywhere; that is, any trade which it may please him during the continuance of the security, or which it may be for his benefit, to carry on in any part of England, any part of Wales, any part of Scotland, or in any part of Ireland, France, Germany, or America. That is the true reading, and is that, or is it not within the doctrine that the description of these book-debts is so vague that the court will hold that nothing passed under it?”

It is not quite certain that it is critically correct, and the question would seem rather to be whether the description of the future debts professed to be assigned by the deed of 1879 was so wide, so vague, and so uncertain that the mortgagee could not so far actively enforce it in any court of justice.

I decline to decide test questions merely because the case is called "a test case." What is a test case? Probably it is meant to represent a case in which some question of law necessarily arises governing some other like cases, and to which your Lordships are required to apply the crucial test of the opinion of the House. When such a case comes before the House, your Lordships must and do decide it, but it is not the province of the House to decide abstract questions which are not actually necessary as the foundation of the judgment of the House. The question has not, up to the present moment, been finally decided. It is one of no inconsiderable difficulty, and involves considerations of public policy. What construction is to be put on "future book-debts?" Does it mean the trade debts entered in the trader's books, or does it mean the net residue of those debts after satisfying the claims of those creditors by means of whose property these debts came into existence? Would an account have to be taken as in the case of the trading of a bankrupt after bankruptcy, and without certificate, and debts becoming due to him in that second trading, and claimed by the assignee as after-acquired property: see Troughton v. Gitley (8). The reports of AMBLER were not unfrequently questioned, but the decree taken from the registrar's book is given in the note to Tucker v. Hernaman (9), and the decision in Troughton v. Gitley (8) was adopted by TURNER, L.J. Suppose too, in the case of future debts, that the mortgagor had obtained bills and notes or other securities from his debtors, how are the rights and liabilities of the parties to be adjusted? Or, suppose a trader to become bankrupt, his assets consisting largely of recent book-debts, representing his stock-in-trade, out of which they were created, are those book-debts to go to the holder of a bill of sale, probably some years old, not registered, of which the real creditors had no notice?

I allude only to these possible contingencies as illustrating some of the difficulties that beset the question, and indicating the inexpediency of carrying the law a step further than it has hitherto gone in practice. In a case recently before the House, your Lordships considered that the policy of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, was to prohibit, in cases coming within its provisions, bills of sale of property not in existence, but which might be acquired thereafter (Thomas v. Kelly (10)). Your Lordships are now asked to give effect to an instrument which, though a bill of sale of future debts of the most unlimited and undefined character, does not, as to book-debts come within the Bills of Sale code. I have listened to the weighty reasons given by my noble and learned friends, and I have read the opinion to be delivered by LORD MACNAGHTEN. That opinion is one of great learning and ability and remarkable for its boldness. I have weighed all the reasons so powerfully given, and hope your Lordships will excuse me if, for the present, I hesitate, and, for the reasons I have given, decline to express either assent to or dissent from the conclusions of my noble and learned friends. The course which I have deemed it expedient to adopt renders it unnecessary for me to consider the authorities.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I venture to think that this case is free from difficulty when the facts are understood. Izon was a packing-case manufacturer. In 1879 he compounded with his creditors. At Izon's request Tyrrell signed promissory notes for the last instalment of the composition, taking from Izon a bill of sale as a counter security. The bill of sale is dated May 13, 1879. It assigns to Tyrrell by way of mortgage, among other property, all the stock-in-trade and effects which during the continuance of the security might be on the mortgagor's then premises, or at any other place at which during the continuance of the security he might carry on business, and also (to quote the words of the deed)

"all the book-debts due and owing, or which may during the continuance of this security become due and owing to the said mortgagor."

A Then there is a power of attorney in the most ample terms, a proviso that if the mortgagor on demand fails to pay the amount due, the mortgagee may take possession and sell the property in mortgage; and a proviso that until default the mortgagor may use and enjoy all the mortgaged premises; and, lastly, there is a covenant for further assurance.

I pause for a moment to point out the nature and effect of the security created
B by the bill of sale of 1879. It belongs to a class of securities of which perhaps the most familiar example is to be found in the debentures of trading companies. It is a floating security reaching over all the trade assets of the mortgagor for the time being, and intended to fasten upon and bind the assets in existence at the time when the mortgagee intervenes. In other words, the mortgagor makes himself trustee of his business for the purpose of the security. But the trust is to
C remain dormant until the mortgagee calls it into operation. The business in the immediate contemplation of the parties was, of course, the business in existence at the date when the bill of sale was given. But the assignment is not limited to that, it extends to any business which the mortgagor may carry on during the continuance of the security. That was an obvious, and, if not forbidden by statute, a proper precaution. A tradesman who has been unfortunate in his business is D perhaps as likely to try a change as one who has been uniformly successful. The draftsman, I think, would have shown more simplicity than skill if he had left it in the power of the mortgagor to imperil or defeat the security by altering his business, or by transferring his capital to some other enterprise.

In reliance on the arrangement I have described, Tyrrell paid a large sum to Izon's creditors. But he seems to have been content with his security, and Izon
E continued to trade without any interference on his part, and apparently without any alteration in the character of the business. In 1885 the executors of Tyrrell, who was then dead, thought fit to call in the money due to his estate. They demanded payment. They took possession of the mortgaged premises, so far as it was practicable to do so, and they sold the book-debts. Among the book-debts which were sold was one which had recently become due from Messrs. Wilson Bros.
F & Co. The purchaser at once gave notice to them. The next thing that happened was that Izon became bankrupt. After that Messrs. Wilson Bros. & Co. paid the purchaser. The Court of Appeal has held unanimously that the official receiver is entitled to recover the money from the purchaser. Your Lordships have now to determine whether that decision is right. The question is not complicated by any circumstances other than those I have mentioned. The transaction between G Izon and Tyrrell is not impeached as fraudulent under the Act of Elizabeth, or on any other ground. Nor is it necessary to consider the provisions of the Bills of Sale Acts. Choses in action are expressly declared not to be personal chattels within the meaning of those Acts [Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 4]. The grounds on which LORD FITZGERALD has founded his opinion were not discussed at the Bar, nor is there, I think, sufficient evidence before your Lordships to enable your Lord-
H ships to act on them.

The claim of the purchaser was rested on well-known principles. It has long been settled that future property, possibilities, and expectancies are assignable in equity for value. The mode or form of assignment is absolutely immaterial, provided the intention of the parties is clear. To effectuate the intention an assignment for value, in terms present and immediate, has always been regarded in
I equity as a contract binding on the conscience of the assignor, and so binding the subject-matter of the contract when it comes into existence, if it is of such a nature and so described as to be capable of being ascertained and identified. The position of the purchaser was assailed on one point, and one point only. It was not disputed that Tyrrell gave valuable consideration for the bill of sale, or that Tyrrell's executors were within their rights in selling whatever was comprised in the security. It was not denied that the debt purchased was a book-debt which became due and owing to Izon during the continuance of the security, nor was any question raised as to the sufficiency of the notice which the purchaser gave to

Messrs. Wilson Bros. & Co. The contention of the learned counsel for the respondent was this. They asserted as a proposition of law that an assignment of future book-debts, not limited to any specified business, is too vague to have any effect. Starting from that proposition, they asked your Lordships to come to the conclusion that the assignment of book-debts in the present case was void from the beginning, as including in its terms book-debts which could not be made the subject of valid assignment. A

I do not stop to consider whether that is a necessary or a legitimate conclusion. It is a startling result, certainly, and I shall have a word to say about it by-and-by. At present I am merely inquiring whether the original proposition is sound. In the leading judgment in the Court of Appeal it is said that the doctrine which covers the proposition is well established, because "in every one of the cases in point that were cited its existence has been assumed." The principle of the doctrine, however, is not stated; the doctrine itself is not defined; the cases which are supposed to be in point are not reviewed or even named. But the high authority of the learned judges who have adopted this view makes it necessary to examine the matter closely. B C

The learned counsel for the respondent gave your Lordships every assistance that ingenuity and industry could supply, and the result of their labours may fairly be summed up as follows. The origin of the doctrine, modern though it be, is lost in obscurity. Before Holroyd v. Marshall (4) no support for it can be found. Possibly it may be evolved from Holroyd v. Marshall (4); LOPES, L.J., seems to think so. It assumed a definite form in Belding v. Read (2). It was recognised by FRY, J., in Re Count D'Epineuil (No. 2) (3), and it received the stamp of authority from what was said or implied by two of the learned judges who decided Clements v. Matthews (11). No other authority or semblance of authority was produced. I have read Holroyd v. Marshall (4) many times, and I can discover no trace of the doctrine there. Belding v. Read (2), as BOWEN, L.J., points out, was founded upon a misapprehension of LORD WESTBURY's judgment in Holroyd v. Marshall (4). In Re Count D'Epineuil (No. 2) (3), the learned judge, as he stated in Coombe v. Carter (1), though himself bound by Belding v. Read (2), and simply followed the decision in that case. As for the order made in Re Count D'Epineuil (No. 2) (3), it seems to me to have been only too favourable to the claimant. I much doubt whether a memorandum like that on which the claimant relied could create a specific lien of any sort or kind. Finally, COTTON, L.J., has himself disclaimed the hidden meaning attributed to his judgment in Clements v. Matthews (11). D E F

So much for authority. What foundation is there for the doctrine apart from authority? The learned counsel for the respondent did not pretend to be wiser than the Court of Appeal. They, too, neither defined the doctrine the aid of which they invoked, nor stated any principle on which it could be supposed to rest. They contented themselves with endeavouring to maintain the proposition that an assignment by a trader of future book-debts, not confined to a specified business, is too vague to be effectual. Why should this be so? If future book-debts be assigned, the subject-matter of assignment is capable of being identified as and when the book-debts come into existence, whether the description be restricted to a particular business or not. Indeed, the restriction may render the task of identification all the more difficult. An energetic tradesman naturally develops and extends his business. One business runs into another, and the line of demarcation is often indistinct and undefined. The linen-draper of today in the course of a few years may come to be the proprietor of an establishment providing everything that man wants, or woman either, from the cradle to the grave. In such a case I can easily conceive that difficult questions might arise if the book-debts assigned were limited to a particular business. It was admitted by the learned counsel for the respondent that a trader may assign his future book-debts in a specified business. Why should the line be drawn there? Between men of full age and competent understanding ought there to be any limit to the freedom of contract but that imposed by positive law or dictated by considerations of morality or public policy? The G H I B

A limit proposed is purely arbitrary, and I think meaningless and unreasonable. The rule laid down by the Court of Appeal would not help to identify or ascertain the subject-matter of the contract in any case. It might have the opposite effect. It would be no benefit to the assignor's general creditors. It might prevent a man from raising money on the credit of his expectations in his existing business—on that which is admitted to be capable of assignment—in consequence of the obvious risk that some alteration in the character of the business might impair or defeat the security.

Under these circumstances, I think your Lordships will come to the conclusion that the proposition on which the respondent relies as the foundation of his case cannot be supported on principle, and that the authorities on which it was supposed to rest may be traced to a decision of the Court of Exchequer, which itself is founded on an erroneous view of the principles recognised in this House in Holroyd v. Marshall (4). I should wish to say a few words about Holroyd v. Marshall (4), because I am inclined to think that Belding v. Read (2) is not the only case in which LORD WESTBURY's observations have been misunderstood. To understand LORD WESTBURY's judgment aright, I think it is necessary to bear in mind the state of the law at the time, and the point to which his Lordship was addressing himself. Holroyd v. Marshall (4) laid down no new law, nor did it extend the principles of equity in the slightest degree. Long before Holroyd v. Marshall (4) was determined it was well settled that an assignment of future property for value operates in equity by way of agreement, binding the conscience of the assignor, and so binding the property from the moment when the contract becomes capable of being performed, on the principle that equity considers as done that which ought to be done, and in accordance with the maxim, which LORD THURLOW said in Legard v. Hodges (12) (1 Ves. at p. 478) he took to be universal,

“that whenever persons agree concerning any particular subject, that, in a court of equity, as against the party himself and any claiming under him, voluntarily or with notice, raises a trust.”

It had also been determined by the highest tribunals in the country short of this House—by LORD LYNTHURST, as Lord Chancellor in England, and by SIR EDWARD SUGDEN, as Lord Chancellor in Ireland—that an agreement binding property for valuable consideration had precedence over the claim of a judgment creditor. Some confusion, however, had recently been introduced by a decision of a most eminent common law judge, who was naturally less familiar with the doctrines of equity than with the principles of common law.

In that state of things, in Holroyd v. Marshall (4), in a contract between an equitable assignee and an execution creditor, STUART, V.-C., decided in favour of the equitable assignee. His decision was reversed by the Lord Chancellor (LORD CAMPBELL), in a judgment which seemed to strike at the root of all equitable titles. LORD CAMPBELL did not hold that the equitable assignee obtained no interest in the property the subject of the contract when it came into existence; he held that the equitable assignee did obtain an interest in equity. But at the same time, he held that the interest was of such a fugitive character, so shadowy, and so precarious, that it could not stand against the legal title of the execution creditor without the help of some new act to give it substance and strength. It was to this view, I think, that LORD WESTBURY addressed himself, and, by way of showing how real and substantial were equitable interests springing from agreements based on valuable consideration, he referred to the doctrines of specific performance, illustrating his argument by examples. One of the examples, perhaps, requires some qualification. That, however, does not affect the argument. The argument is clear and convincing; but it must not be wrested from its purpose. It is difficult to suppose that LORD WESTBURY intended to lay down as a rule to guide or perplex the court that considerations applicable to cases of specific performance, properly so called, where the contract is executory, are to be applied to every case of equitable assignment dealing with future property.

LORD SELBORNE has, I think, done good service in pointing out that confusion is sometimes caused by transferring such considerations to questions which arise as to the propriety of the court requiring something or other to be done in specie: Wolverhampton and Walsall Rail. Co. v. London and North Western Rail. Co. (13). His Lordship observes that there is some fallacy and ambiguity in the way in which in cases of that kind those words "specific performance" are very frequently used. Greater confusion still, I think, would be caused by transferring considerations applicable to suits for specific performance—involving, as they do, some of the nicest distinctions and most difficult questions that come before the court—to cases of equitable assignment or specific lien where nothing remains to be done in order to define the rights of the parties, but the court is merely asked to protect rights completely defined as between the parties to the contract, or to give effect to such rights either by granting an injunction or by appointing a receiver, or by adjudicating on questions between rival claimants. The truth is, that cases of equitable assignment or specific lien where the consideration has passed depend on the real meaning of the agreement between the parties. The difficulty, generally speaking, is to ascertain the true scope and effect of the agreement. When that is ascertained, you have only to apply the principle that equity considers that done which ought to be done, if that principle is applicable under the circumstances of the case. The doctrines relating to specific performance do not, I think, afford a test or a measure of the rights created. There are cases where the rights of the parties may be worked out by means of specific performance, though no specific lien is effected by the agreement itself. More frequently a specific lien is effected though no case of specific performance is contemplated.

Take Mornington v. Keane (14). There Lord Mornington covenanted that he would, on or before a specified day, either by a charge on freehold estates in England or Wales, or by an investment in the funds, or by the best means which might be then in his power, secure the payment of an annuity to a trustee for his wife. The Lord Chancellor did not doubt that the covenant would entitle the covenantee to have it performed in specie; but, still, it was held by the court that the covenant of itself created no lien on the covenantor's property. Take the present case. The rights of the parties are completely defined by the bill of sale. Though there is the usual covenant for further assurance, it is plain that no further deed was contemplated. Yet no one can doubt that, if Izon had attempted to receive outstanding book-debts after the mortgagee had intervened, the court would at once have lent its assistance by the appointment of a receiver.

Metcalf v. Archbishop of York (15) is, I think, a good illustration of the argument I am presenting to your Lordships. In 1811 an incumbent charged his benefice with an annuity, and covenanted that if he should be preferred to any other benefice he would charge it with the annuity, and that in the meantime the then present benefice should stand charged therewith, and there was a covenant for further assurance. At the date of the deed the charge was not illegal, for the statute of Elizabeth [the Benefices Act, 1571 (18 Eliz., c. 20)] had been repealed. In 1814 the incumbent was preferred to another living. In 1817 charges on ecclesiastical benefices were again prohibited by the Residence on Benefices, etc., Act, 1817. No legal charge upon the new living had been executed before that Act passed. A question afterwards arose between the person entitled to the annuity and judgment creditors in possession under a sequestration. It was argued by Mr. Jacob for the judgment creditors that, as specific performance would be in contravention of the statute, the equitable title must fail. It was contended that the covenant was all one, and that it amounted only to a covenant for a legal charge, which was prohibited by law before any attempt was made to enforce it. But the Lord Chancellor was of opinion that that was not the true construction of the deed, and that there was an equitable charge independently of the covenant to execute a legal charge. It was then said for the defendants that all equitable charges rest upon specific performance and the right to have a legal charge. LORD COTTENHAM, however, replied: "This is by no means so," and he affirmed the Vice-

A Chancellor's judgment giving effect to the equitable charge. There the contract for a legal charge would have raised a case of specific performance. But specific performance of that contract was out of the question. The contract for an equitable charge raised no question of specific performance. A contract for value for an equitable charge is as good an equitable charge as can be. It could not be made any better, though the aid of the court might be required to protect or to give effect to it. Mr. Jacob's argument (to cite the words of the report) was this (1 My. & Cr. at p. 549):

"The whole doctrine of equitable charges rests on the right to specific performance; for a person having an equitable charge has no estate or interest."

LORD COTTENHAM summarily rejected the proposition. LORD WESTBURY demolished the foundation on which it was put. And, oddly enough, the proposition is now supposed to be established by LORD WESTBURY's authority. It may be said that this is a question of words. To a great extent it is so; most questions are. But I venture to think that the discussion is not out of place, because I observe that LINDLEY, L.J., from whom I differ on a point of equity with much reluctance, was led to disregard the rights of the purchaser in the present case in consequence of the difficulties presented to his mind by the application of the doctrines of specific performance.

In the course of the argument your Lordships were referred to a recent case, Re Clarke, Coombe v. Carter (1). In principle, I am unable to distinguish that case from the present, though others have been more fortunate. Re Clarke (1) was the case of a mortgage. So is this. The contest there, as it is here, was with the mortgagor's general creditors. The assignment which gave rise to the question in that case was an assignment of any moneys to which the mortgagor might be entitled under any will. A charge on book-debts in a business not yet established, and perhaps not even thought of, is at best a doubtful security. Most people would think it speculative. Some might call it visionary. But the same terms might be applied without any great impropriety to a charge on a possible legacy from an unknown friend or secret admirer. As to vagueness, whatever that expression may mean, I cannot see that the one can be more vague than the other. In Re Clarke (1) the charge was enforced against a legacy which happened to come to the mortgagor some years after the mortgage was made. The judgment of KAY, J., was read to your Lordships; and a very able and exhaustive judgment it is. No one is more familiar with the doctrines of equity than that learned judge. But I gather from his remarks that, if he had not been pressed with the decision now under appeal, he would have treated the case as a matter of course not open to argument.

I need hardly say that I think the decision in Re Clarke (1) unquestionably correct, and I should add nothing more about it, but that I find that some of the learned judges have drawn a distinction which I confess I am unable to appreciate. It was said that, both in Clements v. Matthews (11) and in Re Clarke (1), the contract was divisible; but that in the present case the contract is indivisible. I am not sure that I quite understand what is meant by saying that the contract is divisible in cases of this description. The contract is not, I think, divisible in the usual acceptation of the word. The consideration is not intended to be apportioned, nor can that for which the consideration is given be said to be divisible, except in the sense that it consists of a collection of things capable of separation or division without destruction. To say that an assignment by a trader of all future book-debts in his present business and also of all future book-debts in any other business which he may hereafter undertake is divisible, but that an assignment of all his future book-debts is not divisible, seems to me to be attributing substance and reality to the merest verbal distinction. In the present case LOPES, L.J., says (18 Q.B.D. at p. 31): "Here the words are not capable of being read distributively." The rest of the court take the same view; and in Re Clarke (1) CORROX and FRY, L.JJ., both seem to think the point material. Can it really make any difference that the several things for which the mortgagee has bargained, and on the faith of which he has advanced his money, are lumped together in one single expression, if in fact they have a separate existence, or are capable of being dealt with separately? Brevity has its dangers or its advantages, if equity will absolve a man from his bargain merely because he has packed into a sentence or compressed into a word a description of particulars which might have been set forth at large and expanded under several heads or subdivisions. This is a question, remember, between the original parties to the bargain. The contract cannot be avoided for the benefit of the mortgagor's creditors, unless it is held not binding as between the mortgagor and the mortgagee. Even in an executory contract I apprehend it is not competent for the vendor to say: "I cannot give you all I promised, and so you shall have nothing." The purchaser is entitled to take what the vendor can give him, and, as a general rule, he is also entitled to a corresponding abatement in the price. But when the consideration has actually passed, it is difficult to suppose anything less consonant with equity than a rule which should lay down that a man who has had the benefit of the contract may escape from its burden merely because he has promised what he can perform and something more too, and promised it all in one breath, and in the most compendious language. Surely the other party to the contract ought to have a voice in the matter. He may, perhaps, think half a loaf better than no bread, especially when he has paid for the whole and the seller is not in a position to return any part of the price.

When I find such a concurrence of opinion in favour of a view which seems to me to be contrary to equity, I may perhaps be forgiven for referring to one authority, a very old one, but none the worse, I think, for that. Bettesworth v. Dean of St. Paul's (16) was decided in this House in 1728. The facts are rather complicated, but the point may be stated shortly. Before the disabling statute of Elizabeth, the dean and chapter granted a lease for a long term with a covenant for renewal for ninety-nine years. In 1725 a bill was brought to enforce the covenant, or to compel the dean and chapter, who had had the benefit of the agreement, to grant a renewal for such a term as might by law be granted. The case was twice argued in Chancery. On the second occasion the Lord Chancellor was assisted by SIR JOSEPH JEKYLL, M.R., LORD RAYMOND, C.J., and PRICE, J. The court (the Master of the Rolls dissenting) declared that the plaintiffs were not entitled to any relief either in law or equity, and so the bill was dismissed. On appeal, the objections which had prevailed in the court below were repealed. It was urged that the grant of a lease for ninety-nine years was prohibited by the statute, and that the covenant was one entire covenant, which could not be varied or divided. To quote the words of the report (1 Bro. Parl. Cas. at p. 245), which gives the arguments of counsel at length, but not the reasons for the judgment:

"In answer to these objections it was said to be a harsh way of reasoning, that because a person was now supposed to be prohibited from doing the whole of what he had agreed to do, he therefore should not do what was in his power and was lawful for him to perform, or to say that because part of a thing was taken away the whole must be so too, though part was still reserved; and in truth such construction and reasoning were apprehended to be inconsistent with the rules of equity."

All the judges having been consulted, the House took that view, and it was ordered and adjudged that the decree should be reversed, and that the dean and chapter should make a new lease for forty years.

In the result, therefore, and for the reasons I have given, I am of opinion that the case of the respondent entirely fails. The original proposition is not, I think, well founded. If it were sound the conclusion attempted to be drawn from it could not, as it seems to me, be maintained. I have, therefore, no hesitation in concurring in the motion which has been proposed.

LORD WATSON.—With reference to what fell from LORD FITZGERALD, I desire to explain that I do not understand the present to be a test case, in any other sense than this, that a question of some general importance is fairly raised by the actual facts, as these have been stated by the parties, in both courts below as well as in this House. I purposely abstain from expressing any view on the matters of fact discussed in the opinion of my noble and learned friend, because I do not know that we have before us sufficient materials for their decision, and they were not referred to in the arguments of counsel.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I desire to express my concurrence with what LORD WATSON has said. I certainly did not understand this appeal to be a test case upon a question not raised by the facts. I did not enter into the discussion of the points raised by LORD FITZGERALD because they were not adverted to in the courts below, nor was any reliance placed upon them by any of the counsel at your Lordships' Bar.

Nuisance—Land—Weeds—Neglect of occupier to cut—Seeds blown on to adjoining land.

The defendant occupied land which had originally been forest land, but had been brought into cultivation. As soon as this land was brought into cultivation thistles sprang up all over it. The defendant neglected to cut these thistles, and consequently the seeds were blown in large quantities on to the adjoining land which was occupied by the plaintiff. In an action brought by the plaintiff to recover damages from the defendant for injury done to his lands,

Held: the defendant was under no duty towards the plaintiff to cut the thistles, which were the natural growth of the soil, and, therefore, was not liable for the damage caused to the plaintiff's land.

Notes. At common law an occupier of land is under no duty to an adjoining occupier of land to cut weeds naturally growing on his land. However by the Weeds Act, 1959, s. 1 (39 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 11: "Where the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food . . . is satisfied that there are injurious weeds to which this Act applies growing upon any land he may serve upon the occupier of the land a notice in writing requiring him, within the time specified in the notice, to take such action as may be necessary to prevent the weeds from spreading."

Appeal from Leicester County Court.

The defendant, a farmer, occupied land which had originally been forest land, but which had some years prior to the time when the defendant's occupation of it commenced been brought into cultivation by the then occupier. The forest land prior to cultivation did not bear thistles; but as soon as it was brought into cultivation thistles sprang up all over it. The defendant neglected to cut down these thistles, so as to prevent them from seeding, and, consequently, in the years 1887 and 1888 there was a large number of thistles on his land in full seed. The plaintiff, who occupied land adjoining the defendant's, suffered great damage by reason of the thistle seeds being carried by the wind in large quantities on to his land, and brought an action in the county court to recover damages against the defendant for the injury done to his land. The county court judge left to the jury the question whether the defendant, in not cutting the thistles, had been guilty of negligence. The jury found that he had shown negligence in the manner in which he had cultivated his land, and judgment was accordingly entered for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed. B C D

Toller for the defendant.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—I never heard of such an action as this. There can be no duty as between adjoining occupiers to cut thistles, which are the natural growth of the soil. The verdict and judgment in the county court must be set aside, and this appeal must be allowed. E

LORD ESHER, M.R., concurred.

Re SMITH. BILKE v. ROPER

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Stirling, J.), July 31, August 6, 1890]

B Will—Re-publication—Subsequent testamentary instrument—No express intention to re-publish—Inference of intention from reference to will.

In order that a testamentary instrument should operate as a re-publication of a prior will, it is not necessary that it should express a particular intention of so doing, but it should nevertheless contain some reference to the will from which an intention of re-publication may be inferred.

C The testatrix, a married woman, had, under her marriage settlement, a power of appointment over freehold estate, and a sum of £2,000 new three per cent. annuities which were comprised in the settlement. By her will, dated Dec. 27, 1878, in the lifetime of her husband, she exercised this power, and also purported to dispose of all other property over which she had any power of disposition. After her husband's death in 1884 she executed a testamentary instrument, dated July 30, 1885, in the presence of two witnesses, which purported to give to a nephew specific shares to which she was absolutely entitled, but contained no reference to her will. This instrument was admitted to probate together with her will.

D Held: as the instrument contained no reference to the will from which an inference could be drawn of an intention that the will should be considered as of subsequent date, it did not operate as a re-publication of it and the testatrix died intestate except for the property subject to the power and that specifically mentioned in the instrument.

E Notes. By the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, ss. 1, 2 (1) (11 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 811 et seq., a married woman can dispose of her property by will as if she were a feme sole.

Adjourned Summons taken out by the plaintiff, a residuary legatee, to determine whether an instrument executed by the testatrix operated as a re-publication of her will.

By an indenture dated Nov. 14, 1864, and made prior to the marriage of Maria Smith, then Maria Rockhill, widow, with Joseph Smith, certain freehold messuages at Dunmow, in the county of Essex, and two messuages at Upway, in the county of Dorset, and a sum of £2,000 New Three per Cent. Annuities, were settled by Maria Smith in trust for herself for life, and after her decease upon trust for her husband for life, and after the decease of the survivor of them in trust for such persons as she should by deed or will appoint. By her will, dated Dec. 17, 1878, and made in the lifetime of her husband, Maria Smith, in exercise of the powers contained in the settlement, appointed the messuages at Dunmow, after the decease of herself and her husband, to R. Roper and his heirs, and as to the premises at Upway and all other real estate, if any, not thereinbefore disposed of, and comprised in the indenture of settlement, she appointed the same, after the death of the survivor of herself and her husband, to the use of the defendants R. Roper and H. C. Smith and their heirs, upon trust for sale, and to hold the proceeds upon the trusts thereafter declared; and in further exercise of the powers and of every other power enabling her thereto, she directed, limited, and appointed that the sum of £2,000 New Three per Cent. Annuities should be sold and the proceeds of the sale and the money arising from the sale of her real estate and all other, if any, her moneys, property, and effects over which she had any power of disposition, after payment of a legacy of £100 to Louisa Cleaveland, and of the expenses of proving and executing her will, should be divided among all her nephews and nieces (the children of her brother, Henry Durden, and sisters, Elizabeth Bowditch, widow, and Mary Ann Bowditch, deceased) living at her decease, and the child or children equally of every nephew and niece then dead in equal shares per stirpes, and as to the shares of married women to their separate use; and the testatrix appointed the defendants R. Roper and H. C. Smith and her nephew J. Durden her executors. Joseph Smith died on June 24, 1884, and after his death Maria Smith executed an instrument in the following form:

“Dunmow, July 30, 1885.—This is a present to Oswald Newman Roper from his aunt Maria Smith by the express wish of his late uncle, Joseph Smith, a few weeks before his death—ten shares of £10 each in the Dunmow Gas Co.—Maria Smith. Witness, Henry C. Smith; Eliza Clark.”

Maria Smith died on June 19, 1888, and her will and the instrument of July 30, 1885, were both proved in the principal registry by the executors named in the will on Sept. 26, 1888. In addition to the property comprised in the settlement and subject to the power of appointment, Maria Smith possessed other property to which she was absolutely entitled, and which consisted of the ten gas shares mentioned in the instrument of July 30, 1885, a sum of £1,000 Consols, further gas shares and certain other particulars.

Aug. 6, 1890. STIRLING, J., read the following judgment.—This case raises a singular point, and one not entirely covered by authority. In this document of July 30, 1885, there is no reference whatever to the prior will of Dec. 27, 1878. The document is not called a codicil, and there is no attestation clause attached to it. Probate has been granted of both these instruments, and the question is whether the second testamentary instrument of July 30, 1885, constitutes a re-publication of the will of Dec. 27, 1878.

According to the decision of the House of Lords in Willock v. Noble (1), it is quite clear that, as regards property acquired by a married woman after the death of her husband, a will made during the coverture would have no effect, unless it was re-published after her title had accrued [see note, ante p. 503]. Apart from any statutory requirements it has long been settled that a will may be re-published either by a re-execution of it, or by a codicil to it, and according to the notes to Duppa v. Mayo (2) (1 Saund. at p. 278):

“Anything which showed an intent that the will should be of subsequent date was a sufficient re-publication.”

Of course a codicil to a will, if it refers to the will and such an intention, would be a re-publication.

The learned author of WILLIAMS ON EXECUTORS, VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., says ((7th edn.), vol. 1, p. 215):

“A codicil will amount to a re-publication of the will to which it refers, whether the codicil be or be not annexed to the will, or be or be not expressly confirmatory of it; for every codicil is, in construction of law, part of a man’s will, whether it be so described in such codicil or not; and, as such, furnishes conclusive evidence of the testator’s considering his will as then existing.”

It must be borne in mind that the learned author was there speaking of a codicil which refers to the will, and while the long list of cases stated in the note forms an ample justification of the learned author’s proposition of law, in every one of those cases, with one apparent exception with which I will deal presently, there appears to have been an express reference in the codicil to the preceding will. In most of those cases there were the usual formal words, but in some of them that did not occur.

In Serocold v. Hemming (3) Richard Hemming, the testator, had written at the bottom of his will, immediately under his name and seal, affixed to the last sheet, as follows:

“London, Oct. 16, 1755. I likewise give to Mrs. Lucretia Luxford £25 a year for her life, and to my black servant, Peter Savile, £10 a year for his life, the said annuities to be paid out of my estate by my executors above-named.
—Witness my hand, Richard Hemming.—Witness: John Serocold; J. Straw.”

In that case, although the will was not mentioned in terms, there was a plain reference to it, and it was held by SIR GEORGE LEE that the words “my executors above named” constituted “such a reference to the first will as would revive it, at least as to the personal estate, which alone was in question.”

The case, however, which approaches the most nearly of any of them to the present case is Rowley v. Eylon (4), and, according to the report, the testator, after making his will, purchased several copyhold estates, which he surrendered “to such uses as he should by will or any codicil thereto appoint,” and he subsequently made a codicil to his will also duly executed to pass real estate in the words following:

“I give, devise, and bequeath unto my son Thomas Eylon and his heirs for ever all my copyhold estates within the manor of Wrockwardine.”

Apparently, therefore, there was in the codicil no reference to any prior will. I have, however, examined the registrar’s book, and I have also referred to the original will and codicil, and I find that the report does not state the whole of the codicil, and that the codicil as a matter of fact began with the formal words, "This is a codicil to the will," etc. Consequently none of the cases which are referred to by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., or have been cited to me, constitutes an authority for what I am asked to do in this case, or support the proposition that a reference to the will is unnecessary.

I think that the best statement of the law upon the subject occurs in Barnes v. B. Crowe (5). In that case the Lord Commissioner EYRE says (1 Ves. at p. 497):

"If we disentangle ourselves from the rule that there shall be no re-publication without re-execution, the principle that a codicil attested by three witnesses shall be a re-publication, seems intelligible and clear. The testator's acknowledgment of his former will, considered as his will at the execution of the codicil, if not directly expressed in that instrument, must be implied from the nature of the instrument itself; as by the nature of it, it supposes a former will, refers to it, and becomes part of it; and, being attested by three witnesses, his implied declaration and acknowledgment seems also to be attested by three. Before the statute [Statute of Frauds, 1677] it was no part of the essence of the obligation that the will should be re-executed. Anything that expressed the testator's intention that the will should be considered as of a subsequent date was sufficient. Since the statute re-execution of the will is not necessary; but nothing more is required than a writing, according to the provisions of that statute, expressing that intent. Therefore, LORD HARDWICKE might well say he saw no great difference between the words 'I desire this codicil may be part of my will' and the words 'I re-publish,' which, it was there admitted, would have done. In A.-G. v. Lady Downing (6) LORD CAMDEN supposed a particular intent to re-publish ought to appear; and that annexation or particular expressions in the codicil would demonstrate that intention. If that was necessary, not only LORD HARDWICKE's opinion cannot stand, but neither can Acherley v. Vernon (7); for there was no particular intent to re-publish; but the testator referred to the will, made alterations, and gave sufficient demonstrations that, when making and executing the codicil, he considered the will as his will, and from that a re-publication was implied; but it was not particularly in his thoughts to do any formal act of re-publication. Upon considering these cases I confess I am inclined to stand upon the general proposition stated by LORD HARDWICKE to show the will in the case before us was re-published."

It seems to me, then, that we must find an inference that the testator, when making the codicil, had in his mind the re-publishing of his will. If I apply that test to the present case I find nothing from which I can draw such inference, and I accordingly think that this testamentary instrument does not amount to a re-publication of the will. The application, therefore, fails upon that ground.

Charity—Relief of poverty—Society to provide for victims of mining accidents, relatives of deceased miners, and aged or infirm miners.

Charity—Cy-près doctrine—Scheme—Surplus sum left from colliery accident fund to be used for “the relief of suffering occasioned by colliery accidents”—Sums allocated to district committees—Transfer by district committee of whole sum allocated to it to friendly society.

After an accident at a colliery in south Durham, an accident fund was set up for the relief of sufferers and a large sum of money was raised by voluntary subscription. The committee in charge of the fund proposed to set aside a sum to provide for the widows and families of those who had suffered as a result of the accident, and to divide the surplus among twelve local mining districts in certain proportions to be handed over to local committees to be applied by them for “the relief of suffering occasioned by colliery accidents in the way which may appear to them most desirable.” A specific sum was allotted to the south Durham district in accordance with this proposal and the trustee for this district sought a declaration that the sum so allocated might be transferred to the trustees of the Northumberland and Durham Miners’ Permanent Relief Fund Friendly Society. The operations of the society were confined exclusively to the counties of Northumberland, Durham, Cumberland, and the Cleveland district, and membership was open to all mine-workers in these areas. The objects of the society were the raising of funds by voluntary subscriptions among the members and by donations to make provision for fatal accidents, for defraying funeral expenses, for the support of widows, children and other relations of a deceased member, for the support of members who were unable from age or infirmity to follow any employment, and to pay a sum of money on the death of a member.

Held: the sum should be transferred to the trustees of the friendly society, but was to be applied for the relief of suffering occasioned by colliery accidents in the south Durham district and for no other purpose.

Action by Sir Joseph Whitwell Pease, trustee for the south Durham district of the Hartley Colliery Accident Fund, against Hugh Lee Pattinson, an original subscriber to the fund, representing all the subscribers to the fund who had not assented to the application of the surplus, and the Attorney General, for a declaration that he might properly transfer the sum of £2,320 13s. 8d., and the investments thereof, to four of the trustees of the Northumberland and Durham Miners’ Permanent Relief Fund Friendly Society, for the general purposes of such society, or that proper directions might be given as to how the said trust property ought to be applied; and that, so far as necessary, the trusts upon which the said property was held might be administered by the court.

Sir Arthur Watson, Q.C., and W. C. Druce for the plaintiff.

J. B. Levenson for the defendant Pattinson.

Stirling for the Attorney-General.

BACON, V.-C.—On the whole, I am satisfied that this friendly society is a charity; but the fund which is in question must be confined to distinctly charitable objects, and that gives rise to a question of some practical difficulty. I think that provision must be made for binding and limiting the application of this fund so as to prevent its being applied in any way for the benefit of a man who may change his employment according to the rules of the friendly society. How that is to be done I do not quite see, unless I direct an inquiry; and, although I am not willing to make any greater difficulty than is necessary in the distribution of this fund, I think some such inquiry as to that must be made. I am disposed to postpone any further judgment until the friendly society shall have passed such resolutions as may be necessary to bind the application of this charitable fund to the objects for which it may be properly applied. Counsel for the plaintiff has said that there is no doubt that the society would readily further any plan for carrying this into effect, either by altering the rules of the society, or by passing any resolutions that may be necessary. At present I only decide that the society is a charity, and that the consent of the Charity Commissioners is not necessary to the action. Beyond that, the subject presents, as I have already said, considerable difficulties, as it is my duty to see that the fund is not applied to other purposes than those for which the charitable fund was intended by the original subscribers. I think it must go into chambers for a scheme to be settled; that is, no doubt, expensive, and to be avoided, but must be done, unless some other mode of settlement can be arrived at. What will you do as to that?

Sir A. Watson, Q.C.—I should propose that, to obviate any difficulty, the fund should be transferred to four of the trustees, not to be applied for the general purposes of the society, but, according to the rules of the society, exclusively for the relief of suffering occasioned by colliery accidents, and that it should be placed to a separate account as provided by r. 17 of the society. It would thus be impossible for the trustees to apply the fund for any other purpose.

B. J. Levenson asked that words might be inserted limiting the application of the fund to the south Durham district.

BACON, V.C.—I will make the order for the transfer as proposed, but the fund is to be applied for the relief of suffering occasioned by colliery accidents in the south Durham district, and for no other purpose.

C By an agreement made between a company, of the one part, and a lender, of the other part, it was agreed that the company should repay the lender the sum of £600 with interest, certain hereditaments being charged with the repayment of the £600 and interest. It was also agreed that the company would at any time during the continuance of the security, at the request of the lender, execute a legal mortgage, and further would issue debentures of the company to the extent of £600, secured over all the capital, stock, goods, chattels, and effects of the company, including uncalled capital, both present and future.

D Held: a "debenture" within s. 17 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, was any document which created a liability or acknowledged it, even though it was not called a debenture; "issued" was not a technical term, and meant the delivery of the debenture by the company to the person who had the charge; the words "or other incorporated company" were not to be cut down by their context; and, therefore, the agreement fell within s. 17 of the Act of 1882 and was exempt from the provisions of the Bills of Sale Acts relating to form and registration under those Acts.

Action by the plaintiff against the defendant company to enforce the agreement hereinafter set out.

In March, 1885, the plaintiff advanced to the defendant company the sum of £600, by way of loan, upon an agreement for repayment with interest at 10 per cent. By this agreement dated Mar. 3, 1885, and made between the company of the one part, and the plaintiff of the other part, the company agreed to repay the plaintiff in June, 1885, the said sum of £600 with interest at 10 per cent., and thereby charged all the hereditaments comprised in certain deeds specified in the schedule to such agreement (which deeds were thereupon deposited with the plaintiff) with the repayment of the said sum of £600 and interest as aforesaid, and further agreed to issue a legal mortgage of the said hereditaments when called on,

“and further to issue to the plaintiff debentures of the defendant company to the extent of £600, secured over all the capital, stock, goods, chattels, and effects, including uncalled capital, both present and future, of the defendant company, and that the debentures should be payable on June 3, 1885, and should bear interest as from that date at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum.”

In October, 1886, the plaintiff commenced the present action to enforce the above agreement, and claimed a charge on the hereditaments comprised in the deeds specified in the schedule, and also a charge on all the capital, stocks, goods, chattels, and effects of the company, including uncalled capital. The plaintiff in his statement of claim set out the agreement as above stated, and alleged that the sum of £600 and interest was still due. The claim was delivered on Oct. 27, 1887. No defence was put in, and the action now came on for hearing in default of pleading. Shortly before the trial of the action the defendant company had been compulsorily wound-up. The only question material for the purposes of this report was, whether the agreement, so far as it charged the goods, chattels, and effects of the company, was a debenture, and as such within the meaning of s. 17 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882. By the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, s. 17 :

“Nothing in this Act shall apply to any debentures issued by any mortgage, loan, or other incorporated company, and secured upon the capital, stock, or goods, chattels, and effects of such company.”

Romer, Q.C., and Ribton for the plaintiff.

Sir A. Watson, Q.C., and Byrne for the official liquidator.

CHITTY, J.—The plaintiff sues the defendant company on an instrument set out in the statement of claim, and the company take a legal objection to the action, and say that the document in question is void under the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, on two grounds: first, that it is one that requires registration and it has not been registered, and secondly, that it is not in the form prescribed by the schedule to the Act of 1882, and therefore void under s. 9.

In answer to these objections the plaintiff alleges that the instrument in question is in effect a debenture and, therefore, within the exception of s. 17. I need not read this section again; it was read in extenso in Edmonds v. Blaina Furnaces Co. (1), and I have but little to add to the general considerations to be found in the judgment in that case as to the meaning of the term “debenture” and the interpretation to be placed upon the wording of that section. In my judgment, in that case I mentioned one or two reasons as possibly governing the intention of the legislature in the formation of s. 17. After referring to the two great classes of existing companies, viz., those established by Act of Parliament incorporating the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, and those incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862, which are bound by statutory provisions to keep a register of their debentures, I said (post p. 584) :

“The legislature finding these existing provisions for registration, may have considered that it was not necessary to require the registration under the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, of the secured debentures of an incorporated company. The legislature may have acted on this ground, or may have taken the broader view that the secured debentures of incorporated companies were not within the mischief intended to be remedied by that Act.”

A I would merely add that the argument today was mainly addressed to the form of the instrument before me; but beyond saying that the protection which the legislature had thrown upon instruments of this kind in favour of the grantor seems scarcely required in favour of a company, I am not able to state any grounds on which the legislature proceeded when s. 17 was inserted.

B Looking at this section once more, I observe that it may be divided into four parts; it relates, first, to the thing called a "debenture"; secondly, it, the "debenture," must be "issued"; thirdly, it must be issued by a particular company, i.e., a "mortgage, loan, or other incorporated company"—the term "loan" is a little awkward, and I don't know what is meant by a "loan company," but I pass it by, as also the term "mortgage company," which is not quite clear, because I am
C must be construed as they stand, and are not to be cut down by the context; then the fourth part is, that the debenture must be "secured upon the capital, stock, or goods, chattels, and effects of such company." The material words here are "goods, chattels, and effects."

What is a "debenture?" I am unable to add anything to what I have already stated on this point in Edmonds v. Blaina Furnaces Co. (1). My attention has
D been called to extracts from SKEAT'S ETYMOLOGICAL DICTIONARY and BLOUNT'S LAW DICTIONARY as to the derivation of the word debenture, from which it appears that the term is a very old one and is derived from the Latin "debentur," because the bonds or receipts for the money lent began with the words "debentur mihi."* Bearing in mind the four divisions of s. 17 as I have just given them, I must try and find out what "debenture" means. In the course of the argument I asked
E counsel for the official liquidator to define a "debenture," and they did not satisfactorily do so. I do not accept the definition that a debenture must be one of a series of instruments, or issued pari passu with others. I have myself known an instance of a single debenture payable to one individual. In my opinion, a debenture means a document which either creates a debt or acknowledges it, and any document which fulfils either of these conditions is a "debenture." I cannot find
F any precise legal definition of the term; it is not either in law or commerce a strictly technical term, or what is called a term of art. It must be "issued," but "issued" is not a technical term, it is a mercantile term well understood. "Issue" here means the delivery over by the company to the person who has the charge. As to what "company" means, I have already said it must be by "an incorporated company," and it must be secured on the "goods, chattels, and effects" of the G company. Having thus gone through the section once again, I find I cannot add anything further on this point to what I have already stated in the Blaina Furnaces Case (1).

I proceed to look at the particular document before me, which I find contains an agreement to pay the £600 on a certain day, a charge on certain hereditaments referred to in the schedule, and to execute a legal mortgage when called for, and
H then, further, according to the words of the statement of claim, which I am obliged to refer to instead of the original documents because the defendant declined to allow the claim to be amended or to put in the original agreement,

* In SKEAT'S ETYMOLOGICAL DICTIONARY (1882 Edn.) occurs the passage which was cited:

I "Debenture—an acknowledgment of a debt—spelt 'debentur' by LORD BACON in the old edition of his speech to James I. touching purveyors:

'Nay, farther they are grown to that extremity, as is affirmed, though it be scarce credible, that they will take double poundage, once when the debenture [old Edn. debentur] is made, and again the second time when the money is paid.'"

BLOUNT, in his LAW DICTIONARY, has:

"Debenture was by a Rump Act, 1649, ordained to be in the nature of a bond or bill, etc., the form of which debentur, as then used, you may see in SCOBEL'S RUMP ACTS, 1649, c. 63. Lat., debentur, they are due, because these receipts began with the words debentur mihi."

“to issue to the plaintiff debentures of the defendant company to the extent of £600, secured over all the capital, stock, goods, chattels, and effects, including uncalled capital, both present and future, of the defendant company, and that the debentures should be payable on June 3, 1885, and should bear interest as from that date at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum.”

This document, it seems to me, is one which creates a debt, shows the existence of a debt, and acknowledges it. Apart from the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, this clause would, in equity, create an immediate charge in favour of the grantee; an agreement to give a charge is a charge in equity, and that is the reasoning of Cotton, L.J., in Ross v. Army and Navy Hotel Co. (2), when he says (34 Ch.D. at p. 53):

“If the deed [that is the covering deed] had not been executed at all, there would have been in the debenture itself a contract to give such a security as was intended to be given by the deed.”

I have here a contract to give a charge which in equity is a charge; it is therefore a charge on the goods, chattels, and effects of the company; the goods, chattels, and effects therefore form a security for this debt. Reasoning the case out in this way, the result is as plain as it can be on such a section as the one before me—which is by no means plain—that this document is a debenture, and that it is issued, and that it in fact complies with the four points I mentioned above. I may add that, if the debentures had been actually issued in compliance with the agreement, it is clear that s. 17 would apply.

I have here before me a document not in form the same as a debenture in the commonly accepted interpretation of the term, but its legal effect is the same, and it would be a strange interpretation to put upon this section to assume that it said that where the legal effect of two instruments was identical, yet, because there was some slight difference in form, the one should be good and the other void. It is true that the document before me is not called a debenture, but that is no sufficient reason why it should not in effect be one. I cannot read it, as counsel for the official liquidator wanted me to do, as a contract that it should not operate as a debenture; the parties had no such idea as this in their minds at the time, and I cannot impute such an intention to them. I think therefore that a mere agreement to issue what are called debentures is not sufficient to prevent the agreement itself from operating as a debenture within the protection of s. 17. I cannot assent to the argument of junior counsel for the official liquidator that after the execution of the agreement it would have been competent for the company to issue further debentures pari passu with this charge. There is no ground here on the facts as they appear by this statement of claim for saying that this agreement is not within the protection of s. 17. The result, therefore, is that the plaintiff is, in my opinion, entitled to the judgment he has asked for.

Re HICKEY. HICKEY v. COLMER

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Kay, J.), November 4, 1886]

[Reported 55 L.T. 588; 35 W.R. 53]

Contempt of Court—Attachment—Executor—Failure to pay money into court—Fiduciary capacity—Debt owing to testator in lifetime—Need to prove possession or control of money—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict., c. 62), s. 4, exception 3.

Where an executor makes default in payment of a sum of money which has been found due from him in an administration action and which he has been ordered to pay into court, he is within the third exception to s. 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869 (notwithstanding that the sum partly consists of a debt which was owing to the testator in his lifetime), if the executor was in a fiduciary relation to the testator in respect thereof in the testator's lifetime, provided that the money is in his possession or under his control.

Where an order directs a payment of money into court and this sum is composed of principal and interest unless it is possible to distinguish the part of the sum which represents interest from that which represents capital, a committal order cannot be made against the person ordered to make the payment in if he has defaulted, since before such an order can be made it is necessary to show that the money had been in that person's possession or under his control and so much of the sum as represents interest cannot be said to have been in his possession or control.

Motion by the plaintiff for an order that she might be at liberty to issue a writ of attachment against the defendant for his contempt in not paying into court the sum of £200 pursuant to two orders of the court in an administration action.

Colmer, the defendant in the action, which was for the administration of the estate of Hickey, was executor and trustee of the will of Hickey. He had received or been charged with personal estate not specifically bequeathed by the testator, and there was a balance remaining due from him. On the action coming on for hearing upon further consideration, it was, by an order dated Dec. 7, 1885, ordered that the defendant should, on or before Jan. 7, 1886, pay £200, "part of the balance in his hands," into court. The defendant failed to obey this order, and a further application was made to the court, and on July 8, 1886, an order was made that the defendant should, within ten days after service thereof, make the payment into court pursuant to the order of Dec. 7, 1885. The plaintiff in the action alleged that the sum of £200 so ordered to be paid into court by the defendant was money received by or found to be due from him, and was in his possession or control as executor and trustee of the will of the testator. The money was not paid into court by the defendant, and the plaintiff moved before the vacation judge that she might be at liberty to issue a writ of attachment against the defendant for his contempt in not paying into court the sum of £200 pursuant to the two orders.

The defendant, in an affidavit, stated that the sum owing from him to the testator became due under the following circumstances. The defendant and the testator having been engaged together in various transactions concerning the sale of shares, in respect of which there was an open account between them, the defendant on one occasion sold shares in a certain company at the testator's request, and did not pay over the balance. In another affidavit the defendant denied that the sum of £200 ordered to be paid by him into court, was, or ever had been, in his possession or control. He stated that his indebtedness to the estate of the testator was of a compound character, consisting of a balance due from him to the estate in respect of various items, among which were included sums of money which he owed the testator during his lifetime, and, as he (the defendant) believed, also interest. The defendant likewise stated that these sums had never been distinguished; and that the sum of £200, mentioned in the two orders, was on account of such compound indebtedness. He further stated that, in respect of the balance, he had already paid £260 into court, and was entirely unable to make any additional payment, his means being insufficient. These statements were not contradicted in the affidavits filed on the plaintiff's behalf.

By s. 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869:

"With the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, no person shall, after the commencement of this Act, be arrested or imprisoned for making default in payment of a sum of money. There shall be excepted from the operation of the above enactment . . . 3. Default by a trustee or person acting in a fiduciary capacity and ordered to pay by a court of equity any sum in his possession or under his control."

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Bramwell Davis for the plaintiff.

Oswald for the defendant.

KAY, J.—This motion fails on a very short ground. The order of Dec. 7, 1885, states—whether per incuriam or not I am unable to say—that the defendant must pay £200, "part of the balance in his hands," into court on or before Jan. 7, 1886. The defendant having failed to obey that order, a further order was made on July 8, 1886, and another day was fixed for payment. An application is made on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant may be committed for contempt in not making payment as ordered.

It is said that the case comes within the third exception to s. 4 of the Debtors' Act, 1869, being a "default in payment of a sum of money by a person acting in a fiduciary capacity." One point which was raised is that part of this money was due from the defendant to the testator in his lifetime, and that, seeing it was a mere debt to the testator in his lifetime, it cannot be treated as money now due from the defendant in a fiduciary relation. It was answered that the defendant was in a fiduciary relation to the testator before he died. I am not prepared to say that is not a sufficient answer. It is familiar to us that, when this court has an executor before it, and it appears that the executor was indebted to his testator in his lifetime, the court will, instead of directing another action to be brought, make an order in that action for payment of the debt. Therefore, I think the court would be at liberty to treat the action as one to recover that debt; and if that

A debt were due from the executor in a fiduciary capacity that would be sufficient to bring him within the third exception to s. 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869.

It has been decided, however, by the Court of Appeal that it must be shown that the person ordered to pay money into court had the money in his possession or under his control. Where the sum is compounded partly of interest and partly of capital, he cannot be committed for nonpayment of so much of the sum as represents interest, for he cannot be said to have had that in his possession or under his control. If the order which directs the payment into court does not distinguish the part of the sum which represents interest from that which represents capital, he cannot be committed at all. In this case the money found due is the result of a sort of account taken against the defendant which he says he believes was calculated charging him with interest. That is not denied in the affidavits made on the other side, and I must therefore take it that this sum did consist of principal and interest. The order does not distinguish between principal and interest. Consequently I am not at liberty to make the order of committal which is asked for, having regard to this technical objection. On that ground, therefore, I must refuse this motion. I order the plaintiff to pay the costs, but such costs may be set off against the amount found to be owing by the defendant.
